THE DEBATES

OF THE

SENATE OF CANADA

IN THE

FIRST SESSION OF THE TENTH PARLIAMENT OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR THE DESPATCH OF BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY, THE ELEVENTH DAY OF JANUARY, IN THE FIFTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HIS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII

SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, January 11, 1905.

The Senate met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

The Members of the Senate were informed that a Commission under the Great Seal had been issued, appointing the Honourable Raoul Dandurand to be the Speaker of the Senate of Canada.

The said Commission was then read by the Clerk.

The Honourable the Speaker then took the Chair at the foot of the Throne, to which he was conducted by the Honourable Messieurs Scott and Templeman, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod preceding.

NEW SENATORS.

The following newly appointed Senators were introduced :

Right Honourable Sir Richard Cartwright, G.C.M.G.

Honourable Philippe Auguste Choquette.

Honourable James Hamilton Ross.

Honourable Thomas Osborne Davis.

The Honourable the Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy Governor General, being seated at the foot of the Throne.

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that,—'It is the Deputy Governor's desire that they attend him immediately in the Senate.'

Who being come,

The Honourable the Speaker said,

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but, to-morrow, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of the calling of this parliament.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow afternoon at a quarter to three o'clock.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, January 12, 1905.

The Speaker took the Chair at 2.45 p.m.

PRAYERS.

At three o'clock p.m., His Excellency the Governor General proceeded in state to the Senate Chamber, and took his seat upon the Throne. The members of the Senate being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons. The members of that body, preceded by their Speaker, appeared at the Bar.

The Hon. Robert Franklin Sutherland, Speaker of the House of Commons, said :—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :

The House of Commons has elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their King and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable consideration.

The hon. the Speaker of the Senate then said :—

Mr. Speaker,—I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he fully confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to His Majesty's person and government ; and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges. I am commanded also to assure you, that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the session by a gracious speech to both Houses :

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I desire on this occasion to assure you how sensible I am of the great honour conferred on me by the King, in appointing me to the distinguished position of Governor General.

My pleasure in being called upon to represent His Majesty in the Dominion has been heightened by the cordial welcome I have received on all sides and from all classes.

This favoured land, with its vast resources and improving facilities for transportation, is attracting people on an ever ascending scale, not only from the United Kingdom, but also from the United States and from many other countries.

As the opportunities for settlement under the advantageous conditions which exist are better known, this Dominion will become the home of an increasing number of happy and contented people, whose character and prosperity will add strength to the great empire of which you are so important a part.

It is gratifying to note that the trade of the Dominion, which in recent years has so steadily increased, is not diminishing, the aggregate trade for the last fiscal year being the largest on record. The revenue for the past six months is also greater than for the corresponding period of the preceding year.

On the invitation of the President of the United States, my government has joined in the formation of an international commission composed of three representatives from each country to investigate and report upon the conditions and uses of the waters adjacent to the boundary line between the United States and Canada, and to make such recommendations for improvements and regulations as shall best subserve the interest of navigation in said waters.

The rapid growth in the population of the Northwest Territories during the past two years justifies the wisdom of conferring on these territories provincial autonomy. A bill for that purpose will be submitted for your consideration.

The surveys necessary for the location of the line of the National Transcontinental Canadian Railway are being vigorously prosecuted, and it is confidently believed that tenders for the construction of several sections may be invited during the coming season.

The display of Canadian products made last year at the St. Louis exhibition proved such a marked success in attracting emigrants to the western prairies, that it is proposed to accept the invitation of the government of Belgium to send samples of our products and manufactures, to the exhibition to be shortly held at Liège.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The accounts of the last year will be laid before you. It will be satisfactory to you to learn that the expenditure has been less than the revenue, leaving a surplus over all charges.

The estimates for the coming year will be submitted at an early date ; they have been prepared with a due regard for economy consistent with the development of the resources of the Dominion.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I invite your best attention to the subjects I have mentioned and invoke the Divine blessing on your deliberations.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General be taken into consideration by the Senate on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

THE SENATE

Ottawa, Monday, January 16, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to know if the official who has charge of the minutes and proceedings of the Senate could inform the House why the order which has hitherto been followed in introducing new members in this House was changed in the printing of the minutes of the proceedings when the new members were introduced last week? We are all aware that the first new member who was introduced on the opening day of the session was the Right Hon. Sir Richard J. Cartwright. Then came the Hon. Mr. Ross, then Mr. T. O. Davis, and then Mr. Choquette. As we read the minutes of the Senate, that order has been changed, and the Hon. Mr. Choquette has been placed second on the list. I think he has a right to that position, because the 'Canada Gazette' placed the Hon. Mr. Choquette second in the appointments. All four members were appointed on the same day, September 30, and the 'Journal' of October 1, printed the names, first, Sir R. Cartwright, second, Hon. Mr. Choquette, third, Hon. Mr. Ross, and fourth, the Hon. Mr. Davis. But the introduction into this chamber did not take place according to the nomination of the new senators, and I think it was by a mistake that the Hon. Mr. Choquette was placed last. That does not mean to say he is the least, but he was left until the last. If it is in order, I should like to know who gave the orders to correct our minutes in that respect? There are two points in question here : There is first the relation of the facts as they took place in the House, and in the order in which they took place, and the other point why the Hon. Mr. Choquette, who was introduced second, was left until the last ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because Mr. Choquette was the last appointed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How was he the last appointed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He was the last one appointed by the Crown.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The 'Canada Gazette' shows to the contrary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know about the 'Canada Gazette' ; I only know what occurred in the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there is a minister who ought to know something about the 'Canada Gazette' it should be the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There are other minutes which require some slight correction. For instance, in the case of the Hon. Mr. Davis, it is stated that he was introduced by the Hon. Messrs. Scott and Tessier; he was introduced by the Hon. Mr. Templeman and myself. In the case of Mr. Ross. the minutes state that he was introduced by the Hon. Messrs. Watson and Young. He was introduced by the Hon. Messrs. Templeman and Watson. These are two corrections which can be very easily made in the minutes.

The SPEAKER—I understand the reason for the alteration in the recording of the introduction of the new senators lies in the fact that I read the certificates which were put in my hands, and the certificate of the Hon. Mr. Choquette was the second, and instead of recording them as they were introduced, they were recorded in the same order as the certificates were read.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a good reason. I suppose the corrections suggested by the hon. gentleman from Killarney (Hon. Mr. Young) will be made ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As I understand it, the senator who signs the roll takes precedence over those who follow him. Are you going to change that ? It will make no difference until it comes to a question of precedence, when the roll will be referred to, and of these four gentlemen the one who signed first will take precedence of the other three. I noticed by these commissions that they were all appointed on the same day, the whole four of them, so it becomes a question of which one signed the roll first. A similar thing occurred several years ago, when two hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were introduced; it was simply a question which signed the roll first.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman is not suggesting that there should be an alteration; he is merely asking that there should be a correction in the cases referred to by the hon. gentleman from Killarney.

THE STRIKING COMMITTEE.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT gave notice of the following motion :

That on Wednesday next he will move, pursuant to rule 79, that the following senators be appointed a Committee of Selection to nominate senators to serve on the several standing committees during the present session, i.e., the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G., and the Hon. Messrs. Templeman, Miller, Power, Ferguson, Gibson, Watson, Loughheed, and Casgrain (de Lanaudière) and report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This is a notice of motion ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. Secretary of State is repeating an error committed last year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The names are the same as those of last year, with two changes only. Mr. Power takes the place of the Speaker, and Mr. Casgrain the place of Sir Alphonse Pelletier.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This is the same thing I complained of last year. The province of Quebec is represented on that committee by one member only.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of contesting it when it comes up. This is a notice of motion only.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I shall postpone my remarks until then, but I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he had to correct it last year and the year before, and he will have to correct it this year again.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION TO POSTPONE CONSIDERATION.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to suggest that the debate on the address be adjourned until to-morrow. A number of senators present this afternoon desire to attend the debate in the other House, and I believe one of the two gentlemen entrusted with the task of moving the consideration of the address, if not both of them, would be pleased to have the debate take place to-morrow instead of this afternoon. I simply propose it as a matter of courtesy, and if the honourable House will entertain the motion I shall move it, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Montplaisir. It is a matter of courtesy to the hon. gentlemen who are to move the adoption of the address and friends who would like to be present to hear the debate in the other chamber.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are breaking the record here. This is the first time I have ever heard it suggested that the consideration of the speech from the Throne should be postponed because some hon. gentlemen wish to go to the gallery in the other House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We are getting young.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We should have a little more regard for our own dignity than to adjourn for any such reason as the one which has been given. I have no objection to an adjournment. We have had, perhaps, our usual quantum of discussion already, and if the hon. gentleman who has been selected to move the address in reply to the speech from the Throne is desirous that the discussion should be postponed until to-morrow, I have no objection at all. What I object to is the reason given, that hon. members want to listen to the debate in the other House. We should have some little respect for the Senate and for ourselves.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Some hon. members of this House expressed the wish that the consideration of the address should be postponed until to-morrow, and in view of the bad condition of my throat this morning, though I am better now, I thought proper to acquiesce in that desire, but I am ready to proceed if that is the desire of the House. I do not want to inconvenience any one, or to ask hon. gentlemen to do something which they do not approve of. I have too much respect for the hon. members of this House to ask them to postpone the debate because of my indisposition, so I am ready to go on.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not object to the postponement, but I do object to a postponement on the ground given. The hon. gentleman's indisposition is another thing, and it is only usual courtesy to postpone a debate under such circumstances, but it is not usual to postpone a debate on the other ground, in order that hon. members may go to the gallery of the other chamber and listen to a debate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman closed his hearing to the other reason which I gave.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman who is to move the address spoke to me this morning on this subject. I said that as a matter of courtesy to himself—I think I used the same expression that was used by the late Speaker—as far as I was concerned, I should have no objection to his doing it; but I do take objection to the manner in which it has been brought before the House. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax that we should not adjourn this debate or any other for the reasons given by the hon. gentleman who has suggested the adjournment. I go further: I think that an intimation of this kind should have emanated from the hon. leader of this House, and not from an individual member, and, if he will permit me to say so, I think he ought to assume his own power and dignity in this case and not allow private members to take it away from him. There is a certain amount of respect due to the hon. leader of the House, no matter who he may be, or what party he represents, and when a request of this kind is made, or when there is any change to be made in the order of business, if it comes from the hon. leader of the House it comes with greater force and with greater dignity, and members of the House will acquiesce in any request of that kind much more readily than when it is taken out of his hands. I occupied that position myself, years ago and I used to feel very sensitive when members of my own party assumed my role and occupied the position which I thought I ought to occupy. The hon. Secretary of State will excuse me for saying what I do, and I think the hon. gentleman from Victoria will acquiesce in the suggestion I have made. If the hon. gentleman from Mille Isles desires to proceed, we should be much pleased to listen to him, but if for the reasons which he gave me this morning he would rather have the debate postponed till to-morrow, as a matter of courtesy I am sure the House will acquiesce in such a request

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am quite ready to go on, but if nobody objects I desire to move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I cannot allow the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition to pass unnoticed, as they are very personal.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I rise to a question of privilege. I am entitled to place my position properly before the House. I had only one or two seconds' consideration before I rose to move the adjournment of this debate, and when the hon. leader of the opposition wanted to insinuate that I did it out of disrespect to the position held by the hon. leader of the House, I tell him that he is mistaken. I had no such idea. I did so after a consultation with the hon. gentleman who was to move the address, so that the hon. leader's remarks with regard to want of respect and want of dignity are quite out of order, and made without knowing all the facts. If he had come to me and asked me how I came to make the motion, I would have told him, but he had no right to accuse me of acting with disrespect for the proper dignity of the hon. leader of the House. Before the hon. senator takes me to task, he should ascertain the facts.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I decidedly object to the House adjourning in order to give members a chance to go to the other House and listen to the speeches there. I believe that the debate in this House will be fully as interesting as the debate in the Commons. When hon. members of the other House set the example of adjourning to come in a body to this chamber to listen to our speeches, then I will be prepared to acquiesce in the present motion, which seems to me utterly unexplainable on the part of an hon. gentleman who very properly calls himself a young member in this House. As far as I am concerned, I would insist that we should know the reason why we are adjourning, and rather than that reason should go to the public we should insist upon going on with the business to day, especially as the hon. mover is ready to proceed.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I have no objection to this motion on one condition: I think it is a very bad precedent, but I shall vote in favour of the motion if this House will order that the statement that we were going to adjourn to allow members an opportunity to hear the debate in the Commons be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to

THE SEAT OF HON. RUFUS CURRY.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

The SPEAKER—I beg to inform the House that I have received from the Clerk of the Senate a report with reference to the absence of the Hon. Mr. Rufus Curry, which reads as follows :—

Honourable Raoul Dandurand,
Speaker of the Senate.

Sir,—In compliance with rule 99, I have the honour to report for the information of the Senate, that on examination of the records of the Senate, they fail to show that the Honourable Rufus Curry, a member thereof, and a senator for the province of Nova Scotia, has given his attendance in the Senate during any part of the last two consecutive sessions of the last parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
SAMUEL E. St. O. CHAPLEAU,
Clerk of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My recollection—although I should like to verify it before taking any action, is that the Hon. Mr. Curry was appointed during a session of parliament and that, therefore, he will not have been absent during two consecutive sessions. It has just occurred to me at this moment, and I speak subject to correction hereafter. If that is found to be the fact, it may be worth while to consider whether he comes strictly within the rules. In the meantime I move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Templeman, that the report of the Clerk of the Senate respecting the absence of the Hon. Mr. Rufus Curry during two consecutive sessions of parliament be referred to the committee appointed to consider the orders and customs of the House and the privileges of parliament, the committee to meet at the call of the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—As there is no urgency about this matter, why should the hon. Secretary of State not give a notice ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is practically a notice to refer to the committee. There is no action taken on it other than to refer it to the committee.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—But no motion should be presented unless there is a notice. There is no urgency in this case, and we are going to have a committee to revise the statutes. Probably they will find that we have proceeded contrary to the rules in this very habit of disregarding the rule requiring notice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection to let my motion stand until Thursday, but I was simply following precedents of the past.

The SPEAKER—Shall this be taken as a notice of motion ? It is simply a motion to refer to the committee. It does not require any notice. However, I suppose it may go as a notice for Thursday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not strictly in order. According to the notice of motion which the hon. gentleman has given, if I understand the question, the Hon. Mr. Curry was appointed and his commission was signed by the government, but he has never taken his seat and has never been sworn in. Is he de facto a member under the circumstances ? I suppose this is the only mode of vacating his seat. Is that the reason this course is adopted ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—He has not signed the roll.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would make no difference. He was appointed by Order in Council and the Order in Council was approved by His Excellency. He was gazetted as a senator.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Has the hon. gentleman asked the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on the matter ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not. I think my own experience of parliamentary law is quite sufficient for the occasion. I thought at first he was not a senator ; but when we come to consider that he was appointed by the only authority that could appoint a senator and we could not appoint anybody else in his place, he certainly remains a senator until he is excluded by our own rules, because at any time last year he could have come and signed the roll and taken his place. We could not have appointed anybody in his place. That would be one of the tests.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not suppose the fathers of confederation ever contemplated such a case.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It seems extraordinary that his resignation has not been obtained. Surely if we are qualified to deal with him as a senator, it would be competent for him to resign.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I asked repeatedly for a year if we were going to obtain his resignation, and he said he had not accepted the appointment and was not bound to give any resignation.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct attention to a report of our proceedings of yesterday which appears in the government organ in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—What paper is that?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—'Le Canada.' In reporting the proceedings of yesterday the organ says :

> The Hon. Mr. Landry complained of the manner in which the presentations of the new members in the Senate had appeared in the Minutes of Proceedings. He objected to the name of Mr. Choquette coming immediately after the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright's, when he had been the last presented.

That was not the objection I took. My objection was that the Minutes of Proceedings were not in accord with what had taken place, but that I was satisfied they were in accord with the 'Official Gazette', which put the Hon. Mr. Choquette second on the list. When I made that remark the Hon. Secretary of State told me that the Hon. Mr. Choquette had not been named second, but had been the last named. I referred him to the 'Official Gazette,' in which it appeared that Hon. Mr. Choquette had been named the second.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am glad the hon. gentleman has called my attention to this matter. I had intended to-day, before the Orders of the Day were called, to have explained that I made a great mistake yesterday inadvertently. Having been present when the appointments were made, I was under the impression that they were made in the order I have mentioned. In order to ascertain whether my memory was correct or not, I made an examination after leaving the chamber and found that I was in error, that Mr. Choquette came immediately after Sir Richard Cartwright. The four gentlemen were appointed on the same day, Sir Richard Cartwright first, Mr. Choquette next, then Mr. Ross, and then Mr. Davis. I felt it my duty to take the earliest opportunity to make this explanation to the Senate and apologize for my error of yesterday.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called :

> Consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the first session of the tenth parliament.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—(in French): The speech from the Throne informs us that a new governor has arrived to preside over the destinies of our country, and that he bears a name dear to the English nation, a name rendered illustrious by many generations of brave soldiers and celebrated statesmen. Once more His Majesty's government has been happy in the choice of the one sent to represent him in Canada. He has chosen a member of one of the most illustrious families of England, of a family in which the traditions of honour, of loyalty, and of patriotism, have been transmitted from father to son.

Lord Grey has already proved that he bears nobly the weight of so great a name, and that he is equal to the high obligations imposed upon him by such glorious traditions. The clear insight of His Excellency cannot fail to interest him in the works of our young nation, in the efforts which she is making to develop, under the beneficent tutelege of England, the immense resources of the country, to harmonize its sincere and profound sentiments of loyalty with the exigencies of its commercial and industrial progress, with its aspirations and its legitimate ambition to attain the highest destiny.

His Excellency arrived among us under happy auspices, in an era of remarkable prosperity, in the midst of a happy people contented with their lot. A happy people are easily governed and well disposed generally towards the leaders of the state.

We have good reason to thank Providence, for it has been good to our country for several years, has loaded us with his favours and given us in abundance the fruits of the earth and the blessings of peace.

Happier than many other peoples, who are crushed with ruinous armaments and live constantly in an enervating dread of war, our young nation may employ all its strength to make of Canada one of the most prosperous and happy nations of the earth.

We have a right to be proud of Canada, proud of its origin, of its past, proud of those who have governed it up to the present time and of whom some sit amongst us with such distinction, and we have good reason to be full of confidence in its future and its destiny.

Providence has generously given us all the elements of strength and of success which assure the greatness of a country. They are visible throughout Canada, those elements of strength and of grandeur, in the same immensity of its rivers and its lakes, in the richness of its forest and its mines, in the glorious fertility of its blessed soil, in the moral character and the physical and intellectual strength of its inhabitants, as also in the diversity of their tastes, of their aptitudes, and of their religious and national sentiments.

For a long time it was believed that this diversity of nationalities in our country was an element of weakness, but it is generally recognized now that, on the contrary, it constitutes an element of strength and of greatness, contributing to the general interests, the talents, the aptitudes and the characteristic faculties of each race, of each nationality.

Variety exists everywhere in the moral, as well as in the physical order, and it is thus that God's work is accomplished in the world.

History teaches us that the great cathedrals of Europe, which have been objects of admiration for centuries, were built by the religious enthusiasm of many, each one being happy to bring to it perhaps a rough stone, perhaps a mosaic. We are constructing, we also, a monument—more than a monument, a nation, and each one ought to contribute to that great work in bringing to it his stone, his part of the work according to his faculties and his means.

Now, it is impossible that the descendants of two great nations who have made Europe so great, should fail to form here, by uniting their forces and the special aptitudes which characterize them a remarkable people, a civilization—full of strength and charm.

Their forefathers fought each other for centuries, the earth trembled under the tread of their powerful battalions and shuddered at the sight of their combats, but their very struggles served the cause of humanity. If their descendants find themselves united on this American soil by strange and heroic events, it is because God so willed, in order that he might present to the world the spectacle of what may be done when the genius of France and the genius of England work to develop one of the largest and richest countries on the earth, a country whose riches appear to be incalculable.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking on one occasion on the future of Canada, compared it to a star rising in the west. Permit me to say that it will be more than a star, it will be a constellation in which each brilliant star shall contribute to the splendour of all.

The division of the Northwest Territories into provinces of the confederation constitutes an important chapter in the history of Canada.

There was a time when it was thought by many—and, I must admit, by myself—that the annexation of those territories to Canada was premature, that the old provinces should retain for their own benefit all their revenue, their customs and excise duties. Of course, it was to be expected that the young provinces would be very jealous of their natural progress, but the older statesmen, Conservative and Liberal alike, were probably wiser than some of us when they decided that the development of the Northwest would build up the whole country, and they spared nothing to attain that end. While we must admit that these provinces have cost us very many millions of dollars, we are proud of the result. We do not regret what we have done. We are proud of the sacrifice which we have made for those provinces; we are proud of them, proud of their products, and proud of their men. Everything which comes from British Columbia and the Northwest is strong and solid. But in order that those elements of progress and of prosperity and those sacrifices which we have made may make our country greater, many conditions are necessary.

Firstly, the government should in the political organization of those provinces remove all causes of friction, of national and religious discontent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The winds which blow from the northwest are violent, and sometimes they bring storms which more than once have shaken the foundations of confederation. Experience is a lesson and a source of wisdom for statesmen.

Secondly, the different provinces of confederation should be united by the cement of self-help and protection, and should always be prepared to do whatever is necessary for their individual development and for the progress and prosperity of each of them. Therefore, if we make such great sacrifices for the Northwest, if we direct towards that part of Canada a flood of immigration, and if we construct for them railways destined to carry their natural products to all the markets of the world, they must in return do for the old provinces what is necessary to put them in a position to supply them with the manufactured products. Otherwise, what will be the effect of all our efforts and of those sacrifices that we have made to increase their population? The only effect will be to provide a market for the manufactures of our neighbours in the United States. After all, we have the lessons of history before us, it is as true to-day as it has been in the past, that a patriotic policy is the most beneficial to a country, much better than a policy of selfish sectionalism. The strong nations are those in which each man, each society, each city, each province, is always prepared to make sacrifices for the general interests of the country.

Thirdly, I may add that in order to promote the moral and material development of the provinces and place them in a position to meet the pressing needs of colonization and education, the Dominion government should readjust the federal subsidies and increase them. There is no doubt that these subsidies were based upon erroneous hypothesis and inaccurate calculations, and that as years roll on the disproportion between the customs and excise duties ceded by the provinces and what they receive as compensation becomes more evident and striking. Notwithstanding the fact that the customs and excise duties are being tripled, quadrupled, and that the population is constantly increasing, the compensation remains the same, and while surpluses are accumulating ino the federal treasury the provinces are unable to carry out works most urgently required for their material advancement. They recall to my mind Lazarus suffering at the door of the rich man, and as Lazarus, they would content themselves with the crumbs which fall from the federal treasury. It must be remembered that by helping the provinces to increase their population the Dominion authorities would take back with one hand what they would give with the other, for it is the federal government who would chiefly profit by such increase.

Lastly, not only the provinces should be patriotic and seek to harmonize their private interests with the general interests of the country, but the different nationalities of the Dominion should feel that the welfare, the happiness and the future progress and prosperity of our country will depend upon their spirit of harmony and fraternity, and the path which we should follow to attain that end is indicated by the history of our country. In the last conflict which took place between French and English on the Plains of Abraham for supremacy in Canada, a dramatic fact which strikes the mind of every one who reads the history of that memorable period, is the death of Wolfe and Montcalm, of the conqueror and the conquered, of those two heroes so worthy of the admiration of the two great nations they represented. It seems at the very moment when new France was to pass under British domination, it was the will of God that French and English should learn to appreciate their respective qualities and mutually respect themselves, and it was under the influence of that noble feeling that France and England agreed to erect a monument to those two heroes, Wolfe and Montcalm, and proclaim that they deserved to be united in the same immortality by a common memorial. In the great struggles which took place for the establishment of constitutional government and parliamentary liberty, French and English joined hands, and even in 1837 and 1838 the two principal leaders of the insurrection of the province of Quebec, it is very extraordinary to know, were Englishmen—Wolfred and Robert Nelson. Without their speeches, I doubt if the province of Lower Canada would have taken up arms. But it was especially noticed in 1842 that that feeling of union and fraternity achieved remarkable success. It was really through the auspicious alliance between Baldwin and Lafontaine that we won constitutional government and the glorious consecration, under the constitution, of political equality for men of all races and all creeds. That feeling of union and fraternity has prevailed in times of religious and national friction. It has not disappeared. It continues to inspire our statesmen and to guide them, and on different occasions we have seen the two great parties of this country comprising the great majority of gentlemen belonging to the Anglo-Saxon race accepting men as leaders without questioning their nationality, and here I have the right to say that that sentiment received its decisive and solemn consecration when one of those two parties accepted as leader, first of the opposition and afterwards of the government, a man belonging to the French and religious minority, a French Canadian, but the most eminent representative of his race, a man whose talent and character are admired even by his adversaries—Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That evidence of fraternity and toleration had the best affect upon the minds of our population, upon those who, like myself, I must admit, were not very enthusiastic about confederation, fearing that it might prove disadvantageous to the minority and produce many national and religious conflicts. It produced the impression that there was a common ground in this country on which all nationalities could unite in the general interests of the Dominion without ceasing to cherish the glorious traditions of our history, without renouncing our religious or national traditions. After all, fidelity to the past and to the memory of ancestors must be respected, because it is a noble feeling which cannot produce anything but good. We have had an example of what that feeling can produce in the glorious achievements of the Japanese in the present war. I have no hesitation in saying that veneration for the past is a source of poetry and of patriotism, of heroism and noble inspirations, and is much less to be feared than the subversive doctrines of those people who threaten the peace and progress of the world.

At a time when the worshippers of the Golden Calf are so numerous, when materialism exercises so dangerous an influence, let us take great care not to demolish the altars upon which pious hands keep up the fire of self-denial and sacrifice. The spirit of union and fraternity which enabled our great statesmen to achieve such noble deeds will also enable us to continue their good and patriotic work and to give a noble and comforting sight to those who never cease to proclaim and to repeat the sublime words which greeted the birth of Christ: 'Peace to men of good will.' This spirit will, moreover, make Canada one of the most remarkable fields of human activity, a truly promised land where all the nations of the world will come to live happy and prosperous, to enjoy the benefits of liberty and the respect of their national feelings and religious belief.

I beg to move :

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of parliament, namely :—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Albert Henry George, Earl Grey, Viscount Howick, Baron Grey of Howick, in the county of Northumberland, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, and a Baronet ; Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, &c., &c., Governor General of Canada,

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :—

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of parliament.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—Through the courtesy of the hon. Secretary of State, it is my privilege to second the motion to adopt the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, and, although for many years engaged in public affairs, in attempting to speak before hon. gentlemen who have been distinguished by successful public careers and have earned for themselves a prominent place in the history of their country by their industry and their talents and their patriotic achievements, I may be pardoned if I feel a degree of diffidence only partially overcome by a sense of duty. The hon. mover of the address has delivered, I am sure, an eloquent and admirable speech, but unfortunately for me, not having acquired the use of the French language, I was not able to enjoy the full pleasure of an appreciation of its merits ; but from the synopsis of his remarks, which he gave us in English, I am safe in saying that if we could have understood it in the French language and appreciated the eloquence of his sentences, the patriotism, the enthusiasm and the poetic touches which he gave his address, we would all be filled with admiration. If it were my misfortune to lose the use of the English language, and I were permitted to acquire any other, it is the French language I would be most happy to be possessed of. I made a great mistake in my earlier years in not having acquired a knowledge of French. Many hon. gentlemen, no doubt, have had the same experience as mine, that they did not expect in their earlier years to occupy a position in which a knowledge of French is so convenient and important.

His Excellency the Governor General expresses his pleasure in being permitted to represent His Majesty in the Dominion of Canada. From what we know of the character, the sterling worth and distinguished ability of His Excellency, we are sure that we are voicing the sentiments of the Canadian people when we say that they experience equal, if not greater pleasure, in recognizing His Excellency as the representative of His Majesty the King.

In the speech we find an expression which is very forceful in connection with this happy country of ours. It is referred to in the speech, and very properly so, as 'a favoured land.' Let a Canadian traverse the whole world in search of a better country and he will come home satisfied that, all things considered, there is no land that offers larger opportunities for freedom, liberty, prosperity, peace and happiness ; and no country can produce stronger men both in body and mind and finer women, proof of which was amply and substantially shown at the opening ceremonies of the first session of this the tenth parliament, when so many of the fair mothers and daughters of our country graced the occasion by their presence, displaying a wealth of health and beauty, seldom witnessed in any country.

The honourable mover of the address has taken a good deal of latitude, traversing, as I understand it, not only the present but a good deal of the history of the past, and of course we were filled with pleasure when we heard his forceful remarks in regard to bringing together these two nations in a union so happily consummated. When we look a little further back than the hon. gentleman did when he referred to the strike at Quebec, when we look back to a time in the memory of many of us when the great struggle of the battle of Waterloo took place and contrast the strike and dissensions between those two great nations, with the spectacle that we have before us in this country of the two races sitting down together in peace and happiness and prosperity to work out the destiny of this new country as best they can with an unselfish purpose before them, it is something to fill every heart with admiration for what has been accomplished.

Now, the next we find in the address—and we find it often in this country, for it is very applicable to the condition which surrounds us—is the expression 'resources and transportation' and 'development.' Those are the words that meet us at every turn. We find that the question of transportation in this country has been a difficult problem to deal with. On account of the geography of the country, stretching forth four thousand miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with its varied products, with its wonderful resources, requiring a large expense in transportation facilities, at the present time as in the past, is a very difficult problem to deal with. But the very thing which retarded our progress years ago, will be, in the future, the thing that will make for our greatest prosperity, growth and greatness, because we have in this country what is to be found in very few countries. If we for one moment take into consideration the vast resources of this Dominion, and look at it as it was a very few years ago, when the buffalo roamed over the great prairies and when the Rockies were unknown, and when it took a very difficult and tedious journey to reach the coast; and when we see in a few years what has been accomplished within the experience of some who have in the past predicted this future to the country, we cannot fully forecast the future. I refer to a remark made by one of our Nova Scotia statesmen, over fifty years ago, when the Hon. J. Howe made the remark: 'Gentlemen, I want to tell you the time is coming when the iron horse will span the continent of America in five days.' I say that if we had the forecast to-day, if we had the vision that that man possessed, to look into the future and see what this country is going to be fifty years hence, we would be amazed. I do not think our fondest desires or expectation can predict the greatness of the country in another half a century, for various reasons. It does not depend to-day, as it did in the past, upon the population of a country to mark out its progress, because whether we go, in the printing offices, in the factories, in the machine shops, on the farm, in the coal mines, the facilities for accomplishing desired results have increased at such a rapid pace that in most instances one man is accomplishing what it took in some cases a dozen, in some cases a score, and in some cases fifty men, to accomplish a few years ago, and we cannot limit the progress of achievement, because a few years ago when a settler went out on the prairies, he went out with his horses and a crude plough and turned over an acre in a day. When a settler goes out into that country, which is capable of producing bread for the world, at the present time, he goes out with a steam gang plough, that turns over as much soil in one day as would, a few years ago, have been considered a very fair-sized cultivable farm. How are we to know what power will be brought into operation in years to come? Even electricity may be harnessed to the machines that are going to turn over the soil, and when that vast prairie country is brought into a productive state, it is destined to produce bread for the whole world. Then, when we go into the lower strata of the earth, and when I call attention to the dwarf province of this great Dominion, Nova Scotia, and tell you that, in the last year, out of one of the companies' mines, over three millions of coal was raised by modern facilities, it can readily be supposed that Nova Scotia alone has coal enough to supply the whole world for a large number of years. In every section of this country we find developments unheard of and unlooked for in previous years. We not only have coal and gold, but we have oil and the products of the field and forest. Then when we come up to the great interior provinces, we find they have every product of the farm and of the garden. They can even make wine to gladden the heart of man, and they have everything in the shape of fruit that would supply a nation from one province. I merely mention these things to show that the thoughtful man, having an interest in our public affairs and the destiny of this country, should feel that we are here occupying a very responsible position. Every statute that goes out to the country from either House comes before us, and we need wisdom, and, of course, as I said before, having had something to do with the local statutes, local enactments and local affairs, we come here as young men—I suppose I speak for others as well as myself—and we look to these men who have vast experience and we come here to aid them in their superior judgment, to do all that we possibly can to carry out in this House what will be in the best interests of the Dominion of Canada. In regard to the various clauses of the speech with which we have been favoured, some hon. gentlemen may think that it is not quite extensive enough, and that it does not contain all that they would like to see put in the speech, but we are quite sure that all the useful statutes that are to be placed on the statute-books of our country are not foreshadowed by this synopsis that we have here. It is a good deal better to accomplish more than is promised than to fall short of what may be predicted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—And I presume that will be the result in this instance, that legislation will be very much more important than is indicated by the speech. I think it is the general opinion of all public men, both in the Commons and in the Senate, that the present session will be a short one, that the labours of the past few sessions were so prolonged that the members become worn and weary in the hot season of the year, and probably, from what I learn, that when the earth begins to make the grass green again we shall be wending our way home to engage in the rural delights of the country. Now, in regard to the Northwest Territories and its growth, it is apparent to every hon. gentleman present when they see that for the last five or six years nearly one half a million population have gone into that country, that in order to form a correct opinion or in any degree grasp the situation in the prairie country it is necessary for our public men to travel its length and breadth. I have been fortunate enough to have been across the continent and up and down the coast, and it is wonderful to see the great riches of the country in agriculture and minerals. When we leave the fisheries, that I have not referred to on the east coast, we come to the fisheries of the west, and we cannot say too much in respect of the natural resources of this great country of ours. Therefore, I have no doubt that all legislation in the direction of increasing the local powers of the Northwest Territories will be considered in the best interests of that section of the country. There is a clause in the speech which refers to the St. Louis exposition. I am sure that any hon. gentleman who had the pleasure of visiting that exposition and going through the various departments, had no reason whatever to be ashamed of the products of Canada in competition with those of other countries. In fact, you could spend hours there and be delighted to feel that you belonged to a country, so new as ours, which could produce an exhibit such as could be seen there. I have not thought it necessary to extend my remarks, because the mover of the address has covered all the ground in a much more eloquent and forceful manner than I could, and I shall close my remarks by seconding my hon. friend's motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The mover and seconder of the reply to the address have set me an admirable example, and I shall endeavour to follow it by occupying the time of the House for a very brief space indeed. Before referring to the address permit me, Mr. Speaker, to compliment you on the honour which has been conferred upon you by the government in selecting you to preside over this body. I think I speak the sentiments of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House, and with whom I act, when I express the belief that your duty will be performed in a fair and impartial manner. It is true we may differ upon many points when questions of order arise. That is incident to human nature, but I am quite convinced that whenever those difficulties do arise, that they will be treated in that courteous manner that should obtain between members of the Senate. I take this, my first opportunity, to express my own sentiments, and I believe the sentiments of the Conservative party, with whom I generally act, upon this point. The speech from the Throne is more important, shall I say, in what it does not contain than in what is really contained in it. I frankly admit that I concur in the remarks made by the hon. seconder of the address, that it is very much better to perform what you promise than to make a number of promises and never carry them out. That is the position my hon. friend has taken and he thinks it is a good policy. I acquiesce in that. We have had many and many promises upon very great and important questions in the past, which have not only not been realized but no attempt has been made to fulfil them. That certainly cannot be laid to the charge of the government at the present moment, so far as this address is concerned. In reference to the Governor General and his accession to the position which he now holds, I am fully in accord with the remarks of the mover and seconder, and I only regret that I have not the eloquence of the mover of the address in order to couch my remarks in such a manner as to convey really what I should like to say to the Senate upon this question. The best evidence that the British government can give of their appreciation of the importance of this portion of the empire, is the fact that they select—and as time rolls by they are pursuing that course in a more direct way—the most experienced and influential man that they have in the country to preside over our destinies as Governor General. When we look at the history and the ancestry of the present Governor, we cannot but congratulate the imperial parliament, if I may use that expression, on having made a selection of a gentleman with the practical and statesmanlike qualities that have characterized Lord Grey in the past, and I have no doubt will be continued in the future. Canada has always welcomed her Governors General, never more heartily probably than the present one, and that may arise from very many causes. Canada of late has shown a disposition in all her public acts and through her public men, her statesmen, and those who are not public men or statesmen, and has evinced a desire to knit closer together the mother country and the outlying portions of the empire. What has taken place in the past has convinced the home government that there is a feeling in this portion of the empire of a character that indicates a desire to continue and to unite and cement to a much greater degree than in the past, the empire itself, and the feeling of each portion of the empire individually as well as collectively, and I do not know that any gentleman could have been selected who will fulfil that portion of his duty more acceptably to Canada or to the empire than the present Governor General. I could not even if I felt inclined, follow the line adopted by my hon. friend who moved the address, in the eloquent manner in which he referred to the history of the country, and therefore I shall confine myself to what is contained in the address, and, having said that, the Senate will come to the conclusion that my remarks will be short. The favoured land to which my hon. friend referred so eloquently and its growth and its immigration is beyond doubt. There are many reasons and causes which might be given for the prosperity which exists at the present moment. But I do not deem it at all necessary to occupy the time of the House in referring to them on the present occasion. I am, however, rather surprised at the wording of this portion of the address, when it refers particularly to the immigration which is coming from the United States. Why immigration from the United States was selected so pointedly I am somewhat at a loss to know. There are many reasons which might be advanced why I think it is somewhat objectionable. While the statement in the speech is quite true, what is more gratifying to those who have watched the current of events and the immigration which has taken place from the United States, is the fact that a large portion of those who left Manitoba and the Northwest during the drouth that prevailed there for some years, have learned not only to appreciate the value of that country, but those of British birth or descent have come back to what might be termed their home, not only the older members but the younger ones, and that is one reason why every Canadian will repudiate a feeling that apparently exists from remarks that I have heard made, that this country was to be flooded with Yankees, and by that means the tie that exists between the mother country and Canada would be weakened. I have no such fear. All intelligent men who know anything about the British constitution, its free institutions and the manner in which we are governed, must have learned the fact that we are more liberal and that the people control the government of the country to a much greater extent and more directly than even the republic to the south of us. Immigrants from the United States will learn that when they come to this country they have all the liberty that they enjoyed under the republican form of government, and they will thereby become good citizens and ultimately good loyal subjects of the empire. That is the view I take of this matter from long experience in watching events and studying the character of those who came from the United States years and years ago. We find them just as loyal and just as true to the country as if they were born here or came from the motherland. There is plenty of room in this Dominion, as the address very properly points out, for millions of settlers, and I re-echo the remark of the hon. gentleman who seconded the motion, that there are very few who have travelled over other portions of the globe and studied the character and condition of the people who inhabit other countries and compare them with the people and the prosperity that exists in Canada, but must admit that there is not a country under the sun where the people are more contented or more prosperous or progressive than they are in Canada. The growth of the country has proved that every day. I may not live for many years, but I predict that the population of our northwestern provinces will be quadrupled in my day, and I trust that the time is not far distant when the output of that country will be such as to provide the food supply of the mother country. It is rapidly reaching that point, and when that position is attained, perhaps the objection which exists so strongly in England at the present time among English statesmen, to preferential trade relations between us, will vanish. That cannot be accomplished in a day. It requires time, perseverance and study. It requires certain concessions and give and take trade relations between the two countries before that can be brought about. Confederation proved that. The union began with all kinds of tariffs; different tariff policies in different provinces, and when, as the country grew, the necessity for more money became apparent, every portion of the Dominion acquiesced in the action of the government when they raised the tariff, and the people of the various provinces identified themselves as citizens of one great country. In the same way in the working out of an imperial policy, the people of Great Britain will be willing to surrender certain strong views which they have upon a commercial policy in order to meet the wishes and the feelings of other portions of the empire. You could have no better illustration of that than in the United States, where a diversity of opinion exists to a greater extent in the west and in the east and in the central portion of that country. The tariff which is particularly adapted to one section is not acceptable to the fullest possible extent to another, but they learned as they became blended together that it is necessary for each to make certain concessions in order to make their country prosperous, and such I believe will be the case within the empire in the very near future. So far as the increased trade between Britain and Canada is concerned, I notice in another paragraph that the increase of trade and the increase of revenue is referred to. Just in proportion to the growth of the country and just in proportion to the lowering of the tariff will the imports become greater. I know that there is a difference of opinion about that. If the government intend to reduce the tariff the revenues will continually crawl up, but it will have another effect upon the material industries of the country which I shall very much regret to see brought about. I do not propose, however, to deal with that subject at the present moment, but I would say to my hon. friends opposite that there is no period in a man's life individually, and there is no period in the history of a country, when there is a greater necessity for caution, than in the large expenditures which are entered into on account of the increased volume of revenue at any particular time. It very often occurs with an individual that during a very prosperous period he rushes into extravagance that he afterwards has to suffer for. Countries do precisely the same thing, and unless the government exercise due caution and a more economical policy, the country may find itself in precisely the same position as the individuals to whom I have referred. The next paragraph in the address refers to waters and navigation. I confess I am not fully informed, nor do I understand what is to be accomplished by the invitation which has been given, as indicated in this address, by the President of the United States, that the government of Canada should form a portion of an international commission composed of three representatives from each country to investigate and report upon the condition and the uses of the waters adjacent to the boundary line between the United States and Canada. Whether that is to prevent the destruction of water-power, or whether it is for the purpose of deepening the channels and thereby increasing the facilities for transportation, I am unable to say. Probably the government, when they refer to this question, can inform the House. Neither the mover nor the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne gave us any information upon that point. There are other points which I think should be considered in connection with the water, which are incident to both countries, and that is particularly the preservation of the fisheries.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Here we are expending hundreds of thousands of dollars for the purpose of stocking the waters of the country that belong as much to the United States as to Canada. And yet the destruction that is being made by the United States fishermen nullifies to a very great extent the action and policy of the Canadian government in stocking these waters. I need not point out the different rivers where this state of affairs exists, and unless the United States government —because, I believe it pertains to them and not to the Dominion government—are willing to enter into some agreement for the protection of the fisheries, I think it is time for the Canadian government to stop expending money in stocking the Detroit river and many other rivers that separate the two countries. While we are protecting the fish, United States fishermen are destroying them ; while we are protecting and increasing the product, they are reaping the benefit without any cost to them. The next paragraph is perhaps about the only one—and I do not say that disrespectfully, because the premier in the remarks he made to the House the other day used almost the same expression—that the only important measure indicated in the address is that which proposes to grant provincial autonomy to the Northwest. Those who have given this subject any study will readily admit the difficulties that present themselves in granting the rights which the western provinces are now claiming, and have been claiming for some time. I might, I think, parenthetically say that had it not been for the election which has just taken place, it is a grave question whether we should have had this paragraph in the speech. All who have kept themselves posted on current events know that the demand from the Northwest Territories for provincial autonomy has been denied them over and over again. They were going to the elections upon this question, and in order to head them off, a declaration was made by the premier, or a telegram rather, that if the government were returned to power they were going to grant what the Territories had been asking for for some time. It was well for them that an election was to occur at once, for otherwise this paragraph would not have appeared in the speech. The remarks made by the hon. mover of the address suggest a thought to me in connection with this matter. He referred particularly to the duty of government and parliament. When the French and English came together after the battle on the Plains of Abraham, it was the duty of the government, in all cases of this kind, to remove those questions which arise that create disunion and dissatisfaction between religion and race. I quite concur in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. When the hon. gentleman attempts to make a provision of that kind, I think the same difficulties will present themselves to him as presented themselves to those who have been governing the country since confederation. You may make provision in the statutes to remove every difficulty to which he has called the attention of the House, but, as the country grows and the population is of a different class and of a different character and have different ideas of local self government, then the difficulty arises as it did in the past with Manitoba. There is no use of our hiding the fact that though provision is made in reference to these vexed questions when the Bill is introduced granting provincial autonomy to the Northwest, how it will work out is still in the womb of the future. We know nothing about it. When the Bill is presented to the House we will find the same difficulties arising from that question as have presented themselves in the past. My hon. friends opposite will remember the difficulties in 1874, when the Manitoba constitution was framed and given to Manitoba. It was then thought that no question could arise in the future which would divide the parties and create the dissensions which have since arisen in that province. It is unnecessary to say how the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce voted on that occasion. My impression is that I voted contrary to the vote which he recorded. But in recording that vote, he did exactly what he told us—at least, I think so—would be accomplished, as indicated by the hon. gentleman who moved the address in reply to the speech. I voted the other way at that time. It is not very often that I agreed with what we term the radical element of that day, and in that case I followed the late Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald. However, I am only referring to these things to point out what we may anticipate in granting local government to the Territories: no matter what the intentions may be of the government to-day, there is no telling what twenty years will bring forth. The next paragraph deals with the surveys of the Transcontinental Railway, and we have this promise, or rather it is said:

> It is confidently hoped and believed that tenders for the construction of several sections will be invited during the coming session.

I am at a loss to know how that is to be accomplished. We have no information as to the extent of the surveys which have been made. We know not the character of the country through which this road is to be built. How are you to give out contracts unless you are going to lump them, or to say so much per yard and have specifications of that kind? How is the contractor to be able to bid for his contract? My hon. friend is smiling. I have no doubt he will be able to tell better than I can, because he has had a great deal of experience in it. How can a contractor form his tender or fix his prices until he has seen the country through which the road is to run, and knows the gradients and curvatures and everything connected with it, and where the material is to be procured in order to build the road? However, I suppose this paragraph is based on information supplied by some engineers, and they probably will be able to tell us, or perhaps my hon. friend who will follow me, will be able to give this information to the country. I have seen it stated, however, that there had been a good route found through portions of New Brunswick. Whether it is of the character indicated in the newspaper reports, I am not prepared to say. But there is one point I have noticed, that in order to secure a route which is at all feasible, you will have to go within a very short distance of the line that divides New Brunswick from the State of Maine. I do not understand how my hon. friend, who gave as a reason why he supported the transcontinental road, that it is a military necessity, is going to reconcile that with the views he held and the jingo propensities which evidently characterized him at the time he gave his vote in favour of the project. But we pointed out this fact at the time, and I have no doubt, from all I can learn, that it will prove to be the case, that it will be utterly impossible to get through that country with gradients that will be of any use at all for transportation unless you do go very close to the boundary line. While on the question of transportation, I take this opportunity of expressing my very deep regret at the death of one of the commissioners, Mr. Bertram. I knew the gentleman for many years, and sat with him in parliament twenty-five years ago. I do not believe there was a man in the whole of the Dominion better qualified for the position to which he was appointed, than Mr. Bertram. Politically, Mr. Bertram and I were always opposed to each other in parliament, but his thorough knowledge of the question would have made him, had he lived, a very useful man to the country. I know from those who were intimately acquainted with him, that he was preparing a scheme which I believe would have been of great benefit to the Dominion. I am sorry to say that I do not hold the same opinion of the gentleman who has been appointed to succeed him. He may disappoint me, and he may disappoint others. In my judgment he has not the same ability or knowledge of the subject, and is not so well qualified for the position as Mr. Bertram was. Every one who knew Mr. Bertram will regret his demise.

The St. Louis exposition, I have no doubt, brought to the notice of a large number of people in the United Staes, the advisability of settling in our Northwest. I am very glad to see also that it is proposed to accept the invitation of the government of Belgium to send an exhibit to the international fair to be held in that country. There is a class of people in Belgium who might very profitably be induced to come to Canada, and by a good exhibit of the products of the Dominion showing its agricultural, mineral, timber, and fishing resources, which make a country great, wealthy and prosperous, no doubt we would be able to induce a very desirable class of people to come to Canada, a much more desirable class than many who have been brought to this country in the past.

The reference to the public accounts is a stereotyped expression. We will see, when the estimates come down, what economy we may expect. If we were to judge of the policy of the government by past experiences, I am afraid we shall be sadly disappointed. We have heard promises of the same kind before. We were told in the past that if they should obtain power they would reduce the annual expenditure some three or four million dollars yearly. How that promise has been kept, the Minister of Trade and Commerce can tell us if he thinks proper to discuss the subject. I have not a very vivid imagination, I am rather more practical than imaginative, but I can fancy that hon. gentleman's expressions, had the Conservative party been in power and brought down such estimates as have been presented to parliament for the last three or four years, amounting to an annual expenditure of over sixty millions of dollars. Why the House—I might say the parliament buildings—would have rung with his protests, and you might easily have gone down to the club and stood on the balcony and heard denunciations from him as loud and possibly as honest as one could expect. However, the country grows. I have read with a great deal of interest the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman in Toronto, and was forcibly reminded of another little incident which occurred when Sir Charles Tupper was contesting the elections as head of the government in 1896. Great objection was taken by the 'Globe' and by nearly every Liberal speaker in that campaign, of the use of the personal pronoun 'I' by Sir Charles Tupper. Have any of you read the report of the speech delivered by Sir Richard Cartwright in Toronto lately? If you have, I ask you to count the number of 'I's.' Perhaps you will be surprised when I tell you that in that speech alone there are just 280 capital 'I's.' I counted them twice and marked them all with a black mark. It brought forcibly to my mind the campaign literature that was put before the people of this country, and impressed them with the belief that Sir Charles Tupper had no idea of government or any consideration for anybody except the great 'I.' Great minds run in the same channel, and I take it for granted that both gentlemen had an exalted opinion of their own importance.

There are some points on which I should like to have had information as to the policy of the government. One is with respect to the Halifax dockyard. If newspaper reports are correct, the imperial government has come to the conclusion to withdraw all the imperial forces from Canada and close the naval dockyard. It has also been intimated that it is the intention of the Canadian government to substitute Canadian troops for the regulars who are to be taken away. Perhaps my hon. friend can give us some information on this point. I do not hesitate to say that under all the circumstances I should like to see Canada assume that responsibility. I think it is due to the empire that we should do so. The British navy is to Canadian commerce what an insurance company is to the merchant who insures his goods; it is the protection of our commerce, and while it may not be advisable to go as far as has been demanded by some British statesmen, I think we might safely go to the extent indicated by the press, and assume the responsibility of maintaining a garrison and the dockyard at Halifax. I should like to see also the same system established in different portions of the Dominion that exists in New South Wales. They have training ships, where the waifs of the cities are taken and made first-class sailors of, and as they grow up they are distributed either to the warships or the merchant ships of the country. It is an admirable way of reforming a certain class of boys who have no protection other than that which the law gives them. A training ship in the maritime provinces, one on the lakes and one on the Pacific coast would not cost this country, with its present revenue, more than it could well afford, and would meet to a very great extent the demands which have been made by English statesmen upon Canada.

There is nothing in the address referring to the great question of transportation. Whether that is to be met by the construction of the National Transcontinental Railway I do not know, but if the experience of the past is to be any indication of what we are to expect in the future, the construction of that road will do very little to solve the problem of transportation, for the simple reason that the distance is so great that the cost will, to a very great extent, absorb the profits which otherwise should go to the farmer.

I thought there was to be a tariff commission. There is nothing about that in the speech from the Throne. I have a distinct recollection of hearing, before the change of government, thundering condemnation in the House of Commons of myself and other members of the government because we used to go occasionally into the different manufacturing sections to ascertain for ourselves the requirements of the country and the effect which the tariff had upon the different interests. The present government, notwithstanding the condemnation of their predecessors who tried to acquire that knowledge themselves, indicated last session that they were to have a tariff commission to inquire into the different industries of the country, thereby relieving themselves of the trouble and responsibility of making an inquiry for themselves, and that they would accept the report of the commission. I think my hon. friend, who has had some experience, will come to the conclusion that that report will be just of the character of the minds that have guided them in making the investigation. The high protectionist will come with the statement that the industries are being ruined because the tariff is not high enough. The free trader will say you are bleeding the consumer because you are taxing him so much. If I were to give the hon. gentleman any advice, I would say to him: 'Go and inquire for yourself. As you take the responsibility, 'you should' have the knowledge to enable you to defend whatever position you may assume.' Are we to have that tariff commission? Will the Secretary of State, when he rises to reply, tell us whether it is to be appointed or not; and if so, when and how many sessions are to pass before we are to have a revision of the tariff? Or are we to have any revision at all?

A large sum of money was placed in the estimates last year for a survey of the Georgian Bay canal. What has been done in that respect? I believe there are surveyors on the route. Have they made any report, and if they have, what is the character of that report? What is the probable cost of the construction of that work? Is it to be a ship canal twenty feet deep or only a canal fourteen feet deep? All this information we are entitled to. Then we have that most important of all canals, of which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce heard a good deal some time ago—the Trent Valley canal. During the late elections we had a telegram sent by the premier to Port Hope, indicating to the minister who had been appointed without portfolio—I do not know whether he was ever sworn in—that Port Hope was likely to be the southern terminus of that canal. And then we had a similar declaration on the part of the officials in reference to Trenton being the terminus. The distance between the two places is about forty miles, and the question was whether the outlet of the canal should be the open lake or a Bay of Quinté. Probably my hon. friend will say that was done for election purposes—no, I would not expect him to admit that, but that is what I would say, and very properly so. The project of that canal has been on foot for the last hundred years, and the work has been partially constructed. It has been extended for some distance westward, and as far south as Rice lake, but has never been completed, although a large amount of money has been spent southward and eastward of that point. I do not want to be disrespectful in referring to the actions of the government, but this is one of the little dodges they adopted in order to carry constituencies. I am very glad to know that in this instance it had very little effect upon Port Hope and the county of Durham, as was indicated by the fact that the minister without portfolio was defeated by a respectable majority.

These are points we ought to know something about before we are asked to legislate upon these different questions. The most important, I admit, from a Dominion standpoint, is the question of the withdrawal of the British troops from the country and the substitution of Canadian troops. However, I shall leave that with the government.

I may be permitted to say that while I could not follow, as I should have liked to follow, the remarks of my hon. friend who moved the address, there were one or two points to which he referred in the French version of his speech that he did not mention when he spoke in English, and one of them particularly was increased subsidies to the provinces. I think I am correct in saying that he referred to that subject and that he did not wish the provinces to occupy the position of Lazarus who fed on the crumbs from the rich man's table. My own view of that matter is, and I think you will find it the view of the country, except of those who want it, that the continued application on the part of the provinces for further aid and subsidies from the Dominion to cover their outrageous extravagance will ultimately place the Dominion in an unfortunate position. The provinces should learn to keep within their income and, if it be necessary to make larger expenditures, let them tax the people to obtain the revenue. The Dominion assumes the responsibility altogether of Dominion works, and the money has to be divided for that purpose, but we should not listen to demands from the provinces for larger subsidies to meet their extravagant expenditures. If they cannot keep within their income, let them do as the municipalities do when they incur extraordinary expenditures—provide the money by taxing the people. By direct taxation the people will know how their money is being spent and how to appreciate the governing bodies that impose the taxation.

I am in accord with the hon. gentlemen who hope that this will be a short session. If we are to accept the premier's declaration, we will be through in time to attend the sugaring off of the sugar bushes.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—And get the sugar plum.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We shall all be glad if we can leave in time to partake, as my hon. friend says, of the sugar plums. We had a long session last year—unnecessarily long—and as we have a very meagre bill of fare this time, we should get through as rapidly as possible in order that we may return to our homes and visit the sugar bushes and get the sugar plums to which my hon. friend refers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is very gratifying to my colleagues and myself to hear the complimentary remarks that the hon. gentleman expressed, as a preface to his speech, on the selection of you, Mr. Speaker, to preside in this chamber. I am sure that we all concur in the observations he made that the duties of the office will be discharged with dignity, courtesy and impartiality. Hon. gentlemen, I am sure, concur in the complimentary allusions also that he made on the speeches of the mover and seconder of the address. It is not often that the task alloted to gentlemen in that position has been so well discharged. The hon. gentleman who moved the answer to the speech has been in this chamber now for two or three sessions, and his utterances have always been listened to with very great respect. He addresses the House with a degree of candour and fairness that invariably commends his observations to the just judgment of the House. The hon. gentleman who seconded the address is one who has more recently been introduced into this chamber. He became a member of the Senate towards the end of last session. In the utterances that he has from time to time favoured us with, evidence was given that he was a gentleman of large mental capacity, who speaks with a very great knowledge of the subjects he undertakes to discuss, and who, I feel satisfied, will be regarded as a valuable addition to the members of this chamber.

I have no complaint to make of the observations of my hon. friend in his criticism of the speech. It has been very fairly carried out: perhaps it was because there was so little to challenge criticism. Under our constitutional system of government, the practice has been, in speeches of this kind, to follow the lines of least resistence, to introduce those paragraphs which will create the least controversy, and I think we have succeeded very well in the present speech that His Excellency delivered on Thursday last. The first two paragraphs are those which are personal to His Excellency the Governor General. He came to Canada not as a stranger, having visited us once before, perhaps on two occasions. He came with a full knowledge of the great resources which Canada possesses and with a full knowledge of the loyalty that pervades the Dominion towards the mother country. I was very glad to hear the remarks with which his name was coupled by the various speakers when addressing this chamber, and alluding to his distinguished lineage. They might also have gone further and added that he is one among the peers who have taken the deepest interest in the practical subjects that affect the great body of the people. Anything that tends to the benefit of the people has met with the warmest sympathy of His Excellency.

My hon. friend in commenting on the speech seemed to think that the remark in reference to the settlers from the United States was rather out of place. It was introduced after special consideration. It was one of the four paragraphs that are personal to His Excellency, as will be observed, and was predicated on the assumption that the effect in Europe would be very marked when it is known that settlers from the United States are coming to Canada. In Europe, as we all know, the United States, is very much more widely known than Canada, and is regarded as the happy land for all refugees from the older countries. When it is known abroad that the United States is sending settlers to Canada it will be evidence that there is more to attract the settler in this country than even in the favoured land south of us.

One of the most important paragraphs in the address is the reference to the international waterways. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that interference with the waterways dividing the United States from Canada has frequently been a subject for comment. A few years ago we were considerably exercised over the fact that at Chicago they were building a canal which was diverting the waters of Lake Huron into the Mississippi and taking them on to the Gulf of Mexico instead of discharging them into the St. Lawrence. Commissions of Inquiry were started and remonstrances were sent in, I believe, at the time without effect. Another very important diversion that affects Canada is that east of Sault Ste. Marie, where the waters of the St. Mary's river have been diverted south to what is known as the Hay Channel, a distance of about ten or twelve miles entirely through the United States. Then, again, recently attention has been called to the fact that in the State of Minnesota attempts are being made to divert the waters that are now tributary to Rainy lake and Rainy river to the southward, the object being to construct a water-power with a view to developing electric energy. Then, again, hon. gentlemen will probably remember a few years ago complaints were made that dams were being built on the St. John river before it reached the New Brunswick boundary, disturbing and interfering with the waters that would naturally have their flow through Canadian territory. These are facts which show that we, in Canada, are deeply interested in the preservation of the waters that divide the two countries, and it is very fortunate for us that the proposition for a commission on the present occasion emanates from the United States. Congress at a recent session authorized the president to invite Great Britain, through the Dominion of Canada, to unite in appointing a commission, consisting of three persons on each side, to consider this question of the waterways, and to report on the best method of preserving intact the waters that are common to the two countries. The proposition, under the Act of Congress, was that one of the commissioners should be an officer of the engineers of the United States, another was to be a hydraulic engineer, and a third a lawyer having some knowledge of international law, and the rights of riparian proprietors. We have appointed as our three, Mr. King, who is the geographer of the Department of the Interior, Mr. Coste, who was for a long time engineer of the Public Works Department, and who had been recently employed as a hydraulic engineer in the vicinity of the Welland canal, and Mr. Mabee, of Stratford, Ontario, now of the city of Toronto, a lawyer of some eminence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the Mabee that Sir Oliver Mowat dismissed for being an annexationist ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think so ; he was made a K. C. recently.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That does not make any difference.

Hon. Mr. FULFORD—Myers is the one he dismissed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The next paragraph of the address refers to the proposed autonomy for the Territories. The Bill is now in course of preparation and in due time will be submitted for the consideration of parliament. The subject, of course, is now under discussion. A gentleman who represents the Northwest Territories, that is, the Premier of the Territories, and a member of the government are now in frequent communication with ministers, endeavouring to agree upon a measure, modelled no doubt upon the Manitoba Act, as the conditions are very similar to those that prevail in that province.

My hon. friend made some comments as to the propriety of inviting tenders for the National Transcontinental Railway. Several parties who are entrusted with the survey from Winnipeg to Moncton, have been in the field since the end of October, and it is believed that at all events for a portion—only certain sections—their reports may be sufficiently advanced before the end of the present year. We are now in the middle of January ; we have eleven months to go on, and before the end of the present year tenders may be invited for some of the sections. Hon. gentlemen may rest assured that until a thorough and exhaustive survey has been made and a line has been located that will be all that is hoped for, no premature action will be taken in the granting of any contracts or inviting tenders for the construction of the work. The hon. gentleman asked that the government should convey to him some information as to the Halifax dock yards. My hon. friends know just as much about that subject as we do. Our information is gathered entirely through the press. No positive course has yet been taken, I believe, at Halifax. It is evidently in contemplation. No doubt the government of Canada will be advised in due time and until we are informed what the actual proposal is, and what Canada has been invited to undertake, it would be premature for us to even discuss the subject. No official correspondence has been received that I know. The hon. gentleman thinks that the bill of fare is somewhat meagre. Well, it does seem to me that where the conditions are such as prevail in Canada, with the unexampled prosperity we have had for many years, it would be unwise to disturb it. I am not aware that any particular section of the people are suffering. Certainly the farmers have been enjoying a degree of prosperity quite unequalled in the past. Our merchants are not complaining. They are all doing very much larger business than they ever did before. Even our manufacturers, of whom my hon. friend speaks so frequently, as needing some additional protection, are extending their factories and doubling their output.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Some of them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, 95 per cent of them. Possibly outside of the woollen industry, the evidences of expansion are, of course, self-evident. The very fact that we are exporting now a larger amount of manufactured products than we ever did in the past, is proof that our manufacturers are succeeding. It is quite natural, I presume, that they should ask for further protection. You never knew a manufacturer yet that had sufficient protection ; but they are prospering now even to a greater degree than they did under the national policy. Ask any manufacturer whether his business has not expanded since 1897, since the new tariff came into operation, and he will tell you it has. The evidences are abundant on every side. The facts and figures that one can give afford the most positive evidence that a degree of prosperity has prevailed in Canada in the last seven or eight years that has no parallel in any other country. I have under my hand here the figures that are absolutely unanswerable, which show that the prosperity of Canada is beyond that enjoyed by any other country at any other time. I do not hesitate to say so. I take that as proof that it is better to let well enough alone, and not disturb the present order of things, not to interfere where all sections of the community are prospering so wonderfully as they are to-day. I bring forward evidence that cannot be controverted. Take the savings in our banks ; since 1897 they have actually more than doubled in amount. The savings on deposit with notice and without notice are more than double the amount in 1897. The excess is greater than the accumulation from the time of confederation down to 1897, which is a startling statement to make—that in the long period from confederation down the accumulations in the banks were not equal to the increased accumulations during the last seven or eight years. The aggregate trade has more than doubled in the last seven or eight years. What other country in the world can present a statement of that kind ? The exports have doubled. The imports have run up from $118,000,000 to $259,000,000. The duty paid has increased from $20,000,000 to $40,000,000 ; everything has practically doubled, giving all the evidence of extraordinary growth of wealth with all classes of the community. No one can say that the farming population are not in a better condition than they ever were before. That is quite evident, and if all classes are enjoying that extraordinary prosperity, why should any fiscal changes be made ? The hon. gentleman has alluded to the proposition to issue a commission. Something was said about it, but it was quite impossible at the time the announcement was made that anything of the kind could have been attempted before the meeting of parliament, because any commission that is appointed will necessarily cover a good deal of time, and it would have been quite impossible that any practical result could have been presented at the present session. Now, another reason why the bill of fare is practically meagre is that during the sessions of 1903-4 there were more public measures passed by parliament than in any four sessions since confederation. The public Acts alone in those two years covered between seven hundred and eight hundred pages. So that I think we have rather an excess of legislation in past years, and the country is not really requiring any additional legislation. The hon. gentleman has not pointed out any industry that is suffering that we could help. It is quite true that he could name industries which would make more money if they had a higher tariff, but they would only represent a mere fraction of the community ; three or four per cent, and what would the other 97 per cent say to it ? It is to be presumed that our legislation should be for the largest number—the greatest good to the greatest number. That is a principle we ought all to recognize, and when Canada is prosperous, as the evidence that prevails about us shows, it seems to me rather unwise and indiscreet to check or disturb the present condition. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman foreshadow a short session. We have had several long sessions of late, and I think hon. members on both sides of the House will be gratified to know that this has a promise of being a short session. All the returns of parliament will shortly be in the possession of parliament, and it is to be hoped that no time will be lost in pushing the affairs through to an early end.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the House adjourns, could the hon. Secretary of State inform us when he intends to bring down the answers to the motions that were made a year ago, and two years ago, for the return giving the names of the crews in the 'Arctic' and in the 'Neptune,' and all the correspondence. One motion was made last session and the other the previous session?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will endeavour to revive the memories of the gentlemen whose duty it is to furnish those returns. I was not aware that the returns were in arrears. I shall let the hon. gentleman know about them at an early date.

THE STRIKING COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I respectfully suggest that when the hon. gentleman moves for a committee to be appointed to name the standing committees, he substitute the name of Sir John Carling for mine, as I shall not be here. I propose going west this afternoon and may not be back when the motion is made. The hon. gentleman might make the motion now with the consent of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then I will move that the committee be appointed now, substituting the name of Sir John Carling for that of Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the motion is adopted, I shall for the third time call the attention of the hon. leader of the government to certain facts. We have now 81 Senators—in fact we have 83. The province of Ontario is represented by 24 members, Quebec 24, the maritime provinces 24, and the remainder come from the west, comprising Manitoba, the Northwest Territories, and British Columbia 9—now 11. In the list of names proposed to-day, the province of Quebec is represented by one member of the 24 from that province in this House. The different provinces of the Northwest Territories, represented by 11 senators, have three members on the committee, the province of Ontario 2, the maritime provinces 3. But there are two in Nova Scotia and none in New Brunswick. I ask the hon. leader of the government to do justice to the different provinces. The province of Quebec should have two members at least, like the province of Ontario, and if the hon. gentleman wants to give a larger proportion to the provinces of the west we have no objection. But I think, in all fairness, the representation should be adjusted differently. Last year the hon. minister made that motion. I objected to it, and he was good enough to meet the objection by striking out one or two names, giving a fairer representation to the province of Quebec. I suggest that the Hon. Mr. Beique be named in the place of Mr. Power. The province of Nova Scotia has two representatives, Hon. Mr. Miller and the Hon. Mr. Poirier. Mr. Power was added to the list because the present Speaker having been appointed to the chair, his place was taken by the Speaker of last year. That might do from one point of view, but not from another, because it is doing an injustice to the province of Quebec. I suggest that the list be further amended by striking out the names of the Hon. Mr. Power and the Hon. Mr. Watson, because there are three members from the Northwest, and substitute the names of the Hon. Mr. Beique and the Hon. Mr. Ellis. I am asking in all fairness to the province of Quebec for a better distribution of members on the striking committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had not heard any fault found with the striking committee last year. I understood they performed their duties fairly well, and to-day I counted the number of gentlemen from Quebec and Ontario, on the important committee, the Railway Committee, and I found each of those provinces had fourteen on that committee. I had not been aware that there would be any criticism on the composition of the committee and I should prefer leaving it as it is. The Hon. Mr. Power has left the chamber. If he were here I should ask him to withdraw. If it is the feeling of the House to substitute the Hon. Mr. Beique for the Hon. Mr. Power, I should be glad to do it. Mr. Power having been one of the oldest members of the House and Speaker for the last four years, it naturally occurred to me to change places and put the Hon. Mr. Power on the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You are giving to Nova Scotia the place belonging to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well I did not consider that. I thought the nine gentlemen named would act fairly. It has not been pointed out in the past that they acted unfairly. In order to convince myself I took the trouble to count the number last year on the Railway Committee, and found fourteen from each province. We might make the one change if the House desires it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Substitute the Hon. Mr. Beique for Hon. Mr. Power and Hon. Mr. Ellis in place of Hon. Mr. Watson.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Hon. Mr. Watson has been an active member of that committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Well there are three members from the Northwest. However, if we cannot get the full loaf, let us take a half a loaf. So the hon. gentleman will substitute the name of the Hon. Mr. Beique for that of the Hon. Mr. Power.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

FIRST REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN, from the Committee of Selection, presented their first report: He said—As we contemplate an adjournment to-morrow or the next day, I presume there is no objection to the adoption of this report to-day. I might state that we have a second report from the Committee of Selection recommending that the Committee on Banking and Commerce shall be increased by two additional members, and the Committee on Railways, by five additional members. That report will be presented, and, I hope, adopted also, to-day. I thought it was only right to make that explanation in view of the fact that I am asking that the House adopt the first report without objection in order that the committees may meet, appoint their chairmen and get ready for work before the House adjourns.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN presented the second report of the Committee of Selection and moved that the rules be suspended.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved that the report be now adopted

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to move against the adoption of the report but I wish to express the feeling that the committees which are named are already too large. As it is now, the Committee on Railways is composed practically of two-thirds of the members of the House. The object of sending any measure to a committee is that it shall receive that careful and detailed consideration which it could not have in a large body like the House; and when the committee is enlarged to the degree to which it is now proposed to enlarge the committee it is practically almost the House itself dealing with the matter which has been referred to the committee. I wish to express the view that the change is not a desirable one, and that the Committee on Railways is already too large. In former years when that committee numbered thirty or thirty-five members, the members of the committee sat around the table and did business in the business-like way in which the directors of a railway or an insurance company or other business organizations do business, but with a committee of fifty it is impossible to do that; and every hon. gentleman who wishes to make no matter how small a comment on the matter before the committee, is obliged to stand up and make a speech. When that is the case we know that business does not advance with the rapidity with which it ought to advance, and it practically comes to this, that in order to secure careful consideration for any bill which is before the committee, the measure must be referred to a sub-committee; and to call the Railway Committee a committee is merely a misnomer.

The motion was agreed to.

DISPOSITION OF ROOMS TO SENATORS.

MOTION

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

That the disposition of the rooms attached to the Senate Chamber to members having no rooms, be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, when constituted, for allotment to senators, without report.

He said : If this resolution meets with the approbation of the House, I shall move it now. It is necessary that the control should be somewhere. The Contingent Committee are a representative body, and they can select three or five gentlemen who will make the necessary arangements for those members of the Senate for whom no provision has been made up to the present time. I presume it will be a direction to the committee that hon. gentlemen who are already in their rooms will not be disturbed. It is not the intention to interfere with them.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Before the motion is adopted I think the House will agree with me that it ought to be made a little broader, because I think arrangements could be made by a sensible committee in the allotment of rooms that would be agreeable to all honourable gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it is necessary to make any change in the resolution. I have no doubt when the committee go to work they will find no difficulty in making arrangements for senators who have no rooms without disturbing senators who have rooms, unless the senators who have rooms are willing to go elsewhere, and if a change is made with the consent of the senators who now occupy places in the rooms, there is no necessity for any authority from the House.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—If I may be permitted I would suggest that the matter be referred to the hon. Speaker of the House. He is the proper authority.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the suggestion made by my hon. friend is a very good one.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—There is no use appointing a committee if you do not give them power to re-arrange.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I do not think the motion of the hon. leader of the House should be disturbed, because it refers the matter to the committee and they will appoint a sub-committee to deal with it. Why should we ask the hon. Speaker to do the work we should do for ourselves ?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I think it would be better to let the resolution go as it has been prepared, and if it cannot be arranged the committee can come back for instruction.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I move that the words 'to members having no rooms' be struck out.

The amendment was lost.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We should be willing to trust the committee with the management of the affair and let them make a disposition of the rooms which would be agreeable to all.

The motion was adopted.

PRAYERS IN THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved :

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to consist of the Honourable Messieurs Templeman, De Boucherville, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G., Lougheed, Robertson, and the mover, to confer with His Honour the Speaker respecting the prayers to be used at the opening of the Senate.

He said : When the former prayer book was given to the Senate, I believe the intention of the committee who selected the prayers was that the hon. Speaker might select from time to time some of the prayers that the book contained. I do not think it was ever mentioned that the whole of them should be read, and my idea is that certain portions of them should be read occasionally —have them varied and not have them all read every day.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I should like to call attention to the fact that although the prayers are largely taken from the Church of England prayer book, there is not a member of the Church of England on the committee.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—With the consent of the House, I will add the name of the hon. gentleman from Rothesay.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the resolution is adopted, I should like a little further explanation than the hon. senator has given. To what does he object ? Is it to the length of the prayer or simply to the sentiment contained therein ? If it is simply to the length of the prayer, I do not know that it would make much difference whether we prayed five minutes or three minutes. I do not think it is proper to ask for a change in the prayers. They have done very well in the past few years and they will do for the coming years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think since my hon. friend's party has come into power we should say long prayers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I presume the names of hon. gentlemen have been inserted in this motion because they are regarded in some way as expert in this matter Therefore it would be perhaps interesting to know what experience they have had in the framing of prayers.

The motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :

That a special committee be appointed to consider and revise and if deemed necessary to add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceeding of the Senate, and that such committee consist of His Honour the Speaker and the Honourable Messieurs Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Miller, Ferguson, Lougheed, Young, Tessier, Ellis, Béique, Kerr (Toronto), and the mover ; with power to report from time to time.

He said : The rules under which the Senate now does business have been in existence for about eleven years, and, as is very generally the case, experience has shown that certain changes are needed. That is a thing which happens even in the most conservative body. In the House of Lords, after whom our proceedings are modelled, there are occasional changes in the rules. Those changes may be rendered necessary from two causes. One cause is that when the rules come to be put into practical operation it may be found that there is some doubt as to the meaning of a rule, and that has been the case, as hon. gentlemen know, with more than one of our rules. It is necessary that the exact meaning of the rules should be made clear. Another reason for altering the rules is that circumstances change. The volume of business, the methods of transacting business, have all changed somewhat during the past few years. Hon. gentlemen should recognize the fact that it is desirable that our rules should be revised. I do not need to labour that at all; and in making this motion, I have followed the precedent established in 1894, when the hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition led the House. I have practically adopted the wording of his resolution, and I have also inserted in the resolution the names of all those gentlemen now in this House who were on the committee which was appointed on the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition. The committee is the same in number as the committee which the hon. gentleman moved for, and the names are as far as practicable, also the same. Of course there has been such a very marked change in the personnel of the Senate during the last eleven years, that it has been necessary to insert several new names. I may say that these names have not been inserted haphazard, but the effort has been to insert the names of gentlemen who have experience and who have devoted particular attention to the subject of our rules.

The SPEAKER — Before putting the motion, I should like to draw attention to the fact that the name of the Speaker appears among the names of members of the committee. As the increasing of the powers of the Speaker may be discussed, I thought it proper that the Speaker should not be on that committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Speaker is more interested in the rules than almost any one else.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I have the honour to move in amendment that the names of Senator David and Senator Landry be added to those mentioned in the motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no objection.

The SPEAKER—Then the motion should read with those two names added.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Is it the intention that this committee shall have power to make additions to the Rules, Orders, Forms, &c., and that that will be a final decision ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no ; the report of the committee has to be adopted by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. JONES—As I read the motion that appears to be the intention. They are to report what they do; but they are herein given power, it appears to me, 'to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary to add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceedings of the Senate.' That would seem to take it away from the Senate.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The procedure will be that they will have to report to the House, and then the House will have to be specially convened to consider the report. Special notice must be given.

The motion as amended was adopted.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been usual, after the committees have been struck and are ready for work to take an adjournment. There has been a very generally expressed wish on the part of the Senate that the adjournment should be about the average length of adjournments on occasions of this kind. I therefore give notice that I shall move to-morrow that when this House adjourns it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, February 8.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think I express the sentiments of the majority of the House when I say that the adjournment should be early in the session and as long as possible, to suit the convenience of those who live a long distance from the Capital. I would therefore suggest that the adjournment be for three weeks from Tuesday next. There is not much work before parliament this session, and the session is likely to last until some time in May.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If this is to be a short session we surely cannot adjourn for a whole month, because that is practically what the hon. gentleman's suggestion means. I cannot go beyond the time I have mentioned.

The Senate adjourned.

THE COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

FIRST REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG from the Committee on Standing Orders presented their first report. He said: I move that this report be now received.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have now the reports of the organization of all the standing committees of the House except the joint committees. I have no observation to make further than to congratulate hon. members of this House from Quebec and from Manitoba on the somewhat fair distribution of the chairmanships of the various committees that they have made between themselves, to the exclusion of all the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the report is adopted, I should like to know if there was a quorum at the meeting of the Standing Orders Committee?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Supposed to be.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know, as a matter of fact, if there was really a quorum of that committee? Is the hon. gentleman from Killarney chairman of that committtee? Is the report signed by the chairman?

THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know on what authority? Could the hon. gentleman give us an explanation?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I will leave that to the other members, who are present, to speak for themselves.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not giving an answer. This House should know if that committee sat this morning—if there was a regular meeting of the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No, they adjourned until two o'clock for want of a quorum. They did not sit this morning.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (A) for the relief of Edward Albert Murphy.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Monday the 13th of February at three o'clock.

He said: After the House rose last evening a number of senators from both sides of the House called upon me and said that the time fixed for the meeting again after the adjournment, the 8th of February, was rather inconvenient for them, and they thought the time might be altered. The gentlemen embracing this deputation were chiefly from the maritime provinces and the western country, and they suggested that if when the House adjourns to-morrow it would stand adjourned to Monday, the 13th of February, that time would suit the largest number, and I presume, as this is the only long adjournment the House will have, it is advisable to make the change.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SEAT OF HON. RUFUS CURRY.

ORDER POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called:

That the report of the Clerk of the Senate, respecting the absence of the Honourable Mr. Rufus Curry, during two consecutive sessions of parliament, be referred to the committee appointed to consider the order and customs of the House and the privileges of parliament, the committee to meet——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the order be discharged, and that it be placed on the order paper for the 20th of February. He said: Mr. Fielding will have returned by that time, and I wish to see him on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY SURVEY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WOOD moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the table of the Senate the reports of the surveyors employed on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway upon that portion of the line between Quebec and Moncton.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are really no reports available. The surveys so far are purely exploratory, and no reports of them have been presented by the commission. Under the statute authorizing the commission to act, they are not bound to furnish reports to parliament except at dates fixed by the statute, but in any case there are really no reports available that could be called complete reports. So I am advised by the chairman of the commission.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am induced to make this motion from having seen reports in the press. The fullest report I have seen was in a Toronto paper, January 4, in which it was positively stated that the construction commission had announced that they are satisfied they can get a maximum grade of four-tenths of one per cent going east, and six-tenths of one per cent going west, and that from Quebec to Halifax it is possible to build a railway with gradients equal to those on the New York Central. If the commission is in a position to make a positive statement of that kind, the government should have information which ought to be supplied to parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no authority for any statement of the kind. No reports have come to the government. I never heard of that report. Of course, we do not take any notice of the various comments that are made in the press. No reports have come to the government from the commission, and the chairman of the commission, when the notice was put on the paper, advised me that they have nothing they can really present.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—As this is a technical matter, I may explain that it is quite common, when surveys are being made——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that the answer of the government ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I was simply giving an explanation for the benefit of the hon. gentleman opposite, and I do not think he will take any objection to my remarks. When surveys are being carried on, it is customary for surveyors to say verbally that they are finding good grades, that the road is easy, and so on. We have seen that in all the surveys going on, and it would be very difficult to keep surveyors or engineers from mentioning the grades that they are actually getting. I heard myself from some of the engineers that they were getting the grades that were called for by the specifications in regard to the profiles of the Grand Trunk Pacific road. It is really wonderful that they should get those grades, because we all know that in the past, grades of not less than 50 feet to the mile and so on have been obtainable ; but we must remember that things have changed considerably of late, and that we do not hesitate now in making very deep cutting to secure a proper grade. I am informed, for instance, that the Canadian Pacific Railway in building a railway from Sudbury towards Toronto are making a cut some 75 feet in depth for quite a distance, something over half a mile, just to obtain satisfactory grades. Such a thing as that was unheard of before. It is quite possible that the reporter of the 'Globe' or of the 'News' heard from these engineers. But I cannot understand that there can be any official report through the government until the exploratory surveys have been completed, and the actual location of the line is being made. What I understand is being done is simply preliminary surveys to find out where the line should pass. When it is decided where the line is likely to pass, then it will be for the commission to decide which of the routes will be adopted, and a location will be made and the final report presented to the government.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I quite understand the position the hon. gentleman takes, and I agree with his remarks. Yet, as he himself says, it is quite possible for engineers when they are making their exploratory survey to get very definite information with regard to the character of the line that can be obtained, and from the very positive way in which it is asserted in the papers that this information is available, I assume, of course, there is something in it. I do not wish to unduly press the matter, but I should like to know if I understand the hon. Secretary of State correctly in saying that the commission are not prepared, with the information before them, to make a statement such as appears in the public press ? There are some other statements that I intended to call attention to, one of which reads as follows :—

At the risk of hurting the feelings of our fellow Canadians of that province I must transcribe the remarks of more than one authority, 'The people of New Brunswick do not know their own province.'

They describe the interior of the province as abounding in good timber and good tracts of agricultural land, and this statement is given in quotation marks as coming from one of the high authorities who are carrying on this survey. I certainly felt it very desirable that the representatives of the province of New Brunswick, both in this chamber and in the House of Commons, should at the earliest opportunity be informed as they have not the knowledge now, as this article assumes, of the physical features and also the agricultural resources of the province from which they come. The statement that a line could be found having the grades which are referred to in this article came, I confess, as a surprise to me, and I would like to know whether the statement of the government is to the effect that they have not the information, or that the commission has not information at the present time which justifies them in making a statement of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought I was very explicit. I said the government had no information whatever on the subject, and that on application to the commission they said any surveys that they had made were purely exploratory. After that statement I think the hon. gentleman should have been satisfied that the statements of the government ought to be accepted rather than those of opposition newspapers.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am quite willing to accept the statement of the government. I only wish to understand if the hon. gentleman can give me the information. If he cannot give the information of course I must accept his statement. I think he has not quite appreciated my question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I thoroughly understood it. I said we really had no information on the subject.

REPORT OF MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS.

INQUIRY DROPPED.

The Order of the Day being called :

That he will inquire whether the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals for the year ending the 30th June, 1903, has been published in the usual book form ?

Why there are no copies in the Library available for reference ?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have since putting the question on the order paper received a blue-book giving the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals of last year, through the courtesy of the hon. Secretary of State, and this answers all my purposes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer was that it was distributed just in the ordinary way at the proper time. I have no doubt a copy was available for the hon. gentleman at the distribution office. The department sent the usual number to the Library. It so happened that they were all out.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—There are none to be found there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent the hon. gentleman a copy of it myself.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes.

The motion was dropped.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the House adjourns, as we are to be absent for a few weeks, would the hon. Secretary of State be kind enough to press that matter to which I drew his attention in reference to returns I asked for last year and the year before ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman will send me a letter, at his leisure, calling attention to the particular returns so that I can make the inquiry I shall be very glad to do so.

The Senate adjourned, until Monday, the 13th February, at 3 p.m.

MURPHY DIVORCE CASE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their third report, re Bill (A) An Act for the relief of Edward Albert Murphy, and moved its adoption.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. gentleman tell us where the parties are from before he makes this motion ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Mrs. Murphy cannot be found.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I should like to say that the respondent in this case has evidently skipped out. It was shown before the committee that she had been traced. Efforts were made to bring her here and it was found she had left one point with her paramour and had gone to a foreign country. She was traced from hotel to hotel, and finally lost track of altogether, so that personal service was impossible. Every effort has been made, apparently, that could be made to reach her by mailing notices to her father and mother and brothers, and at the address where she formerly lived and other addresses where she had subsequently moved to. It was apparent to the committee that every possible effort had been made to effect service.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What I want to know is whether the petitioner, and the father, mother and sisters of the respondent that have been mentioned, are of the province of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia or the Northwest ?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—They reside in various parts of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know where the petitioner is living ?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—In the city of Montreal, I understand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Lost.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Can they not get a divorce if they live there ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They are too honest to get a divorce down there.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

INQUIRIES AND MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE rose to inquire of the government :

1. Has the Mutual Reserve Life Association under section 6, Chap. 101, 4 Edward VII., filed with the Superintendent of Insurance a certified schedule setting forth the following particulars, in respect of each policy to which this Act applies :—Number of the policy, name, address and occupation of the assured, date of issue of policy, age of assured at a date of issue, amount insured, total assessment premiums paid, average annual assessment premium, amount of each option, amount of cash dividend, amount of bonds addition which such cash dividend will secure, and the amount of annual reduction of premium which such cash dividend will secure, provided the renewable term policy mentioned in paragraph (c) of section 3 of this Act is chosen.

2. If so, when was the certified schedule filed with the Superintendent of Insurance ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To the first paragraph the answer is yes. To the second, on November 5th, 1904.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE rose to inquire of the government :

1. Did the Mutual Reserve Life Association, of New York, make application under section 2, Chap. 101, 4 Edward VII., which section reads as follows :—

In lieu of the license now held under 'The Insurance Act,' the company shall be entitled, on making application therefor within three months from the passing of this Act, to receive under section 4 of the said Act, which license shall enable the company to enter in Canada into contracts of life insurance with fixed and definite premiums, and the company shall, except as hereinafter provided from the date of the said license, possess and enjoy all the rights and powers and be subject to all the liabilities enacted by 'The Insurance Act' with respect to life insurance companies licensed under section 4 of the said Act.

2. If they made application, what was the date of the application ?

3. If such license was granted, what was the date of such license ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the first question is yes ; to the second, November 2nd, 1904 ; to the third, November 5th, 1904.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing :—

1. Under section 6, Chap. 101, Edward VII., the details of policies filed with the Superintendent of Insurance in certified schedule.

2. The last return made by the Mutual Reserve Life Association, of New York, made up to 31st December, 1904.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am informed by the Superintendent of Insurance that this information is regarded as confidential, and is not given out. The company object to do so, but even if it were allowed, it would be many months before the information could be obtained. Entries would have to be made on three hundred and eighty sheets like the one which I now hold in my hand, and it would take a year to prepare the return.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Perhaps my hon. friend will let this motion stand for a day, and I will think it over, because I shall have something to say on the subject.

The motion was allowed to stand.

IMPORTS OF ALUMINUM.

INQUIRY AND MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE rose to inquire of the government:

Whether it is aware that aluminum pigs produced in Canada are shipped to the United States and there manufactured into wire and other articles and re-imported into Canada free of import duty?

Also, if the government are aware wire and other articles exported from Canada into the United States pay 13 cents per pound duty—$260 per ton?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government is not aware that articles manufactured in the United States from aluminum pigs produced in Canada are imported into Canada free of import duty, except as provided in the customs tariff. Item 476 of the customs tariff, 1897, provides for the free importation of the following goods, viz.:—

Aluminum in ingots, blocks or bars, strips, sheets or plates; alumina and chloride of aluminum, or chloralum, sulphate of alumina and alum cake; and alum in bulk only, ground or unground.

The origin of aluminum used in the manufacture of articles exported from the United States to Canada (except German) is not shown in the entries at the custom-house in Canada. According to the Tariff Act, 1897, the customs duties on aluminum, when imported into the United States, appear to be as follows:—

172. Aluminum, and alloys of any kind in which aluminum is the component material of chief value, in crude form, eight cents per pound; in plates, sheets, bars, and rods, thirteen cents per pond.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing:—

Imports of aluminum in pigs or ingots into Canada.

Imports of aluminum into wire, sheets or any other form.

Imports of oxide of aluminum.

Imports of alumina.

Quantities by weight-values.

Countries imported from, and ports of entry in Canada, and what countries the production of.

Exports of aluminum in pigs or ingots.

Exports of aluminum in any form, manufactured.

What countries exported to, and ports of shipment in Canada.

Quantities by weight-value.

For the years 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, to end of year 1904.

He said: If the leader of the House would consent, I should like to change this motion and confine it to the year 1904. I find that last year a return was brought down to the end of 1903, and I should like to have the motion apply to 1904 only.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection.

The motion was amended as suggested, and agreed to.

THE MINISTERIAL CRISIS IN 1896.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct attention to an incident which recently transpired elsewhere, and which, at the present moment, is engaging public attention. It relates to one of the gravest political events that ever occurred in the history of this country. Public opinion seems to be divided on the subject. Statements have been made which may not have conveyed all the truth, and it is in the public interest that all the facts connected with such an important event should be made public, so that the future historian may be in a position to give an impartial account of the ministerial crisis which preceded the change of government. I cannot say whether the statements made in another place convey all the truth, but there is on the floor of this hon. House an hon. gentleman who was Prime Minister at the time, who should be in a position to give a full account of all the facts as they occurred. The event to which I refer is the upheaval in the Dominion cabinet which occurred in the beginning of the year 1896, when seven members of the government of that day resigned and kept parliament in a state of anxiety for several days. We in this chamber are all well acquainted with what transpired on that occasion, and it is not for the purpose of furnishing information for members of the Senate, but to place all the facts on record for future reference. If it is possible for the hon. leader of the opposition to make a statement in regard to that event, probably one of the most important that ever occurred in our history, I trust that he will avail himself of this occasion to do so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think that history is beginning to get a little old.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We want the true statement.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to recall recent facts, and ask the hon. Speaker of this House if he would be kind enough to give us news of the crisis going on today in the province of Quebec. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman went down to Quebec as the Speaker of this House to restore peace and harmony in the ranks of the faithful in Quebec, and if he had been asked to do so by my hon. friend from Repentigny. These are facts which are actually occurring, and I think we would be more interested in an explanation concerning them than a statement of events which occurred eight or nine years ago.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Too soon to write the history.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The old facts we all know, but the new facts we do not, and if the hon. Speaker would be good enough, he might tell us if he could report progress and ask leave to go down there again.

The SPEAKER—I may satisfy my hon. friend by telling him that I was never offered any mission to that effect, nor did I ever accept such a mission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must admit that, from my long parliamentary knowledge, it is something extraordinary to ask a ministerial explanation of an event which occurred eight or nine years ago. However, I can assure the hon. gentleman who brought this matter before the Senate to-day, that the matter is now under the serious consideration of the ex-Prime Minister of this country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the question is put, I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that there are two ex-Prime Ministers, himself and Sir Charles Tupper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He is not here.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—But the facts should appear properly on the record.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman had reference to myself.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, exactly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was myself that was attacked and not Sir Charles Tupper, and when I referred to the ex-Premier, I referred to myself, and not to Sir Charles Tupper.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF MILITIA ORDERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Choquette, inquired of the Government:—

1. Whether the government has caused, or is going to cause, to be translated into French, for the use of officers of the militia, speaking the French language, the regulations for the militia ?

2. If such translation has been made, when will it be distributed ?

3. If it has not been made, when will it be made ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Regulations and Orders, 1904, are now being translated into French. The translation will be ready to send to the printer by the end of the month.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the Hon. Secretary of State why those regulations have not been printed in the French language in the 'Canada Gazette?' The English version was printed in the 'Canada Gazette' about October 1st, and I do not see why the French translation was not also printed in the same way. Could the Hon. Secretary of State tell us why that was not done?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer I gave just now was that they were being translated at the present time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not answering the question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is. They are only being translated now. I know nothing of it. It is in the Department of Militia.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But usually in the Official Gazette the matter printed in English is translated into French and published, if not in the same number, in a subsequent number. But that has not been done in this case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume the translation would rest with the Department of Militia, and it is the fault of that department that the translation has not been completed in time. The Bureau will translate any ordinary short notice, but it is not usual to translate any long paper.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Perhaps they were short of French type.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no translating office in the Bureau.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the answer of the Hon. Secretary of State does not hold good in the case of the translation made in the regulations of the Marine Department. There were thirty or forty cases in which regulations were printed in English and in the following number they appeared in French. That was not done in the case of the Militia Regulations.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume the Marine Department had the translation prepared. I know nothing about it. It does not come under my notice in any way.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (C) An Act for the relief of Clara Bidwell McDermott.—(Hon. Mr. Young).

RESIGNATION OF MR. BLAIR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER rose to make the following inquiry :

If the Prime Minister of Canada, when, on the 18th of October last, he wired the following reply to Honourable Mr. Blair's telegram of resignation as chairman of the Railway Commission: 'Your resignation comes to me as a surprise, but, of course, I cannot at present offer any observations on the same,' was aware that there stood on the docket a large number of cases tried and heard and awaiting the decision of board ?

Whether the committee of the Privy Council was aware of it, when, on the 31st day of October, they recommended to the Governor General that Mr. Blair's resignation be accepted ?

If they knew that a great many cases were pending and awaiting adjudication, did they urge upon Mr. Blair to clean his slate before retiring, as they did, e.g., in the case of Judge Killam, late of the Supreme Court ?

How many cases were there pending when Mr. Blair's resignation was thus accepted ?

How many will have to be heard and tried over again ?

What member of the Railway Commission is it that stayed at home, instead of accompanying the board, on the western tour last summer, and thereby helped to bring about the state of confusion that now exists, to the great detriment of litigants, in that important branch of the Civil Service ?

He said : Hon. gentlemen will remember that two years ago we spent considerable time elaborately preparing and discussing the Railway Bill introduced by the government, in order that it might prove effective in the settlement of disputes with railways, and the conclusion that parliament and the country arrived at was that the measure was a good one, and that it was made necessary by the increasing disputes that were arising and are still arising throughout the country between railway companies and other corporations. That Bill was introduced by the then Minister of Railways, the Hon. Mr. Blair. After it had become law, for reasons that are public, the Hon. Mr. Blair, having ceased to be Minister of Railways, was appointed chairman of that very important commission. At that time, as we are all aware, there were criticisms with reference to the propriety of Mr. Blair being appointed chairman of that commission, because he had taken a hostile attitude towards the government. I for one found no fault with the appointment of Mr. Blair. He had a right to step out of the ministry if the measures adopted by the cabinet were not, in his judgment, good measures, and I could find nothing wrong in his old colleagues appointing him to that position, especially after the premier had declared, and with truth, I believe, that there was no man in Canada more competent to fill that position. Mr. Blair had himself prepared the Act creating the position which he was appointed to fill, knowing its importance and the obligations and responsibilities connected with it; but hardly a year had elapsed after his appointment to the lucrative position—the pay of the chairman being ten thousand dollars a year, making him the highest paid official in the land, not excepting the premier himself—when, like a bolt from a blue sky, he sent the following telegram to the premier, dated October 18, 1904 :

To Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Uxbridge, Ont.

I have decided to retire from the commission, and am sending resignation to His Excellency this afternoon. An opportunity offered of greatly bettering my position, which had to be accepted or rejected at once, and I did not feel my position had been so attractive that I should refuse the opportunity. I may add that beyond possibly reaffirming my objection to the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme it is not my present purpose to re-enter or take part in public life or affairs.

A. G. BLAIR.

It will be seen from this telegram that Mr. Blair resigned his position on the commission for the purpose of accepting a more lucrative place. That is the only reason he assigned for his sudden resignation, and we will take his word for it, that it is the only reason. There could have been no objection to his action if at that very time there had not been a great number of cases which had been argued and were ready for judgment. Mr. Blair did not seem to be concerned at all about the effect of his resignation on those cases ; he simply had before him the bettering of his own position. The resignation came during the turmoil of a general election, and the premier, taken, no doubt, by surprise, answered as follows :

Your resignation comes to me as a surprise, but, of course, I cannot at present offer any observations on the same.

This reply is what we might expect from a prudent man. We know our premier very seldom commits himself. At all events, this answer, under the circumstances, is the one that might have been expected from him on that occasion. The premier could not then have pressed upon Mr. Blair to delay his resignation, as such action on his part might have been interpreted as showing fear that Mr. Blair, as was thought then, might take an active part in the campaign. That answer of the premier, sent the same day that he received the telegram is, to my mind, sufficiently reasonable ; but later on, at the end of the month, the council officially accepted Mr. Blair's resignation, after having had a couple of weeks to think over it, and inquire what effect it would have. I find no effort was made by the council to see that those cases to which I have referred, and which were ready for judgment, should be decided before Mr. Blair's resignation was accepted. Mr. Blair seemed to have only one object in view while occupying the position of chairman of the commission, namely, to be on the lookout to find a more lucrative position. As chairman of the commission, the relations between Mr. Blair and the government were those of servant and employer, and it strikes me that it was the duty of the government to have reminded Mr. Blair of the duties of his office and to have urged and insisted on him completing his work before resigning, or to have refused to accept his resignation. By accepting Mr. Blair's resignation at that time without having made any effort whatsoever to see that his sudden departure caused no suffering to those who had cases before the commission, in my estimation the government endorsed Mr. Blair's action and rendered themselves liable, morally at least, to those who are suffering by Mr. Blair's resignation.

Another question is whether the Railway Committee of the Privy Council was aware of all this. The government must have been aware, and if not, it was their duty to be informed. The main question, to my mind, is how many cases were pending when Mr. Blair's resignation was thus accepted. I understand that there are in fact a large number of cases standing which have been tried at very heavy expense to the litigants. Hon. gentlemen know what it costs to have those railway questions tried. The evidence is very extensive. The charges of the solicitors are generally from $50 per day upwards. I understand those cases will have to be heard over again. It is not the fault of the litigants. They acted in good faith, believing that the Railway Commission was not a delusion and a fraud, that the persons appointed commissioners at high salaries were there to perform duties, and not to be on the look out for better positions. They proceeded in good faith. They spent considerable money, and now they are made to suffer. I wish to ask the government how many of those cases are now standing for judgment? One of the causes that led to this confusion, if I am well informed, is the fact that one of the three commissioners absented himself, making it possible for this state of confusion to arise. According to the Act, two of the commissioners make a quorum. Two can render a decision. Last summer, in order to work according to the spirit of the Act, the commission, under the power conferred by the Act, sat outside of Ottawa. They took a long trip to the west. The three commissioners should have been on duty and should have heard the cases, because it is always possible that an accident may occur, that one of the commissioners might die or be overwhelmed by the spirit of resignation, or might have left, as he actually did leave, the office from high political kicking or otherwise. It was, therefore, the duty of the three commissioners to be on hand discharging the duties for which they were paid. The Act provides for that. Section 13 of the Railway Act says:

> The commissioners shall devote the whole of their time to the performance of their duties under this Act.

Section 16 further says:

> The commissioners shall sit at such times and conduct their proceedings in such manner as may seem to them most convenient for the speedy despatch of business. They may —as in this Act mentioned sit either together or separately, and either in private or in open court, but any complaint made to them shall, on the application of any party to the complaint, be heard and determined in open court. Any two members of the board shall constitute a quorum.

I find that one of the commissioners thought it more convenient to stay at home, not for one or two or three days, which might be well understood and which might be excused, but for the whole tour, no doubt being careful to draw his monthly or semi-monthly salary. He stayed at home while the other two were touring, with the result, as I say, that, one of the other two having resigned, many cases will have to be heard over again. I do not know whether the Minister of Railways was aware that one of the commissioners absented himself from his duties. I do not know whether the commissioners require to ask permission from anybody when they adopt such a course, but if not they should, because it makes no difference from a moral point of view whether a man receives $500 or $8,000 a year, he is bound to perform his duty as an official. We remember the old story which says that the man who takes a loaf of bread is sent to jail; the man who creates a trust and makes millions out of it, is a great financier; the man, like Napoleon, who sweeps away and steals provinces, is a great hero. That principle does not apply and should not apply to civil servants. Those that draw high salaries should be bound to perform their duty just as strictly as those that draw small salaries. Without desiring to throw more blame than I should, I wish to draw the attention of the House and the country, and especially the attention of the government, to the fact, which is patent, that there is something loose in the Railway Commission. I expect the hon. minister to answer these questions seriatim.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has proved to my mind that he knows a great deal more about the subject than I do, and I presume his object has been served by calling the attention of the country to what he regards as omissions of duty on the part of members of the board. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when the Bill was before this House I took very strong grounds against the large and wide powers that were given to those commissioners. I was overruled in my view, however. Hon. gentlemen will recollect the conference between the two Houses and it was thought best that the Railway Commissioners should be an absolutely independent tribunal, independent of any member of the government, independent of every one except the two Houses of parliament, who by an address could probably take some action on the subject. The hon. gentleman has referred to them as members of the civil service. They are in no sense members of the civil service. They are not under any government control and, so far as Mr. Blair's resignation is concerned, it would be an extraordinary proceeding for the government to have refused to accept it. His desire to resign was manifested in very many different ways. He first resigned by telegram to Sir Wilfrid at a period when the members of the government were absent from the city. He then sent a resignation to His Excellency, Lord Minto, who was then Governor General, and finally sent an official resignation to me, which I referred to the Privy Council, and at the first meeting of the Privy Council it was duly accepted. There was no other course open to them. They had no way of talking to Mr. Blair and telling him that he should turn in and perform special duties. It is a new doctrine, to my mind, that you can refuse to accept a judge's resignation if certain duties have not been performed. It is a mere matter of taste on his part. Parliament is no doubt possessed of authority to take some action, or express some opinion on the subject, but so far as the resignation was concerned, that had to be accepted when he pressed it on the government.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Do I understand the government was obliged to accept that resignation, that they could not refuse it as in the case of an employee ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What was the object of refusing to accept it ?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The great moral object.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Blair at a meeting of the board, with the reporters present, said he had resigned the office and then walked out of the room. I am not aware that any mandamus could be issued to compel Mr. Blair to go back again. It would be a very extraordinary position. In regard to the minor questions, I have no information on the subject. If it is very important to acquire it I will write to the secretary of the board. I think the commissioners are absent from the city at present. They leave no record here. They are their own masters. They move about as they please, and hear cases when and as they like.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—If I am permitted, I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Railway Commission is perfectly independent of the government and of the administration. I certainly do not give that interpretation to the Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under what department is it ?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I would understand that it is under the Minister of Railways and Canals. At all events, there is the fact that the resignation of Mr. Blair was formally accepted by the council some fifteen days after it had been tendered, which goes to show that that process was necessary to free Mr. Blair altogether. I would understand the situation differently. If I have a foreman or an employee that has been entrusted to do a certain thing, and he stops before his work is done, I would insist upon him completing the work and then, if he refused to do the work, I would put myself right by not consenting to the resignation, by simply dismissing him. Then I would make myself right before the public, but by simply accepting the situation my inference is that the government have assumed the moral responsibility at least—and there is more than the moral responsibility—of Mr. Blair's sudden resignation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I deny that altogether. The resignation would have been accepted at once if the members of the government had been here. The hon. gentleman knows very well the resignation was tendered during the Dominion elections, between nomination and polling, and if it was not accepted at once it was simply because no quorum of the council happened to be in Ottawa. It would have been accepted at the time—in fact I considered, when it was sent to me, and to His Excellency, and to the premier, that practically he had resigned and the office was vacant.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not strictly in order, perhaps, although it has been the practice in this House to discuss questions, but there is one point in the series of questions asked by the hon. gentleman from Acadie to which no reference has been made by the hon. minister, and it is really, to my mind, the most important question which has been asked and one with which I think it may be the duty of parliament to deal. The question is if they, the government, knew that a great many cases were pending and awaiting adjudication. Now if it is a fact, as intimated by the hon. gentleman from Acadie, that there were a number of cases in which evidence had been taken and arguments heard pro and con which had not yet been decided and which may, under present conditions, have to be tried over again, it might be the duty of parliament to provide, during the present session, such legislation as would enable the present commissioners to deal with these cases upon the evidence already taken and the arguments already heard. It does seem to me that it would be rather hard and unfair to oblige the litigants to try these cases over again. I assume it is the intention of the government to provide some means by which the arguments and evidence already heard may be utilized before the commission as at present constituted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the government propose to submit any legislation for the purpose. The parties that had furnished evidence and had argued their cases before the board asked whether they were willing to allow them to be decided after Judge Killam's appointment—whether he would be permitted to read the arguments and the evidence which had been printed and on that to render a decision. I am simply speaking from what has appeared in the public press. I have no official information on the subject, but I understand that some parties have agreed. Others may not agree. It just depends on the action of the parties themselves. There is no way of compelling them to do it.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—One of the questions was as to the cases in which evidence had been heard, but no judgment rendered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite unable to give an answer. It depends on the litigants themselves. I understand—and probably the hon. gentleman has seen the observation in the newspapers—when the full board met they intimated to council that there were a number of cases which had been heard, the evidence had been printed and the argument had been also printed, and they were asked 'are you willing that Judge Killam shall give his opinion?' I presume it is only in those cases in which the other two commissioners were divided in opinion. If they concurred in their views that ended the case. It was only in those cases where there was a division of opinion that the proposition was made. The litigants were asked if they were willing that Judge Killam should give his judgment on the particular points raised. I understand in some cases they accepted the proposition, in others they may not have. I am not speaking now from any authority, but simply from the reports I have seen in the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the government get that information?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No better than any other gentleman can. If it is very important I can write to the secretary, and I presume he will furnish it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not a reply to my question. I asked if the government can get the information?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Only by writing to the secretary.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not care what way the government get it. I ask can they get the information? If they can, I do not see why this House is not to be supplied with the information it calls for. It is a very curious state of affairs when a member of this House asks a question and the leader of the House replies that he cannot get the information sought.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it is any part of my duty to find out from the secretary the position of those cases, because I do not know where the secretary is to be found. He is absent from Ottawa, at all events on some tour in the west, and I do not know his post office address.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If we had the position occupied by the hon. member we would know in twenty-four hours.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am just now informed where the gentleman is to be found and I will communicate with him. I will send the questions and ask him to answer them.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I was told that nearly one hundred cases were left undecided when Mr. Blair resigned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will find from the secretary the cases that were left over and the disposition made of them.

COPPER COINAGE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE inquired :

If the attention of the government has been called to the following extract from the public newspapers :—

Copper Money Discarded.

Copper money in France is being gradually replaced this year by aluminum bronze pennies of a pale yellow colour.

If so, will it take into consideration replacing the copper coinage of Canada by a similar metal ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The attention of the government has not been called to it. It has never been under discussion in any way.

PRODUCTION OF ALUMINUM IN CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

For the appointment of a select committee of five to be composed of—

The Honourable Boucher de Boucherville, M. D., C.M.G., the Honourable Michael Sullivan, M.D., the Honourable William Cameron Edwards, the Honourable J. H. Wilson, M.D., and the mover, to inquire into the production of anhydrous alumina and aluminum in Canada. With power to employ stenographer, to have such report printed and with leave to report from time to time.

He said : I do not desire at this stage to say much on the subject, but when the report is presented, hope to be able to show to this honourable house that it is a most important industry, a growing industry, and if prosecuted in Canada would be a most important one ; it is imported largely into India, Japan and the East. The metal is now imported into Canada from the United States, free of duty, whilst the customs tariff in the United States is 13 cents per pound or $260 per ton. The present production of the world is in round numbers 9,000 tons per annum, about half of which is manufactured in Europe and the other half in the United States ; under present quotations of 33 cents per pound $660 per ton, the value of the industry is $5,940,000 per annum. It is produced out of clay by the aid of electricity. It enters into many articles used on account of its beauty, lightness and strength ; in wire it is a conductor of electricity and its electrical conductivity is as ·60 (decimal sixty) to one of copper and it is a cheaper wire. The cable from Shawenegan Falls to Montreal, some 78 miles, is made of aluminum. The wire is largely used in the United States and elsewhere for telegraphic purposes. To within a short period it has been a monopoly as the patents of Hereault in Europe, now expired, and Pittsburg Deduction Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., patents, with only a short time to run, controlled the output and prices. With a reduction in price it will be such a competitor with copper for wire, that the production must be largely increased, in fact no limit to it. In Canada no patents exist and with our large and many water-powers, Canada has a great field to explore in the production of this metal.

The committee will involve only the trifling expense of a stenographer and printing the report, and I therefore trust honourable gentlemen will see no reason to refuse the request for a committee to examine into so important a question. I may say that this clay exists all over the world. It is to be found in the township of Hull, opposite this city, perhaps not as strong as we would like to get it. By bringing this subject prominently before the country and to the notice of scientists we may find clay in other parts of Canada which would enable us to develop this industry. I do not wish to put the House to any great expense, but in such an important matter I am justified in asking a committee of scientific men to look into the question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What would be the real object of appointing a special committee ?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—To discover the difference between alumina and aluminum.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—There is very little known in either House on the subject, there are so few scientists in either chamber, and I think this will be the means of bringing the matter prominently before the public. We are endeavouring in every way possible to build up Canada, constructing canals, railways and all sorts of works, and here we have an industry existing elsewhere which if looked into might be established in Canada and become one of our most important industries. The committee could collect information and make such a report as would put it on record and serve as a guide to people in exploring for this clay and developing the industry, whether the development be by means of the water-powers of the Ottawa or Niagara, or anywhere else. It is a question which could be looked into without incurring any great expense.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the special committee devise means of separating the aluminum from the alumina, or what will it accomplish?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The special committe will merely look into the matter and see how it stands in relation to the possibilities of developing the industry in Canada. When the report comes in I will make further explanations and show that large orders are ready to be placed in Canada now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For alumina ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Alumina is the cleaned up clay : aluminum is the product after the application of electricity.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—If there is to be any money spent in a matter of such importance to the hon. gentleman, it would be well to appoint a member of the geological survey staff to make an examination of the different clays and report the result to the House. How is a committee of this House to find witnesses and take evidence without incurring considerable expense ? I have no doubt the testimony in some cases might be very conflicting. Where would the committee find expert witnesses ? Are we to undertake the task of developing new industries at the expense of parliament ? If knowledge is required for the benefit of hon. gentlemen with a view to establishing a new industry, the most economical way to go about it is to appoint some official of the government to investigate and report to the House. I think that would meet the requirements the hon. gentleman has in view.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I do not think the hon. gentleman understands the question.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I do not think the hon. gentleman understands it himself.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. member is quite a kicker.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I repudiate that statement in toto. I am always able, however, to defend myself in this House and out of it, but I am sure the hon. gentleman must allow that other members of this House besides himself have opinions of their own. I for one have some, and I have never failed to express myself when a matter is up for discussion, and I do not think it is fair for the hon. gentleman to say that I do not understand the question.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I wish the hon. gentleman would explain something that he does understand.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is because I know nothing about this question that I am arguing that some one who does know something about it should give the information to this House, and that I oppose the appointment of a fishing committee to get information which probably is already in the possession of some of our departments ; because I want to say for the civil service of Canada that we have very many able experts in the service of the government, and probably if some of these gentlemen were applied to, my hon. friend would get all the information he desires on the subject. I do not think it is a matter to be dealt with by this House. I for one, if appointed to that committee, would feel that I was quite incompetent to get witnesses or find information of such a scientific nature as my hon. frend has in view. There cannot be any results from appointing a committee except to spend money, and I for one object to that, and have a right to state my objection. If we want to get knowledge that will be of some use, not only to the members of this House, but to the people of Canada, then it is our duty, as legislators, to put the thing in a practical shape by seeking information from gentlemen whose scientific attainments, whose business ability, and research and judgment would be of some benefit to the public; but to appoint a committee for the sole purpose of gathering information about something that some hon. gentleman, or some of his friends, want to procure for some particular reason wholly apart from the public standpoint, is something on which this House ought to go slow, and I for one would certainly object to the appointment of a commission for the purpose of getting information for any hon. gentleman or any gentleman's private business. If this House wants information there are ways of getting it, and it is a proper thing for the government to do, if it meets with the views of this House, to appoint some expert having technical and practical knowledge to procure this information which my hon. friend so much desires. That is perhaps the most economical and conclusive way of procuring the information.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend lashed himself into a fury before there was any attack. I said nothing ungentlemanly, nothing unfriendly; I showed that this was a matter in the interest of Canada, and not a matter of personal interest. My hon. friend says that some members rise in this House and act from personal motives; what personal motive could I have in this matter? Are you going to impute something of the kind to me because I am not advocating the building of a bridge, or the awarding of a railway contract? Is there any thing more personal in this? I cannot see it. I rose courteously, as I thought, to explain what I wanted, but the hon. gentleman hardly understood me. This has nothing to do with geology, nothing to do with lime kilns, nothing to do with getting out stone—it is simply the science of transmitting clay, cleaned up by electricity and the help of carbon and a flux, into the beautiful metal aluminum. Why attack me as the mover of this resolution on personal grounds? Why take up the defence of the government and talk about the vast expense of this inquiry? I am willing to strike my pencil through the paragraph authorizing the employment of a stenographer and the printing of a report, and to confine myself simply to asking for the appointment of these gentlemen to serve on this committee, for they are sufficiently interested in the subject from what they have read and heard of this new industry that the world is taking up. Did not Canada send Dr. Haanel to Europe to investigate and report upon the reduction of metals by the means of electricity, having in view the great water-powers we possess on the St. Lawrence, the Ottawa and other rivers? I only ask that I may have a committee appointed to consist of gentlemen of scientific ability to look into and report upon this new industry, and yet the hon. gentleman finds fault because of the expense it will involve. Expense? Here we are meeting day after day and doing nothing. Last month we had to adjourn for three weeks because there was nothing on the order paper, and to-day we have decided to adjourn until next Tuesday for the same reason. By taking up such questions as this we might be doing some useful business. We could show to the country that we have ideas of progress. The hon. gentleman says he would not serve on the committee. I was very careful not to ask him to serve. I picked out gentlemen of modern ideas, who could consider and discuss the question intelligently, because they had been educated in chemistry. I asked Mr. Edwards to act because he is an expert in water-power and electricity. Then there is the mover. I have been in communication with the government and with India, Japan and other countries trying to get evidence which would be conducive to the success of this industry, and I thought it would be only fair for me, if instead of boring this House as some of my hon. friends claim to have a right to do, we could get together and discuss this matter and present a report which would show that Canada is watching what is going on and is alive to the importance of this great industry. That is why I move to place these gentlemen on the committee because I am well satisfied they will consider the matter from the standpoint of science and not from the standpoint of talking and airing their knowledge. The knowledge these gentlemen possess of chemistry and their knowledge of the whole subject would enable them to discuss the matter scientifically. I do not see what harm I have done, but my hon. friend has thought fit to make what I consider a personal attack on myself. I cannot look at it otherwise. I spoke to two ministers of the Crown before putting this on the paper. I do not see where this is going to hurt the hon. gentleman, but as he feels that it will, with the permission of the House I have been asked to move the adjournment of the debate for the reason that some hon. gentlemen who wish to speak on this subject have gone to Montreal to-night. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the motion is postponed, I should like to call the attention of the leader of the government to the powers asked for by this committee. It is unusual to give such powers as are here demanded. The motion reads :

> With power to employ a stenographer, to have such report printed and with leave to report from time to time.

And after it is printed it is to come before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The latter part will have to be struck out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know what the policy of the government is on this question, but I am very much inclined to agree with the hon. member from Lincoln. It seems to me that all this information might be acquired without going to this expense. If the government, however, have come to the conclusion to grant the committee, I would suggest that the words 'to have such report printed and with leave' be struck out, and that it read 'with power to employ stenographers and to report from time to time,' and if the report be of such a character as to justify printing it, then the House can decide.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When my hon. friend spoke to me yesterday I consented to the formation of the committee on the distinct understanding that it was to be attended with no expense. He asked for a stenographer, and I said : 'Provided it is not going to occupy any great length of time.' There must be a limitation to the time, because I think it very improper to name a committee of that kind, more particularly if this industry has been at all developed, as my hon. friend informed us to-day it has been. When the subject was brought to my notice I understood it was entirely a new industry. But the hon. gentleman to-day has shown that it is not. He said they were using it between Montreal and the Shawenegan power house, and I think he has named two or three other industries. If it is becoming a commercial industry, I cannot see what purpose the Senate should have calling the attention of the public to it, because the public are aware of it, and if it has those advantages my hon. friend has described, this action on the part of the Senate would be superfluous. But we can discuss that matter later on.

The motion was allowed to stand.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (D) An Act to amend the Railway Act of 1903 as regards the free transportation of senators and members of the House of Commons.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (A) An Act for the relief of Edward Albert Murphy.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

MOUNTED POLICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (8) An Act to amend the Mounted Police Act, 1894. He said : This Bill consists of one clause, and the object of it is to increase the pay of the Mounted Police Force, commencing with the Commissioner of Police, and all through the various ranks. The pay has not been increased since 1894, and the object of the Bill is to authorize the government, if they see fit, if the persons deserve it, to increase the pay up to the limit fixed in the Bill. I may say the salary of the Commissioner of Police at present is $2,600 and has been at that figure since 1894. By this Bill there is an increase of $400 authorized. The pay of the Assistant Commissioner at present is $1,600 ; the increase would bring it up to $2,000 ; the superintendent's is increased from $1,400 to $1,800, and so on through the list as hon. gentlemen will see. We are all aware that the force has been of very great service. It is an exceptionally fine body of men, and encomiums have come in from all directions, more particularly from the new settlers who have gone into the districts, especially from the Yukon, expressing their appreciation of the very great service rendered by the police force. About two-thirds of them are in the Northwest, scattered over a very large number of stations, and the remaining third are in the Yukon Territory. The salaries of various officials, not only in the civil service, but, as we all know, in commercial services, has been increased since the year 1894.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the government consider this a money Bill ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I assume it is a money Bill. It increases the pay of the force. It was introduced by resolution in the House of Commons with the approval of the Governor General in the ordinary form, as money Bills are. Any further explanation that may be required will be given in committee.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Do those men get rations in addition ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Non-commissioned officers receive one and a quarter a day, and constables receive one dollar and working artisans 75 cents a day. Can men possibly be got for wages like that ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh yes, Chinamen.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I see there are some offices provided for. Taking the Bill as a Bill, I fancy it is not open to objection. It is a general raise in the pay of the first seven officers of $400 per annum; is it not ? You give the Commissioner of Police $3,000 instead of $2,600 and $400 is added to the salary of the superintendents and inspectors and one or two are allowed to remain at the salaries provided for by the present law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Only one I think.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Four staff sergeants $2 per day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the only case where there is not an increase. All the others are increased.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The others are increased 25 cents per day. What is the difference between the ordinary policeman and a special constable and scouts ? I see that is an additional office added to the list.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They get an addition of 25 cents under this Bill. Their present pay is 75 cents a day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But they are not provided for under the old Bill at all. There is no such clause in the old Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—There appears to be an inconsistency in the scale of wages paid. For instance take the surgeons and their assistants, they receive $1,800 equally. Now, the question in my mind is whether the assistants should be placed upon an equality with the surgeons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No they are not under that head. The government are authorized to pay. It is permissive.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We know what permissive means when it comes to an appointment of surgeons and doctors in the service. They will be sure to stipulate that they get the utmost farthing. I think the constables are not getting as much as they ought to get. If the non-commissioned officers are to receive $1.25 a day and constables $1 a day, they will occupy a similar position to the non-commissioned officers. I do not think—to revert back again to the surgeons and the assistants—that they should be placed on an equality. I think the assistant surgeons should have a less amount per year than the surgeons, and therefore when the Bill comes before the committee we will be in a position to point out where they are doing what I conceive to be an injustice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before we reach the committee stage, might I ask my hon. friend to ascertain if the working pay of artisans is something extra that is paid to the constable, provided the constable be an artisan ? Does he receive a dollar a day and the 75 cents additional ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I fancy there must be some distinction of that kind drawn.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It seems to me if the hon. gentleman will look at the Bill he will see that the non-commissioned officers are receiving $1.25 a day and the constables 75 cents a day. The constables are receiving a much larger amount than the non-commissioned officers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The artisans employed by the force are invariably constables, and the information I desire to have is whether the constables who are artisans are paid 75 cents a day in addition to the dollar a day which is allowed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It does not say so in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will find out.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Unquestionably the Northwest Mounted Police have rendered a very valuable service to Canada for many years. We did look forward hopefully some years ago to a reduction in the number and the expense connected with the maintenance of that force. However, it has not been possible under existing conditions to make any such reduction. No doubt there are two conditions that contribute very largely to its expense. In the first place, I presume, having such an enormous stretch of territory bordering on the United States through which a large amount of smuggling could be carried on if it were not for the Mounted Police, is one reason why they will continue to be a necessity for some years. Then the development of the Yukon district necessitated a certain percentage of them being sent out there to perform services which were unquestionably required in the opening up of that country. I do not know that we can look forward hopefully to a very serious reduction in the strength of that force. When we come to consider the enormous influx of all kinds of people that will probably take place in connection with the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Northwest Mounted Police will have very important and onerous duties devolving upon them in looking after the interests of the country and preserving peace and order. I do not know that it was necessary in the inception of that corps to have gone to the very large expense that was incurred in connection with buildings and training places and riding schools. At Regina a very large amount of money was spent, I think perhaps more than was necessary. However, take it all in all, the appointment of the Northwest Mounted Police was no mistake. I agree that it was necessary, but we have spent a very large amount of money in connection with it. Some years ago I used to devote considerable time to the investigation of expenditures in connection with the Northwest Mounted Police which I did not think were justifiable, but I presume that extravagance will reign no matter who rules. It is almost an impossibility to prevent it upon some lines. Now, with regard to the pay of the force, I fancy the government have carefully looked into the matter—no doubt they have—before submitting a Bill to increase the pay, and after due and careful consideration they have decided that some additional amount should be allowed to those officers, and under those circumstances I do not see that we can do otherwise than acquiesce in what the government have considered it their duty to do. Unquestionably we have a right to be proud of the Northwest Mounted Police. They have discharged an admirable service to the country ever since the Territories became part of Canada, and they are discharging an important duty to-day. From time to time we read of incidents connected with the Northwest Mounted Police that show they are a corps of men that perform trying and arduous duties. They are subjected to severe experiences. They have to go enormous distances from settlement and civilization in order to follow up and bring to justice offenders who should be punished. The Northwest Mounted Police are to be admired, and while the service costs the country something, after all I think it is well that the force should be retained until the country becomes so much settled that we can dispense with their services, and I am afraid a great many of us will be out of this chamber before the day will arrive when we will be able to dispense with the services of the Northwest Mounted Police, particularly in the matter of putting a stop to smuggling. I have no doubt the government have carefully weighed the whole question with regard to the expense of the corps and the services they render and the remuneration they receive, and after having done so have decided to recommend to parliament that this increase should be made. For my part I am quite willing to acquiesce in the course adopted by the government.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Before the House adjourns, I wish to say that a meeting of the Committee on the Printing of Parliament has been called by the chairman of the House of Commons to-morrow, and I think we should arrange to sit to-morrow, even though the House is to adjourn.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House can grant leave to the committee to sit notwithstanding the adjournment of the House.

The SPEAKER—Is a motion necessary ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. The motion will be that the members of the joint committee on the Printing of Parliament be authorized to sit though the House be adjourned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before this motion is put, I should like to ask whether the committee has met and organized ?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Upon what authority did that committee meet to organize before any report was made to the Senate of the position of the committee ? It is only just now that a memorandum or a notice from the House of Commons to those who are to form part of the committee is laid before this House.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—As far as I am personally concerned, I do not know anything about it. The secretary of the committee called a meeting in the ordinary course of events for the purpose of organization and the committee met in response to the call made by the secretary of the committee on Wednesday morning and they appointed Mr. Chas. Parmelee chairman, and it is only a meeting for organization. The committee was asked to adjourn until ten o'clock to-morrow morning. There was nothing done except the appointment of the chairman. There is no report from the committee yet.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That does not meet the point I raise. By what authority could those senators who form part of that committee meet with a body of which the Senate had received no notice.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Was this not reported to the House along with the other committees when the standing committees were struck and reported to the House ? The committee was appointed and named as a part of the Senate committees, the same as the Railway Committee or the other committees, and so far as the committees are concerned, they have a perfect right to attend the meeting which has been called just the same as any other committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But my hon. friend did not draw the distinction. The committee appointed by this House may have reported, but they could not report the names of those who had been appointed by the House of Commons. It is evident to my mind that the committee has met without the proper authority. It is an irregularity. I do not know that any harm is done by it, but still I think it is one of those irregularities which should not be permitted.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Would it not be well to have a special committee appointed to inquire into this irregularity? The members of the committee as far as I know were called together by the secretary of the committee in good faith. In all the other committees of which I have had the honour to be a member we have been called together in the same way, and I am sure that if the hon. gentleman will refer to the records of the House he will see that the names of those forming the committee were read. There is no other course to be taken except that the secretary calls the committee together. The committee could not have been called before on account of the adjournment of the Senate and it was the first day that the committee could possibly have been called together. I should like to ask my hon. friend who has the authority to call a committee together.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the point. No committee could be appointed and organized until it has been reported to the House, and there is no analogy between the reporting of committees which are composed exclusively of members of this House and a joint committee composed of members of both Houses. It is only within the last ten minutes that we have had any report to this House of the members who compose the committee in the Commons, and yet that committee has met and appointed a chairman. I do not object to that, but certainly there cannot be any legal or properly appointed committee. That is all I wish to say.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR WARK'S 101ST BIRTHDAY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the House adjourns, my attention has been called to the fact that a centenarian who belongs to this chamber, Senator Wark, will celebrate his 101st birthday on Sunday next, and I ask the House to authorize the Speaker to send a telegram congratulating him on the anniversary of his birthday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I cordially concur in the suggestion made, and the Hon. Speaker can act for the whole of us. Under the circumstances I think it is well that it should be done and I hope we may have the pleasure of seeing him before the end of the session.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday 21st inst. at 3 o'clock.

MOUNTED POLICE ACT, 1894, AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 8) An Act to amend the Mounted Police Act, 1894.

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause one repeals section 14 of the Act passed in 1894, which fixed the pay for the force. It is now proposed to grant certain increases. It is proposed to authorize the Governor in Council from time to time to increase the pay of the Commissioner of Police from $2,600 to $3,000 per annum. I may say that the commissioner has been on the force since the year 1882, and for an officer having the responsibility he has, the allowance is not very serious.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—What is the name of the present incumbent of the office?

The CHAIRMAN—Perry.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The assistant commissioner's salary will be increased from $1,600 to $2,000, the superintendent's from $1,400 to $1,800, the inspector's from $1,000 to $1,400, the surgeon's and assistant surgeon's, from $1,400 to $1,800, the veterinary surgeon's from $1,000 to $1,400. There are four staff sergeants at present who are paid $2 a day. There are a number who are paid only $1.50 and it is proposed to increase the pay of the latter from $1.50 to $1.75. The other non-commissioned officers are raised from $1.50 to $1.75 and the constables from 75 cents to $1 a day.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Do those men receive rations in addition to their pay?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is that 75 cents in addition to the other pay for an artisan?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think that requires some explanation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been found exceedingly difficult to get capable men even at the increased figures. Up in the Yukon Territory, where blacksmiths can earn $4 a day, it is hard to get them for $1.75. In some instances the extra men belong to the force, and in other cases special men are engaged for the time, just depending upon the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This 75 cents would be extra pay?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Does my hon. friend say this includes board and lodging?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Do they not get clothing?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is absurd as it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I understood the hon. senator to ask was this: If there is a mechanic who is a member of the force and is employed as an artisan in the blacksmith shop, or wagon shop, or at any other mechanical work, does he receive the 75 cents per day in addition to his pay as a policeman?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He receives some addition, depending altogether on his position.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This says 75 cents.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the maximum.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The word 'extra' ought to follow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is understood.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are artisans, I am told by Mr. White, who are not members of the force. There are others who are from time to time employed according to the pressure of work, who get an extra amount besides their pay.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It surely cannot apply to artisans who are not members of the force, because as my hon. friend intimated a moment ago, you could not possibly get an artisan, particularly in the Northwest, for 75 cents a day when we pay artisans $2 or $3 a day here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My remark applied to the Yukon, where the wages are exceedingly high. They are not nearly as high in the Territories.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the question which has just been asked, hon. gentlemen will observe that this Bill applies only to members of the force. The Governor in Council may from time to time fix the sums to be paid the members of the force, so the pay to working artisans means extra pay to members of the force.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It should say extra.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He gets his pay as a constable and this pay in addition.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What positions do the surgeons and assistant surgeons occupy?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a discrimination between them. The surgeon gets a larger amount than the assistants. I see in the civil service list there is one surgeon and there are several assistant surgeons. I notice the surgeon, according to a recent pay-list, got $1,400, Dr. Fraser, assistant surgeon, got $1,000, Dr. Bell got $1,200, Dr. Thompson got $1,400, Dr. Madore got $1,000, so they are paid, I presume, according to the service.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But in this Bill they all get the same figure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, that is the maximum allowed, just as in the former Act.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—There ought to be something more definite. If the assistant surgeons may have the maximum, it is very likely they will insist upon the maximum being paid, and whereas the surgeon would get $1,800, you have the assistant surgeons having their salaries increased thereby increasing the expenditure of the force very materially. Now, it would be the proper thing to do to follow the same rule, it strikes me, that was followed before—to fix a definite amount to be paid for the assistants as well as for the chief surgeon, and then we would know what amount we had to pay. True it is optional under this Bill, but you will always have the assistant surgeons haggling for an increase to the full amount the surgeon receives, and it seems to me if you have one surgeon who is to receive a certain amount of salary, and the assistants receiving smaller amounts, you are going to put them in a position to continually ask for the maximum salary. It would be better to have a fixed amount.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the regular service there is a marked difference between the pay of a surgeon and the pay of an assistant surgeon. Of course it depends on the length of service, The surgeon was appointed in July, 1887, then the first assistant surgeon, Dr. Fraser, was appointed in 1889. He gets $1,000. The assistant surgeons do not all receive the same pay.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But they may.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They may, but the salaries of the officials have to be allotted from time to time according to the opinion of the commander of the force. It depends on the duties they have to perform, on the strength of the detachment and a variety of circumstances. We cannot lay down any hard and fast rule here. There must be some latitude. Latitude has always prevailed and I do not think it ought to be changed now.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I noticed, when I was up there, a number of officers living in houses by themselves. How do you regulate the board under such circumstances ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They get their regular rations.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

THE MORTALITY FROM TUBERCULOSIS.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Notice of Motion being called :

That in the opinion of the Senate the time has arrived when parliament should take some active steps to lessen the widespread suffering and the great mortality among the people of Canada, caused by the various forms of tuberculosis.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS said : This matter is one of very great importance to the people of Canada, and it is desirable that it should be fully discussed when it comes before the Senate. I think it desirable, therefore, that it should stand for two weeks, and I ask permission of the House to let it stand over for that time.

The motion was allowed to stand.

IMPERIAL POSTAL CHARGES.

RESOLUTION.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND rose to—Call the attention of the Senate to certain anomalies in the postal charges and move the following resolution :—

That the attention of the government be directed to the local, foreign and imperial postal charges with the view of remedying certain inequalities therein, and the Senate affirms the principle that the conveyance of letters, newspapers, books, periodicals, &c., should be at a lower scale of charges within the empire than at the time ruling with any foreign country.

He said : In rising to propose this resolution, I would deprecate in advance any feeling of tediousness, because the facts which I purpose placing before the Senate will certainly involve some figures. I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible, and not enter upon a general review of the postal charges in this and other countries. I desire to draw the attention of this House to one or two of the prevailing charges between this country and the United States and the United Kingdom and to show, if it is possible to do so—as I think you will agree it is—that there are very wide and serious discrepancies between the rates current under those conditions. Take for example the rates on letters. In Canada two cents per ounce is the current rate for the conveyance of letters all over, both in this country and in the United States, while to England and the empire two cents covers only half an ounce ; in other words, the rate is double that charged on letters to the United States. My resolution calls for an expression of the opinion of this honourable House that the rates within the empire should be lower than those at the time ruling with any foreign country. I have mentioned the discrepancy in reference to letters. The same discrepancy exists with regard to post cards. In Canada and to the United States they are conveyed for one cent each, while to England and the empire generally the rate is two cents, again double. But the most serious discrepancy occurs in the postage rates for newspapers, magazines and periodicals, which Canada conveys to England at the rate of ½ cent per pound, while the rate from England to Canada is no less than eight cents per pound, and the rate from the United States to Canada is one cent per pound. It is difficult to imagine on what principle the imperial government goes in charging a rate of eight cents per pound. It is in itself a monstrous rate, equivalent to $175 per ton. In these days of cheap conveyance such a rate is absolutely unjustifiable. It is quite true that mails from the United Kingdom have to cross the ocean, but it is equally true that the cost of conveyance across the ocean is much less than land conveyance, and if you take the extent of the United States and of Canada itself, if a rate of one cent per pound covers the cost of the land carriage, there is certainly something seriously wrong in charging eight cents per pound for conveying the mails across the ocean only. So much is it the fact that ocean conveyance is cheaper than land conveyance, that I have seen it stated, and I fully believe it, that in the province of Ulster, Ireland, they find the cheapest way to send the produce of the north of Ireland to London is to ship it to New York and back again. The charge of eight cents per pound is totally unjustifiable, and it is to the credit of our post office, that it has countered such a charge by a rate of half a cent per pound in return. I could undertake to do the conveyance from Great Britain to this country for one-tenth of the current rate and make a handsome profit on it. Seventeen dollars and a half a ton, which is just about one-tenth of the rate actually charged, is at least equivalent to any possible charge which could be incurred by the conveyance of this literature on the steamers now plying on the ocean. But I shall proceed to show that this rate, which the Postmaster General of England imagines is a source of revenue, is evaded in substance and in fact. I am rather amused, and you will be I have no doubt, at the following remark of the Postmaster General in the 49th report of the Post Office Department in 1903, the last bearing any reference to the subject. The Postmaster General says :

> In reference to representations from the Canadian post office, I have agreed to accept newspapers and other periodicals from Canada for delivery in the United Kingdom, prepaid only, at the Canadian domestic rates of postage. I regret that I have been unable to recommend to your Lordships the adoption of these very low rates in the reverse direction. I am of opinion that any rate of postage adopted for Canada must be eventually applied to all other parts of the British empire, and I do not see any present justification for so wide and costly an extension of this unremunerative post.

I have already said that I really believe that instead of the rate being unremunerative, it is such an exaggerated rate that, as in all such cases, it is sure to be evaded, and evaded it is. An institution called the American News Company, doing business in New York, imports all this literature by express at $2 per hundred pounds to New York, that is two cents a pound, and then posting it by the United States post at one cent a pound, delivers it in Canada for three cents a pound, so that the Postmaster General is to this extent entirely out as he expects a revenue and does not get it. He probably, if he reduced it to three cents. would command the business and make a handsome profit, but he charges eight cents a pound and kills the goose that lays the golden egg.

I ask this honourable House to consider the effect of this prohibitive rate, as compared with the rate charged by the United States, on the Canadian bookseller and distributors. The Canadian bookseller has this before him ; if he accepts an order for a subscription for an English magazine or illustrated paper, he is in the first place charged eight cents a pound by the British post office, and then he has to pay to the Canadian post office one cent a pound in addition for the purpose of having his wares distributed, unless, indeed, he and the subscriber happen to be in the same city, when he can do it by hand without the intervention of the post office. So he has to compete with an institution which can do the business for three cents a pound, while if he employs the legitimate post office facilities, the postage on his wares amounts to nine cents a pound. Now that is a very serious thing. I may here say that the addition of the one cent rate is of comparatively recent date. Prior to the adoption of it the wares were carried free by the Canadian government. The addition of this one cent on a subscription for one year to the 'Graphic' is equivalent to 75 cents, which of itself is an important item and would at once throw the business into the hands of the American News Company. You ask probably, as it occurred to me, cannot the Canadian bookseller evade the English post office in the same way that the United States bookseller does ? but he is met by the express company, which is, so far as I know, a United States institution ; while they carry such wares to New York for $2 per hundred pounds, they charge $4.01 to Montreal, and a proportionately high rate to other parts of the Dominion. Altogether, it appears to me that this rate is destructive to the business of the Canadian bookseller. It affects other classes also. I call every member of this House to witness, if he does not observe for himself, that the supply of reading matter of a light character is almost entirely monopolized by United States publishers, and any English papers and magazines which come into this country are probably reprints coming from the United States and filled with United States advertisements. A Canadian magazine is almost an impossibility. Canada is flooded with United States literature and Canadian manufacturers are met with the free distribution of the advertisements of United States wares. This outrageous condition of things is full of dilemma. The United States magazine comes in filled with advertisements of United States wares illustrated freely and distributed gratis, because out of the one cent a pound charged for the conveyance by post, the Canadian post office gets nothing. The charge of one cent a pound goes entirely to the United States government. If the publisher of a magazine in this country, with a limited circulation, struggling with the opposition so improperly created by the flooding of the country with United States literature, has to import materials of any kind, type plates, prints or process plates which are now so common, he is charged duty on them, but if a book is made up and printed on United States paper it comes in free. An arrangement made with the United States for the conveyance of this literature seems a very easy thing. It seems fair to say to this country, as no doubt they do, if you will exchange rates with ourselves, we will carry all your magazines that you may send us, and you will carry all we can supply to you, but in working it out, look at the discrepancy which results. The number of publications including newspapers, magazines and periodicals of all kinds, published in the United States, according to the census of 1900 was 22,072, of magazines monthly and quarterly 3,181 ; while the total number of publications in Canada is 1,227, of magazines, 169, so in entering into an arrangement of that kind we have to consider this difference.

I do not say that all the United States magazines come into this country, but a very considerable proportion of them do ; and if you take the 3,181 magazines on one side of the border which have the right to come across here without any contribution to our revenue, and in return you get a similar right to distribute Canadian magazines in the United States to the number of 169, it surely does not require much argument to prove that the bargain is very lopsided. In addition to all that, I have looked up some facts with regard to some of the magazines which circulate in this country. I am not going to trouble the House with details or statistics of the whole or even any considerable number of them ; I will take only two. One magazine weighs 14 ounces, and is carried, as above stated, for seven-eighths of one cent to all parts of Canada. It contains 159 pages of reading matter and 106 of advertisements, on which there are 303 advertisements. Another magazine weighs 19 ounces, is carried for a little over one and three-sixteenths cents, contains 112 pages of reading matter and 183 pages of advertisements, on which are published 457 separate advertisements. The more popular of the English magazines are now printed in the United States, and while they do not have anything like the number of advertisements to which I have alluded, they still have a fair proportion of United States advertisements. As against that we have nothing to set, no quid pro quo, and I must say that it appears to me the manufacturers and producers in this country have a reasonable cause for complaint when they see rival wares to their own distributed at the expense of our government gratis, while if they, on their side, attempt to distribute advertisements or catalogues, they have to pay to their own government two cents per ounce. The difference is very material, but if they are satisfied with it, I have nothing more to say. A strong representation made to England, backed by the weight of this Senate, might probably fortify the hands of our government in dealing with this question, and do infinite good. I have no cognizance of the representations which have been made by our government to the British post office on the subject, but the inference is very plain that if we are willing to carry our magazines and literature of that kind to England for one-half cent per pound, as against the eight cents per pound charged by the imperial government, our government is not to blame. I have, in my resolution, made this statement, that—

The Senate affirms the principle that the conveyance of letters, newspapers, books, periodicals, &c., should be at a lower scale of charges within the empire than at the time ruling with any foreign country.

Does that require any long argument? To my mind, it does not. This country has already shown how it stands by its preferential tariff, which, while I have always maintained it was rather a crude method of settling the difficulty, at least showed what the feeling of this country was, and I know that the country was behind the government when it established that preference. It shows that the doctrine that there should be a preference within the bounds of the empire was the practically unanimous sense of this country ; not only so, but we led the way in the policy of reprisals administered to a powerful European government, a policy which was, in 1867, inaugurated by Bismarck himself, when the German government had to deal with other countries. He put it in the most specific shape that resorting to reprisals, as he termed it, was the only way of dealing with foreign countries which discriminated against the exports of Germany. I am not going to deal with the general imperial question, but this I will say, that imperial sentiment, which is the deliberate policy of this country as affirmed, is the strongest and most effective bond of union in the empire.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND—And that in dealing with it in the miserable haggling way the British post office does, they are trifling with an important factor in the spread of imperial feeling and sympathy.

The facts above stated appear to me to make a case for a speedy review of the present postal rates by the imperial and our own governments.

They prove that the present rates are in their operations unjust, partial, and prejudicial to the interests of several classes of our fellow-citizens.

1st. To the booksellers and distributors of literature who are sacrificed in favour of American organizations having the same business ends.

2nd. To our manufacturers and producers who find the wares of their rivals in the United States advertised broadcast and distributed at the expense of the government of Canada.

3rd. To the British publishers who have to meet the competition in this market of literature artificially cheapened at the expense of the American and Canadian governments.

4th. To the literary men and publishers of our own country, who have to maintain an unequal struggle against a flood of foreign productions.

Finally. In regard to the motion I have placed on record and hope to obtain the acceptance of by this honourable House the imperial note with which it concludes is, I think, in strict accord with the present policy and practice of this country.

Every one of my hearers knows that our relations with the motherland and other portions of the empire are largely governed by sentiment. The debates now going on in England are almost entirely taken up with this subject, and the collateral one of retaliation.

Now in this country we are in both subjects in advance of the parent state, we are in the fore-front in the practical adoption of a preferential tariff. We have shown the way to a policy of reprisals in our tariff relations with a great European power, and I cannot conceive that any reasonable objection can exist to the terms of my motion.

The party debates now running their course in Great Britain, centre on the proposal to give a fiscal preference within the bounds of the empire. Both sides recognize the value of the imperial sentiment evinced by the colonies, or affect to do so, but while one party advocates a tariff preference as a means of fostering this bond of union, by the consolidating influence of mutual interest, the other scouts any such step as a needless sacrifice, preferring to leave things to their own course. Indeed, the leader airily waves aside all such proposals as 'squalid bonds.'

Needless to say the latter view is not the view held in this country, but having made our preference and maintained it for years, having shown the practical value of the principle, even at some considerable sacrifices, we wait the answer of the mother country without excitement or haste. But I may urge that as both sides are so far agreed, in regarding the loyal sentiment of the colonies as of importance, they must be blind indeed if they can regard with indifference the practical monopoly of the reading matter supplies of this country, now held by a foreign literature. It is no exaggeration to say that the bookstalls of this country are monopolized by American literature and periodicals, and that the appearance of an English or Canadian sample is a rare exception.

Now, I have nothing to say about the quality of the supply we receive; there are good, bad and indifferent examples, with, I am prepared to say, a preponderance of the best, but it is not Canadian nor is it English in tone, temper or tendency, occasionally very much the reverse, and generally and quite naturally, exhibiting a spirit of propaganda of American ideas and influences.

The extent to which this supply has monopolized our market is largely due to the absurd, even monstrous exactions, of the English post office. I thank God that the good sense of our people has hitherto resisted and kept them immune to influences of this kind, but I cannot believe that any statesman can regard with indifference the continuance of this condition of things. 'Continual dropping wears the stone' is a very old and a very true saying.

I have, as the evidence appears to point, more or less assumed that our government are not to blame for the present absurd not to say dangerous state of things, but I shall be gratified to have an assurance that I am correct in my assumption, and I trust that by the adoption of the motion, this honourable House, may strengthen its hands to accomplish a change, which in my opinion without cost to either of the contracting parties will go far to remedy a crying evil.

You will observe that I do not advocate any exclusion of American reading matter, but I do most earnestly protest against the practical exclusion, so far as prices can do so, of the literature and news of our own country by postal regulations and imposts which are not justifiable, and which benefit the revenues of neither our own nor the mother country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. senator from Montreal has placed the Senate, and I may say the people of Canada, under an obligation to him for the very prominent way in which he has brought to notice the extraordinary, unwise, unsympathetic, and let me add, unpatriotic policy pursued by the British government in reference to the subject now before the Senate. Some years ago at one of the conferences in London this subject was brought up for consideration. The Postmaster General pressed very strongly the entering into an arrangement with our postal authorities for a reduction of the postage between the two countries. The Postmaster General of Great Britain objected on the ground that the revenue was not an increasing one, that it was not meeting the expenditure and therefore he did not propose to recommend to his colleagues any reduction in the postage. He even went so far as to object to our doing it, on the ground that in accordance with the existing arrangement the understanding was that any reduction should be mutual and that therefore it was placing the British government in a rather unenviable position for Canada to lower her rates irrespective of the rates prevailing on material coming from the other side. However, our Postmaster General who, as you all know, is a very energetic gentleman, insisted upon pressing, from his standpoint at all events, and from the policy that was entirely concurred in by the members of the government, that Canada should be at least allowed to reduce her postage to the mother country as an example that might have some influence with the British people, and accordingly, as pointed out by the hon. senator from Montreal, our rates are very much lower than the British rates. The consequences have been very pointedly alluded to; they are self-evident. If Canada was not really the loyal country it is, we should long before this have been thoroughly impregnated with United States sentiment. Go into the reading rooms and into our family circles, and you find United States newspapers, and magazines everywhere, simply because such a tax is attached to British periodicals that it is quite impossible for the Canadian people to subscribe to them. It does not seem to strike the minds of the British statesmen that what we read from day to day and the sentiments that we gather from the newspapers, magazines and periodicals circulating in the country, make public opinion, and, as I have said, if we were not so deeply attached to the mother country it would have had a considerable effect in estranging our sentiments. The instances my hon. friend has drawn attention to the extravagant postal rates charged on periodicals sent from the other side of the Atlantic have been so admirably put together that I trust his speech will be widely circulated. I shall be exceedingly glad to see that a copy of it goes to the Postmaster General of England, in order that he may learn what the sentiment of Canada is, because I am quite sure on a subject of that kind the gentlemen I see about me echo the sentiments of the Canadian people. The answer placed in my hands by the department is as follows:—

With reference to the resolution of the Honourable Sir George Drummond respecting some supposed inequalities of postal rates within the empire and beyond it, it may be observed:—

1. The Post Office Department is not aware of the inequalities referred to.

2. The Post Office Department would point out that in the absence of an agreement between two or more countries as to what the postal rates between them shall be, the rates are required by the Universal Postal Convention to be those fixed by the convention as applicable to all countries. The Post Office Department has for some years endeavoured to secure special agreements with the mother country and different parts of the empire for reduced rates on letters, newspapers and periodicals within the empire with the following result:—

In 1898 a convention was held in the city of London, England, of representatives of all countries within the empire. At this convention it was decided, on the motion of the Canadian Postmaster General, that the letter rate within the empire should be one penny per half ounce instead of two pence half penny, which is the Universal Postal Convention rate. This reduction is now in full force as regards Canada, and letters originating in Canada are now transmitted to every part of the British empire at the one penny rate, and the rate from all places within the empire to Canada, except Australia, has been reduced to this rate, Australia for its own reasons being unwilling to reduce its outgoing rate.

As to rates on newspapers and periodicals, at the Colonial Conference held in London, England, in 1902, Sir William Mulock moved a resolution, which was carried, recommending that each government within the empire be allowed to reduce to whatever limit it chose the rate on its newspapers and periodicals for transmission to every part of the empire. Since the passage of that resolution the Canadian Post Office Department has reduced its rates on Canadian newspapers and periodicals from Canada to practically every part of the British empire to a rate equal to the ordinary domestic rate within Canada. The mother country has not reciprocated nor, in fact, has any other part of the empire, but it rests with them to make the reduction whenever they see fit. The rate from the house of publication in Canada on newspapers and periodicals to the rest of the empire is one-half of one cent per pound. The rates from other parts of the empire to Canada vary, that from the mother country being one cent for two ounces or eight cents per pound.

We can, of course, educate public opinion in England, and it is a question which the commercial and the manufacturing interests in the United Kingdom ought to note, because, as has been pointed out very forcibly by the hon. gentleman from Montreal, people are led to buy through the advertisements that are placed in their hands. They get no English advertisements. They do not know what the manufacturers there produce, and do not give them any orders. We in Canada are an active go-ahead people. We do not wait for three, or four, or five weeks, or months, to make up our minds what we are going to buy, but purchase on the spur of the moment; and, consequently, when the people of Canada have before them those advertisements of the various industries in the United States, they buy largely from the States, simply because information is not furnished by English manufacturers. If, therefore, my hon. friend's address were well distributed in England, and the attention of the agents in Birmingham, Manchester and other centres called to it, pressure might be brought to bear on the Postmaster General to change his views on this important subject. With the patriotic sentiment now existing, and with the desire in Great Britain to develop the imperial feeling, one would think that that motive alone was sufficiently strong to have prompted them to take a more liberal view with the Canadian government to place the postal rates at the lowest possible point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is only one point which the hon. Secretary of State missed in his explanation, and it is this: that when the first steps were taken towards the reduction of the postage in Canada, it was found to be a contravention of some of the provisions of the Berne Convention, and consequently those blocks in the way had to be removed before the reduction could take place. That is one objection that the Postmaster General of England and the imperial government took to the action of the Canadian government at that time. However, that has been removed, and I think the hon. gentleman who has brought this matter before the Senate deserves the thanks, not only of the Senate, but of the country, on the lucid and clear manner in which he has put the case before us. I am very glad to see that the leader of the government in this House echos, not only the sentiments which he has uttered, but adopts the policy which my hon. friend has laid down. I might call the attention of the Senate to another fact that was very strongly brought to light by the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Montreal. There is a provision in the tariff for the taxing of advertising literature. I have often thought that these magazines, to which my hon. friend referred, are actually an evasion of that clause in the Tariff Act. Take the case to which he called the attention of the Senate, that in a magazine containing 120 or 130 pages of reading matter there is a larger number of pages of advertising matter. Now, if that magazine were exclusively an advertisement it would be taxed, but the duty is evaded by the manner in which it is introduced into the country, advertising all the industries of the union and almost everything they have to sell. I would suggest to my hon. friend to bear in mind, if he should propose this session or another session, to amend the Tariff Act, to deal with that question, which is apparently a small matter, but still an incongruity that exists in all Tariff Acts. No one knows better than my hon. friend who sits alongside of the Secretary of State (Sir Richard Cartwright) the difficulty in framing a tariff to meet all the objections that can be taken to it, and to meet all the difficulties that present themselves in the way of an introduction of different articles into this country. Take the 'Book-lovers' Magazine,' for instance. It is a capital magazine, but I think I am safe in saying that at least one-half of it is filled with advertisements of all kinds, bringing every industry in the United States under the notice of the Canadian reader, which has, to a certain degree, the effect pointed out by the hon. Secretary of State. That is the principal point that induced me to rise to offer the suggestion that that should be provided for at least. The remarks made by my hon. friend contain so much information directly to the point that one can scarcely conceive it possible that, with these few facts before them, the British government will permit these incongruities to continue. Let me say here that I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman from Wellington has given notice of a motion almost in the same direction, although upon another subject. It is high time that the legislative bodies of this country, both the Senate and House of Commons, should express themselves decidedly and positively upon these questions which militate, to such a great extent, against the commerce of this country, injuring our prospects in almost every respect in which they deal with them. What really is a puzzle to every Canadian is that there are statesmen in England who hold the views they do upon questions of this kind when dealing with other portions of the empire, while, at the same time it is regretable to read the statements which they make, which are favourable to the intercourse from a commercial standpoint with other parts of the world, when it actually militates against their own colonies and a portion of their own empire. I hope the effect of the motion which is made will be to remove these incongruities, and place us in a position equal, at least, to that of the United States. One can scarcely conceive it possible that in the introduction of magazines by direct importation, the country loses five cents and on other matters six cents per pound—that is, if they send them round by the United States instead of directly to Canada. These incongruities certainly should be removed, if it is possible to remove them, and if they are not removed it should not be the fault of Canada in not calling their attention to it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I quite agree, not merely with the hon. gentleman who has made this motion but also with the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, that it is very desirable that the Canadian parliament should call the attention of the British parliament to discrepancies such as he has pointed out. I have also noted, and noted with great regret, that there has been a disposition, and not of yesterday, on the part of a great many persons in authority in Great Britain to ignore the just claims of the confederation of Canada which, I may remark, stands on a very different footing from an ordinary colony, and is daily and hourly growing in national importance, as has been shown very recently by the addition which has been made to the provincial status of Canada in the Northwest. There has been a great disposition to ignore the just demands of the people of Canada on various points, and I have always hoped that the generous treatment which we have accorded of late years to British manufacturers would incline the British parliament, when these things are properly brought before them, to give us, particularly in such cases as this, a correspondingly generous treatment. The hon. gentleman who spoke last called attention to another point of no inconsiderable importance. I believe it is quite true that a very large number of these United States magazines which are largely circulated in Canada have been very little better than advertising mediums for a considerable length of time. That tendency has been very much more manifested of late years, and I shall not fail to call the attention of my hon. friends, and particularly the Finance Minister, to the question whether magazines which are really advertising mediums should not be treated, if it can be done—the difficulties are considerable as the hon. gentleman knows—quoad their advertisements at any rate, on a somewhat different footing from what may be called the more purely literary magazines which often contain subjects of great interest and great moment to everybody in Canada as well as in the United States. As for the matter now in hand, I think the hon. senator from Montreal (Sir George Drummond) has made out a very clear case indeed, and I may add that several of the officers connected with my department have called attention already to the facts which he has brought before us, and to the great advantage to be derived from a free circulation between Canada and England of the various periodicals and magazines published in both countries. There is no doubt whatever that the English people and the English government are standing very much in their own light by putting an almost prohibitory rate on the distribution of English literature throughout Canada. As to the best mode of remedying it, I think I may venture to say that the discussion here will not be thrown away on my hon. friend the Postmaster General.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—And he will hail every such effort on the part of this honourable House, or of any other body in Canada, as greatly strengthening his hands. I certainly, for my part, congratulate my hon. friend from Montreal on the manner in which he has brought this matter before the House, and I hope that, with the assistance of the several Canadians who, we are happy to know, are among the members of the British parliament, we may be able, within a reasonably short space of time, to report that a very, considerable modification has been made in these oppressive regulations now in force by the British post office authorities.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It might be well that the Committee on Printing should make a note that an extra number of copies of this particular debate will be very desirable in order that hon. gentlemen might send them abroad to our friends in England. Our agents in Great Britain should have possession of them and they should be liberally distributed. It will have a very good effect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That could not be done unless it was specially referred to the Printing Committee. If the Committee on Debates should recommend it to the Senate it might be done in that way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope they will do it.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SONGHEES INDIAN RESERVE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved :

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a copy of any agreement or conditions under which the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company occupy a portion of the Songhees Indian Reserve, if with power to purchase, for how much ? If leased only, how much is the rental ?

He said: It may be known to the Secretary of State that the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway occupy sixteen acres of Indian reserve at Victoria. On what conditions the occupation took place I do not know. Whether they had an offer to purchase, or pay a rent for the ground I cannot tell. The bargain or condition was made by Sir John Macdonald some years ago when he went over to Victoria, and I think there should be a fund, a certain amount, to the credit of the reserve.

The motion was agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

QUORUM REDUCED.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to lay before the Senate circumstances which have arisen in connection with the Standing Orders Committee. Owing to various reasons, there is not present a quorum of that committee. As you all are aware, it is a committee of nine and the quorum necessary to do the work that committee is charged with is five and at present we have not that number in attendance on the Senate. It is very desirable the committee should meet and do its work. There is an accumulation of work before it and there is also the fact that to-morrow the time expires for presenting petitions for private Bills and I would ask the indulgence of the House if they will permit me to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. McKay, Truro, that the quorum of the Standing Orders Committee should be made three instead of five. It has been done before and I should also call attention that it is not an unreasonable principle when we take into consideration that in the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, a committee of fifty, the quorum is nine. There are thirty-two members on the Committee on Banking and Commerce and the quorum is nine. Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee, twenty-five members, quorum seven, and in this case if a motion carries our quorum will be three on a committee of nine. I ask the suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The proper motion would be to name the rule to be suspended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was going to suggest that in order that the objection referred to by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona should be avoided, the motion should be a little more explicit and set forth the fact that, being unable to obtain a quorum, the consent of the Senate be obtained to reduce the quorum to three.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—All right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—For this reason ; that the practice is that if you desire to reduce the quorum, it must come from a recommendation of the committee, and, not being able to get a quorum, they cannot make their recommendation. The suggestion I have thrown out would meet the difficulty to a certain extent.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have much pleasure in accepting the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The better way is to put the motion for the suspension of the rule first.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the House to rule 17 which reads as follows :

No motion to suspend, modify or amend any rule or part thereof shall be in order except on one day's notice in writing specifying precisely the rule to be suspended, modified or amended, and the purpose of such suspension.

I do not wish to avail myself of the right of opposing the motion because notice has not been given, but I want to know what rule we are asked to suspend ?

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro)—If I understand the matter aright, we are not suspending the rule. We are simply changing the motion made in the early part of the session when we brought in a recommendation that the quorum should be five. We want to repeal that and make it three.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is by the unanimous consent of the House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is not amending any rule. It is simply on a report of the committee. That is why I did not care to mention any rule of the Senate because I am not quite clear that it falls under rule 17.

The SPEAKER—It is moved by the Hon. Mr. Young that inasmuch as the Committee on Standing Orders has been unable to meet through lack of a quorum, any rule pertaining thereto be suspended and that the quorum of the committee be reduced from five to three.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That does not settle the question. There is a rule or there is not a rule, but certainly there is a rule that requires a motion to be passed in this House and notice must be given for one day. If there is no other rule for the changing of a quorum, bringing it down to three, there is certainly a rule that requires a day's notice and that rule must be suspended.

The SPEAKER—Rules 13 and 17.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand the Speaker put the question as to the suspension of the rules and the House has agreed to suspend the rules. Now the main motion is put.

The SPEAKER—I did not divide the motion.

RESIGNATION OF MR. BLAIR.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I see the hon. gentleman from Acadie in his place, and when we had the series of questions on the order paper on the 19th of February there was one question I was unable to answer. He laid great stress on the fact, from his standpoint, that very great inconvenience was going to arise in consequence of Mr. Blair's resignation. I was unable to say then what number of cases would probably have to be heard again owing to that resignation. I am informed now by the secretary of the commission that probably half a dozen will have to be reheard. The last paragraph in the series of questions I at the time made no answer to. It was not a question that came within the rules. It was argumentative. It drew conclusions, and a very much stronger objection to it is that it reflected on two gentlemen who hold very high positions, which I thought was exceedingly improper, when it was done on defective information. I am advised that Mr. Bernier, who is the gentleman alluded to, a member of the board, remained at Ottawa with the entire approval of his colleagues for the purpose of disposing of some business that one member of the board alone could hear and dispose of—a number of orders. It was not necessary for him to go west. The information I received from the secretary of the board is as follows :

The Hon. M. E. Bernier, deputy chief commissioner, remained at Ottawa during the absence of the chief commissioner and Commissioner Mills in the west.

I might say that it was deemed advisable that the deputy chief commissioner should remain, as he had authority, under the Act, to sign orders in the absence of the chief commissioner, and, under section 10 of the Act, it is provided that, in case there is no opposing party and no notice to be given to any interested party, any one commissioner may act for the whole board. It will thus be seen that by Mr. Bernier's remaining in Ottawa, a very large number of orders could be and were, as a fact, issued, which were in the nature of consent orders, and a great deal of business transacted that would otherwise have had to await the return of the commissioners from the west.

The hon. gentleman's question reads :—

What member of the Railway Commission is it that stayed at home, instead of accompanying the board on their western tour last summer, and thereby helped to bring about the state of confusion that now exists, to the great detriment of litigants, in that important branch of the civil service ?

I am informed by the clerk and also by the chairman of the committee that the deduction drawn therefrom is entirely without foundation, that it was with the concurrence of his colleagues that Mr. Bernier remained in Ottawa for the purpose of performing certain duties in connection with the position he held and that the unwarrantable deduction that is made in this paragraph has no foundation in fact. I hope, therefore, my hon. friend will withdraw the insinuation conveyed that a great detriment arose to litigants in consequence of the absence of Mr. Bernier.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I have in this case nothing whatsoever to withdraw, notwithstanding the great respect I have for the hon. leader of the House. By the tenor of the remarks and the lecture he was kind enough to give me and the insinuations he very charitably asserts that I have made, I have to conclude from his own words that because a gentleman is highly paid it is improper for members of this House to call upon the government to answer for him, and in this case it is possible that it is not that gentleman's shoes that pinch so much as the government's shoes—it is improper for me to call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman by his remaining in Ottawa when he should have been away with the commission had been the cause of the delay. I beg to differ from the hon. gentleman. We have duties to perform here and because a man is high in position, he shall not be allowed to stand, as far as I am concerned and I know as far as my colleagues are concerned, between us and our duty. Here, hon. gentlemen, is a thing that is almost equal to a public scandal. It is at all events bringing hardship upon a great number of persons. It is the fault of somebody; whose fault it is I have not been able to elicit. The hon. minister told us on the last occasion this subject was before the Senate, that the board does not come under the regulations which govern the civil service, and the tenor of his answer was to the effect that the board was above everything that exists here as far as control was concerned. I take exception to that. Every body that is established by Act of parliament is under the control of some department, or at least of the government at large, and I believe and maintain that however highly paid these gentlemen may be, they are amenable to the control of the government. Hon. gentlemen are all aware that it is because one of those officials remained here while the others toured the western provinces that to-day so many cases have to be heard over again. I am told now that six cases will have to be reheard. I take the number six, but I was informed that it has been reduced to six because of the good will of the litigants, that there were over sixty cases that might have to be heard over again if it were not that the parties, being desirous of saving the extra cost, had agreed to some amicable solution. I say, hon. gentlemen, the question was of sufficient importance to warrant me in placing it on the order paper, as I did without an insinuation. I wish the hon. gentleman to retract the statement that there was an insinuation. I insinuated nothing. I asked the question and placed it properly on the paper. I am in the habit of asking questions properly. I know something of the propriety of the question and I know I was acting within my right, and I asked it as a gentleman should ask it. I repeat that the fact that the commissioner draws a high salary is no reason why senators on either side of the House should be debarred from asking questions affecting the public service, and especially, as in this case, if the report is true that six litigants will likely have to pay the costs occasioned by the second adjudication of these cases. I repeat, I believe I had the right to put the question and I am convinced that I put it in the proper way without any unseemly insinuation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to read the authorities I have before me on the subject of questions. They are as follows :—

> The purpose of a question is to obtain information and not to supply it to the House.
> A question may not contain statements of facts unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible and can be authenticated, nor should a question contain arguments, inferences, imputations, epithets nor ironical expressions, nor may a question refer to debates or answers to questions in the current sessions.

Now if my hon. friend will just bear with me for a moment, I made no reflection on him when I said that there was an insinuation in this that was not really proper. It was commenting on the board.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The effect is injurious if I may be allowed to say so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not agree. I do not think the chamber will agree that in the absence of a gentleman who could not give any explanation it was quite proper to ask this question :

What member of the Railway Commission is it that stayed at home instead of accompanying the board on their western tour last summer, and thereby helped to bring about the state of confusion that now exists to the great detriment of litigants in that important branch of the civil service ?

That is an imputation.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—What insinuations are there ? Insinuation must mean something against the character of a man. What insinuation is there against that party ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The insinuation is that Mr. Bernier deliberately remained away, and by his remaining away confusion arose in the administration of the duties of that commission. That is absolutely untrue. I have it as untrue both from the secretary of the commission and the chairman of the board.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Did he remain away ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—By request of the board.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Then I have rendered the gentleman a service by giving the leader of the government an opportunity to explain matters which, but for my question, might still have hung over him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He did not create any confusion by his remaining here. He had nothing to do with Mr. Blair's resignation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is confusion to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the hon. gentleman's opinion. I do not share that. It is an exceedingly unusual way, and very improper I think, for the hon. gentleman to cast reflections on a person holding the position that Mr. Bernier does without fuller information. I had not all the information to give my hon. friend or I would have given it at the time. I had not the opportunity of giving it. I obtained it through the secretary, and he tells me that six cases may have to be heard. That is not so very serious a matter. Mr. Bernier had nothing to do with that. It was Mr. Blair's action in withdrawing from the commission that caused the difficulty. It left only two commissioners.

THE SONGHEES INDIAN RESERVE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to :

Direct the attention of the government to the still unsettled question of the removal of the Songhees Indians from the reserve at Victoria.

There having been negotiations and correspondence for some years on this subject between the Dominion government and that of British Columbia, but no definite conclusion has yet been come to.

Much agitation is going on at Victoria now, and expressions of disappointment frequently uttered at public meetings at the non-removal of the Indians, as the reserve is in proximity to the business portion of the city, consequently an eyesore with its dilapidated wigwams.

No harsh measures or force should be used to remove the Indians.

The principal reasons for the removal should be humane and moral. A depraved class of the community demoralize and degrade them through the medium of poisonous spirits and vice. On these grounds alone, no time should be lost in their removal from the source of depravity to a suitable reserve where fish, game and fuel can be easily obtained, and where evil influence cannot so easily enter.

The Indians will naturally be reluctant to leave their present home, but an earnest effort, together with kind consideration of their wishes, can accomplish the desired object.

On the removal of the Indians, the reserve reverts to the province, which for that reason agreed in previous negotiations to provide a suitable reserve, which it will no doubt carry out as soon as definite, determined action is taken.

The sum of $12,065.39 stands to the credit of the Songhees reserve for rents received for portions of it, which can properly be used for the benefit of the Indians during the removal, and settlement on a new reserve.

The first point is the selection of a reserve, which I beg to suggest should be done in the following manner :

The Dominion government, as trustees for the Indians, to take the initiative in this matter.

That a commission of three persons be appointed to deal with the question of removal and a new reserve.

The Dominion government to appoint one commissioner. The provincial government of British Columbia to appoint one. The chief of the Songhees to be the third commissioner.

The reserve being selected and a house built for each family, and a building to be erected to serve as schoolhouse and church, all to be paid for by the province as its contribution for entering into possession of the old reserve.

The Indians to be compensated for the cottages they have erected on the old reserve within the last seven years, from funds provided by the Dominion government, or out of the funds to the credit of the reserve.

As an inducement to removal a moderate supply of food to be given to each family, together with ten dollars per month for one year. The chief to receive fifteen dollars per month for one year, out of the money to the credit of the reserve. In order to avoid friction and ill-feeling such an inducement as this will be an absolute necessity, and must not be lost sight of.

The balance of reserve funds, if any, after the foregoing payments are made, to be retained by the Dominion government as a fund out of which indigent and old Songhees may from time to time receive aid.

The foregoing propositions, or something similar being accomplished, no hesitation on the part of the Indians to be allowed, although determination, tempered with considerate kindness is to be exercised.

Thirty days' notice to be given the Songhees chief to be ready with all his people to proceed to their new reserve.

The Dominion steamer 'Quadra' at the end of the thirty days' notice to anchor off the Songhees village, take the Indians and their effects on board and their canoes in tow, proceed to the new reserve, and there land them.

And will ask if the government will press this matter to an early settlement.

He said : The hon. Secretary of State will know that this is a question of long standing. It has been written about and discussed between the two governments for a number of years. It is a very important matter, and I urge, entirely on the question of morality and humanity, that the Indians should be removed from the temptation of drink and other evil habits. I hope the government—although I do not think this government is to blame in the matter at all—will take active steps to press the provincial government to have this matter settled. I believe the whole difficulty arises as to the ownership of the reserve after the Indians are removed. I think the last offer made by the Dominion government here to the province of British Columbia divided the reserve into three portions. I am not familiar with the conditions exactly. I have not the papers, but I believe that was the reason. It is pretty fairly established in the courts of the country, and I think by the imperial court as well, that the reserve goes back to the province when the Indians are removed. If the Dominion government will take that view of it there will be no difficulty in the settlement. The Indians of course require every consideration. The reserve is their home, bona fide made for them many years ago, probably now nearly sixty years ago, and they have lived on it for a long time. At present there are very few Indians and the cost of their removal to a suitable reserve would be small. They could be taken to a place where they would have timber, fish and fuel and all their rights. The hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Templeman), knows as well as I do the position of this matter—that this reserve is in the immediate proximity of the business part of Victoria, that it is an eyesore, and ought to be removed, on that account and also, in the interest of the Indians themselves. They are now confined to a small piece of ground where they cannot have cultivation, or stock. To give you an instance of what Indians can do when they have the room and the land, there is a reserve at Saanich, about fifteen miles from Victoria, where the Indians have so progressed that they have now their threshing mills and their horses and carts and they go round the country threshing for white settlers. That just shows what the Indians can do when they have the facilities, the land and the room. The notice I have given is very simple because I wish to express my own ideas and from my long experience and knowledge of the Indians I think it will be found very correct. The Indians can be removed with determination and kindness and a little money. We know the power of money. It can move anything, and without money you cannot do anything. You cannot even feed the poor, or clothe the naked, or preach the gospel or do anything else. By using money judiciously in this matter, with kindness, the Indians can be removed and bettered in every possible way.

As I said before, the first thing to be done is to appoint some gentleman as a representative of the Dominion government, probably the Indian commissioner in British Columbia, let the province appoint another and then take the Indian Chief, so as to satisfy his people, and let these three select the reserve. It need not be large or extensive, probably 200 or 300 acres would be ample, and the lands could be obtained at a reasonable price. After that let the province build a house for each family, and then the Dominion should supply food for a year and a sum of money to enable them to live in comfort and cultivate their own land. Without that I do not think it can be done. Let any rights in the reserve go back to the province on condition they provide a suitable reserve and build those houses I speak of for the Indians. If that is done with consideration and kindness there will be no trouble in moving the Indians. I do not know what the government will do in the matter, but I hope they will take steps to press this matter to a settlement.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The question which my hon. friend from Victoria has brought before the House is one of considerable interest to the city of Victoria, although it may not engage the attention of many of the representatives from other provinces. My hon. friend has not concluded his notice with a motion. I presume his sole object was to call the attention of the government to the existing condition of affairs and have a discussion and be content with what might result as a consequence of the attention of the government being called to this matter; because, if the notice on the order paper had been in the form of a motion the government could not concede the method of settling this question which has been suggested by my hon. friend, that is the appointment of three commissioners to select a site. My hon. friend says that no harsh measures or force should be used to remove the Indians, and then at the close of the notice he says:

> The foregoing propositions, or something similar, being accomplished, no hesitation on the part of the Indians to be allowed,——

That is their hesitation to leave their old reserves.

> ——although determination, tempered with considerate kindness is to be exercised.
> Thirty days' notice to be given the Songhees chief to be ready with all his people to proceed to their new reserve.
> The Dominion steamer 'Quadra' at the end of the thirty days' notice to anchor off the Songhees village, take the Indians and their effects on board and their canoes in tow, proceed to the new reserve, and there land them.

I submit that the Songhees Indian reserve question cannot be so easily settled. It has been a question for at least some forty or fifty years. It will be in the recollection of my hon. friend, who is a very old resident of the city of Victoria, that it has been a live issue there for that many years. At all events, for the last twenty years, to my certain knowledge, the desire of the people of Victoria to remove these Indians from the city has been ever present. It is one of our great local issues. The reserve, I may say for the information of the House is situated in the centre of the city of Victoria. It consists of 119 acres of land, surrounded on all sides, save the side of the ocean, by the corporate limits of the city of Victoria. A large portion of the population of the city is outside of the reserve, and so hon. gentlemen will realize that such a reserve inhabited by probably only forty or fifty Indians in the centre of a beautiful city like Victoria, is a crying grievance to the people of that city. There is no question at all that this reserve should have been removed years ago, and I say boldly that if the local government of the province of British Columbia had been alive to the interest of the people of Victoria, it would have been removed. I have inquired at the office of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for a memo. of the negotiations that have been carried on during the past five or six years in respect to this matter, and for the purpose of informing the people, of the west at all events, and getting it on the records of this House, I shall read it. My hon. friend imagines that all he has to do is to call the attention of the government to this fact, and that this government will take action and remove the Indians, peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must, as suggested in his memo. There is no use going beyond the year 1897, though previous to that there had been many interviews, many negotiations, and much correspondence carried on between the government of British Columbia and Ottawa. The city council of Victoria have, of recent years, taken a hand in the matter, so we have four great interests, including that of the Indians, concerned in this question. In 1897, when Mr. Turner was premier of the province of British Columbia, a proposition was made by him that an officer of the Department of Indian Affairs at Ottawa should proceed to British Columbia and try to effect an arrangement by which the Indians would be removed from the reserve. Mr. McKenna, who for many years had served in the Indian Department here, was commissioned to go to British Columbia, and after many interviews with Mr. Turner and Mr. Eberts, the Attorney General of the province, he made two propositions to the government of British Columbia. I want my hon. friend, if he is not familiar with what these propositions are, to consider them carefully, because I want him, as a representative of British Columbia and as a Victorian, to place the blame for the non-removal of these Indians from the centre of the city of Victoria upon the proper shoulders. The first proposal was that the government of British Columbia should concur in the Dominion's conveying to the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company 19 acres of the reserve and in exchange for the remaining 93 acres procure a new location for the Indians, and bear the expense of removing them thereto, and rehabilitating them. My hon. friend will know what that 19 acres of land which is required by the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway means. Mr. Dunsmuir wanted the 19 acres fronting on the harbour for terminal facilities for his railway and the government here thought that in all justice he was entitled to receive it.

The second proposal was that they should agree to the Dominion government disposing of the whole of the reserve on the understanding that the Dominion government should procure a new reserve, remove the Indians thereto and rehabilitate them, the proceeds of the sale of the present reserve, less the cost of a new reserve and the expense of rehabilitating them, to be capitalized for the benefit of the Songhees Indians. In connection with this proposal Mr. McKenna pointed out that the provincial government would have as good a claim to a reversionary right to the capitalized proceeds of the sale of the land in the present reserve as they have in the land itself.

A perfectly fair proposal was made, but it was very promptly turned down by the provincial government. They refused positively to permit the government to remove the Indians on these terms. It was a fair proposal in the interests of the Indians and of both governments, because when lands, as my hon. friend says, are no longer required for an Indian reserve, in British Columbia at all events, they revert to the crown as represented by the province, and this proposition was simply that they would sell the reserve, and when the last Indian had disappeared, when the fund created was no longer required for the Indians, the fund itself would revert to the province.

The provincial government declined to agree to the first proposal, and on the second proposal being submitted offered to agree to the Dominion government's disposing of one-half of the present reserve, viz.: 56 acres, on the condition of its procuring a new reserve and bearing the expense of the removal and rehabilitation of the Indians, the provincial government to take the other half of the present reserve unburdened.

In other words, the provincial government wanted 56 acres at once. They made it an absolute condition that the Indians could not be removed unless they got one-half the reserve, a reserve worth, it is well known, anywhere between $100,000 and $150,000.

Mr. McKenna informed Mr. Turner that he could not accede to the proposal and that he found himself unable to offer any more liberal or feasible proposal than that already submitted by him, which provided for the removal of the Songhees Indians without any trouble or cost to the province and without the relinquishment of any provincial rights. The negotiations were, in consequence, broken off. Several communications were subsequently received from the British Columbia government expressing a desire to have action taken to bring about a settlement of the question, to which replies were sent to the effect that the second proposal submitted by Mr. McKenna was the fairest that could be made, and provided the most effective means of removing the Indians, and that as the government of the Dominion had done all that it properly could towards meeting the wishes of the government of British Columbia as to the removal of the Songhees Indians, the minister could not advise that the negotiations should be resumed. Then the Dunsmuir government came into power and on the 2nd Feb., 1901, the Hon. Jas. Dunsmuir, premier of British Columbia, submitted a proposition for the removal of the Songhees Indians. The proposition was, first, that the government of the Dominion would surrender absolutely to the province two portions of the reserve, one consisting of 17¼ acres and the other consisting of 25 acres, the remainder of the reserve to be sold. The money in the hands of the department, amounting to $9,820.20 and a further amount of $2,409, which should be paid in a short time for leasing privileges, together with the proceeds of that portion of the reserve to be sold, estimated to be worth from $100,000 to $125,000, to be utilized in removing and rehabilitating the Indians upon a new reserve, such reserve to be furnished by the provincial government free of cost in return for the land to be received by them.

The Dominion government would, under this arrangement, absolutely own the reserve; but if there were any surplus moneys after rehabilitating the Indians, as proceeds of the old reserve, the province would retain its reversionary right to such surplus. This proposition received the assent of the Minister of the Interior on the 7th June, 1901, and Mr. Dunsmuir was informed that the Indian superintendent had been asked to take the necessary steps to have the arrangement carried out if possible. Now, up to this time, during the years when both of these propositions were made, the first being refused by the provincial government, the second being made by the provincial government and being accepted by this government, the Indians on the reserve were, I understand, all willing to be removed to another reserve, but I am afraid a little different feeling at the present moment prevails among them. The Indian superintendent reported that he had seen Mr. Dunsmuir regarding this matter, who had expressed himself as being quite satisfied with the arrangement proposed. Four months later he stated that he had seen the premier in reference to the selection of a tract of land for the Songhees Indians, to be provided for them in lieu of their reserve in Victoria, should they consent to leave the latter. The premier informed him that what he thought would be a suitable place had been selected, and promised to drive out there some day with the Indian superintendent. But up to the present time no action has been taken by the British Columbia authorities.

My hon. friend will see that in so far as this government has been concerned, or in so far as it has taken any action in the matter, it desires to carry out the wishes of the people of the city of Victoria. The case of the Songhees is claimed to be peculiar in respect to the title to the land held by them. As stated in the decision of the joint commission appointed for allotment of reserves, in their communication, dated the 4th of May, 1898—

> The land reserves of these Indians in the harbour of Victoria appears to be the private property of the tribe by a written agreement made on the 30th of April, 1850, between the chiefs and people and the agent of the Hudson Bay Company, acting on behalf of the Crown, and by the land having been formally set apart for their perpetual use and benefit, but the commissioners so far as they have authority in the matter confirm the reserve as surveyed to the Songhees Indians.

I understand legal difficulties are cropping up, and in the city of Victoria numerous meetings are being held by the board of trade and city council discussing this question, and I am told the city solicitor has given the opinion that neither government could give a clear title to the land unless by concurrent legislation by both parliaments. As a resident of the city of Victoria, I quite concur with my hon. friend in saying that this nuisance, this evil to the Indians and this evil to the citizens of Victoria, should be terminated as soon as possible. I do not agree altogether with his method of removing the Indians. I am afraid he looks upon it as being too easily accomplished. It is a matter of very great difficulty indeed. But I think I can say for the government that no reasonable proposition, no proposition whatever that will protect the interests of the Indians, will be refused by the government at Ottawa. We are most anxious to remove the Indians. We will remove them at any time that the government of British Columbia can submit a reasonable or fair proposition. We have submitted several. We accepted one that they submitted, and they have failed thus far to carry out anything. We stand ready to-day to remove the Indians if it can be done. My hon. friend understands the difficulties very well indeed, but I am hopeful that if the matter is approached properly, if our friends in the city of Victoria—I mean the local government and the representatives of the city council—will deal with the matter in a proper spirit, if they do not want to get, for instance, for themselves all the land, if they respect the rights of the Indians and approach them, as I said before, in a proper spirit, there will be no difficulty encountered at Ottawa in removing the Indians from the centre of the city of Victoria.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The statement made by the hon. gentleman is very interesting and throws a great deal of light on the matter, but he must remember that I did not cast blame on this government in the smallest degree. I believe that any blame there is in the matter rests with the local government. One of the great reasons why the matter has not been settled is the demoralization of the local government during the last three or four years. The Turner government went out. Mr. Turner was a good business man, but after he went out Dunsmuir came in, and he had too many irons of his own in the fire, and then Mr. Prior came in, and then chaos. I think the local government is more to blame than the government at Ottawa. But the whole matter rests on this, if the government will absolutely surrender any right they have in the reserve ; let the province do the rest—rehabilitate the Indians and give them a reserve. I think it can be done as I propose. It would be very difficult to form any scheme that would meet the approval of everybody, and if my hon. friend disagrees with some of my propositions, I cannot expect otherwise. But I think, with some provision on those lines, enforced with firmness and determination, providing appropriate land for the Indians, with houses and a little money in hand, the matter could be easily arranged. I am satisfied it could be done with the co-operation of the two governments.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' ACT, 1899, AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the second reading of Bill (37) An Act to amend the Quebec Harbour Commissioners' Act, 1899. He said : This is merely to extend the limits of the port at Quebec. The pilots for the district below Quebec anchor now at Bic Island. It is proposed by this Bill to extend the limits of the port seventeen miles further down the river at Father Point. Incoming ships have to stop at Father Point to take on and put off the mails, and they have then again to stop when they come within the jurisdiction of the port of Quebec to take on pilots, as the pilots cannot go down to Father Point, being beyond the jurisdiction of the port. It is a simple Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LONDON AND ST. CLAIR RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (Windsor) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 32) An Act to incorporate the London and Saint Clair Railway Company.

He said : This Bill simply provides for the building of a railway from London, Ont., to a point on the St. Clair river. It is about sixty miles long and goes through the counties of Middlesex and Lambton.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PRINTING OF NORTHWEST PROVINCIAL AUTONOMY BILLS.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I beg to call attention to the fact that the Bills respecting the creation of the new provinces have not been submitted to us yet, although the newspapers pretend to publish them. I request the hon. Secretary of State to have them distributed as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are not printed yet. Only certain paragraphs have really been printed. It was late yesterday when many important paragraphs were finally settled, and therefore it was quite impossible to present it to-day. I hope that by to-morrow it will be printed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the ministers to the fact that the members of this House should be served before the public. The Bill was printed in the public press and distributed to the public, and we have nothing of it yet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that it has gone to the public. I am not aware that it has been printed in the proper form. Certain paragraphs were finally agreed upon. Up to a day or two ago the gentlemen from the Northwest were discussing certain clauses of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It must be printed as it was presented to the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it was not. The observations of the premier were made on the motion for leave to introduce the Bill. The Bill really had not been printed. There was leave given to introduce the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The leave to introduce the Bill was given last week.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well I have explained to the hon. gentleman. I have not seen a copy of it. I presume if it was printed I should know something about it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—From the explanation given by the hon. Secretary of State, the facts are probably that the Bill was discussed on the general principles, while the details were not yet decided. Is that the fact?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. I think the Minister of Justice was engaged at it. He asked to be allowed to remain away from the House and his object was to try and complete it. I hope it will be ready in a day or two.

The Senate adjourned.

THE GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVE ON THE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY BOARD.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to direct the attention of the hon. leader of the Senate to this paragraph, which is found in the Montreal 'Herald' of yesterday :—

Hon. Mr. Parent Resigns.

From the Board of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

Hon. S. N. Parent, premier of Quebec, who was last fall appointed as a representative of the Dominion government on the board of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has resigned that position. This step was due to his appointment to the chairmanship of the Construction Commission.

I should like to know from the hon. leader of this House if there is any truth in this statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I received an official letter from the Hon. Mr. Parent, I think about the 23rd, advising me that he had never accepted the office as a representative of the government of Canada on the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific; that he had never accepted any salary, that he had never performed any duty, and that he did not recognize that he really was appointed. I answered him acknowledging the letter, and stating that I had sent the paper to Council. Council on that cancelled the appointment and that is all I know of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the second part of the item.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I really know nothing of that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The second part says that he has been appointed president of the Construction Commission.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware of that. I have not heard of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could it be done without the hon. gentleman knowing it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It might. I keep pretty well informed of what is going on; still it is possible. I never heard of it until my hon. friend read it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—How is it that Mr. Parent states to-day that he never accepted the position and never acted under his appointment? He came to Winnipeg in his official capacity and remained there in that capacity.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I give you his statement in the letter to me. That is all I got.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That statement is not under oath.

PRINTING OF THE NORTHWEST PROVINCIAL AUTONOMY BILLS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to call the attention of the leader of this House to the fact that we are not provided yet with copies of the Bills respecting the new provinces in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nobody has them; they are not in the Distribution Office. They have not been distributed, I presume. I do not think they are printed yet. There is some delay about defining the boundaries. The members on both sides of the House who represent the Northwest Territories and the Senators, I think, were invited to confer together and try and agree on a division. They had not agreed yesterday at all events, and I am not aware that the divisions have yet been defined. They may be, however, without my knowledge, because I do not know what they have done in the last few hours. They had not agreed yesterday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As I understand, the Bill is not completed yet?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—So it should not have been presented to the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fancy that it was only a skeleton that was presented there.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—A skeleton?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hon. gentlemen know that very often an hon. gentleman introduces a Bill in blank. There were some paragraphs of it settled and read no doubt.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The rule of the House of Commons says:—

No Bill may be introduced either in blank or in imperfect shape.

I suppose the premier is violating the rules ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot explain it. My hon. friend is aware that rules are sometimes broken.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (35) An Act to incorporate the Georgian Bay and Sea-board Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. Power).

Bill (22) An Act respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed).

Bill (25) An Act respecting the Walkerton and Lucknow Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen).

Bill (27) An Act respecting certain patents of the Facer Solid Steel Car Wheel Company, of Perth, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Frost).

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the House adjourns it may be fair to state what I think might be accomplished in the way of an adjournment at a later date. In the week that follows next week, Ash Wednesday comes, and I thought, therefore, as under our present rule we will not now meet until Tuesday, if the House would sit Tuesday and Wednesday of next week we could then adjourn over until the Tuesday or Wednesday after Ash Wednesday, which would give a fortnight and enable hon. gentlemen from the lower provinces to make arrangements to go home. It is not likely there will be much business the latter part of next week. I know of no government measure but the Census Bill, and, therefore, such an adjournment would not cause any inconvenience to the public. A number of gentlemen have spoken to me suggesting this adjournment. If there were any business we would sit both Wednesday and Thursday of next week. I am not making a motion, but a proposition which I thought would meet the views of hon. gentlemen who have spoken to me on the subject. It would be only fair to hon. gentlemen who are absent to know whether an adjournment is in contemplation, and I therefore make this announcement The House can decide next week whether to adjourn or not.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have no objection to an adjournment after next Thursday. There is a divorce Bill before the Senate and the hearing of evidence in connection with it is fixed for Thursday next. The lawyers and witnesses are here and it would be unfair to put them to unnecessary expense, as we would do if we adjourned before taking the evidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand the Secretary of State, he is simply giving notice that if the business of the House will permit there may be an adjournment, but I assume our first duty is to attend to the business of the House if there is any business to be transacted.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—It is most important that word should be sent to senators who are in Prince Edward Island and who are making great effort to cross the straits.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will see that that is done.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is an extraordinary thing to ask this House to remain in session to suit the convenience of people who want a divorce.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing :—

1. Under section 6, chap. 101, Edward VII., the details of policies filed with the Superintendent of Insurance in certified schedule.

2. The last return made by the Mutual Reserve Life Association, of New York, made up to 31st December, 1904.

He said : This matter may seem trivial to a good many who have not looked into it, but I thought it well to let it stand over while the Finance Minister was away, because it was clearly in his department and his officials could only speak in his absence as they thought, not as he thought. They were not authorities and, as I supposed, no official in any department would have the weight and authority of a minister of the Crown, I did not think it an improper thing to allow it to stand. I have before me the Act passed last year giving relief. The House differed somewhat. I certainly differed with a good many, and a good many differed with me, and I believe the public differed with all hands. I think the public have very little to say. I am reminded of a remark made by some eminent statesmen in the United States some years ago, I forget who it was, but he said, 'Confound the public.' That is about the size of it. We did not agree and perhaps there was a little hard feeling over it, but I suppose that is all forgotten by this time. The Bill was passed in the interests of the public. It is chapter 101, 'An Act respecting the Canadian Assessment Policy-holders of the Mutual Reserve Life Association,' and it was stated in debate that this was going to be a safeguard to the public, and was saving the policy-holders. It was stated that those who were sustaining their case in the House had their rights as well as the public, and that if this Bill was passed it would bring their affairs so prominently before the country, that the public would be able to judge whether there was a grievance existing and decide what they should do. The Act provides that the company shall give the policy-holders three options which are very much like the pea under the three thimbles. They shift the thimbles round and it is hard to find the pea, or they shift the pea around and you don't know which thimble it is under. Under those options they had to make a return to parliament stating what they were to do to the policy-holders, whether they would reduce their policies, whether they would increase their premiums or allow them to go into a new line of business, a new company, that they had incorporated under another name, but before they could do this they had to lay before the department—and the Insurance Department is not superior to parliament yet—a statement giving the dates of the policies, what reduction they would make if they decided to pay, or what the company would charge them if they continued with the same amount of insurance, and that had to be filed within a given date before they could get a certificate to allow them to proceed doing business. I inquired in the House when they applied. I asked if they had complied with the law and filed this schedule. I was assured they had, and had no reason to disbelieve the statement. My hon. friend the Secretary of State brought down a sheet of paper, one page, showing a portion of their business, and stated that, as he was informed by the Insurance Department, they had conformed to the law on November 2, and had their license granted them on the 3rd, I think. Now, from the 10th day of August, when the Act was passed and became law, to the 2nd day of November is not quite three months. They could prepare a statement giving valuations from the actuaries' standpoint, not simply copying from a ledger, not copying from a day book or anything, but giving actual computations by an actuary of the value of those policies, and in eleven weeks they filed it here, according to the Act, with the Insurance Department, but the Insurance Department informed my hon. friend the Secretary of State that it would take them a year simply to copy it. I think they misled my hon. friend. Of course it was not his department, and he is not responsible for their doings. How could this company prepare that statement, actual valuation, the most complicated matter that probably could be made up, in eleven weeks and yet the department be occupied a whole year in copying it? Now I take exception to that—very great exception—because what the company has done in eleven weeks, these other people should be able to do in three or four weeks. My hon. friend was informed by them that the superintendent regarded it as confidential. I have searched Bourinot and all the authorities and cannot find that any such paper brought down in that way, can be confidential. Papers, letters received by ministers of the Crown, something semi-confidential of course may be brought down or not, just as the minister pleases, or as he deems proper to submit to the public, but when you come down to an Act of parliament calling for returns to be made before they can obtain a license to do business, it cannot be confidential. Any law court in the land can insist on that paper being produced in court. In a lawsuit, the court would compel the production and yet parliament, the High Court of Canada, is informed, not by the Secretary of State, not by the department, but by the Superintendent of Insurance, that he regards it as confidential.

Now, that is what I take exception to. There is no attack on the department, and no attack on my hon. friend; but when a member of this House asks for information he has a right to get it, not for the sake of this House alone, but that the public may see that, following up the legislation of last year, some respect has been paid for the law and for those who called for it. The public should be in a position to judge whether the company, having complied with the law and made the return to the Superintendent of Insurance, occupied a proper position in this country. It would sound very badly if it should go abroad that the inspector thinks such a return is confidential. There are three parties interested in this—the aggrieved party, the party trying to help the aggrieved and the company who do not wish it to come out, I presume, and their philanthropic friend in the department, who says their communication is confidential. What are you going to do about it? We are blundering along with our eyes shut; case after case is going against the company in England, and they have to refund the money. The Massachusetts legislature has recently cancelled their license. I do not propose to dwell upon that now, or to touch upon it further, because I shall have some resolution to offer to this House before the end of the session which will bring that to the attention of the Senate and the public generally. Perhaps if my hon. friend the Secretary of State would ask the Finance Minister, he might not have any objection to have the return brought down; or if he would allow me to go over it and examine it myself I would do so, in accordance with the rule that where papers are confidential a member who is interested in them may have an opportunity of examining them. I think my hon. friend understands me. Perhaps if he will let this stand until he consults the Finance Minister, that may be done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to call his attention to the notice of my hon. friend and see what he says. The answer of Mr. Fitzgerald might perhaps have had reference more to the second paragraph. The first paragraph reads :

1. Under section 6, chap. 101, Edward VII., the details of policies filed with the Superintendent of Insurance in certified schedule.

That, I think I heard the hon. gentleman say, was limited to those filed within the last three months ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The next paragraph reads :

2. The last return made by the Mutual Reserve Life Association, of New York, made up to 31st December, 1904.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—You bring that down every year, do you not ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I brought a page of the return that I supposed was asked for, and they told me there were 300 pages of the same kind, and it would certainly take a clerk a couple of years to copy it all, and what Mr. Fitzgerald said was this : that when those papers were filed here they related to foreign matters, and it was on the distinct understanding that the information was not to be given to the public, and that similar information affecting other companies is not given to the public. That is the reason he assigned. I will see Mr. Fielding, however, on the subject.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—We had better let it stand for the present.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Until after the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved that the debate be adjourned until the fifteenth of March.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I am requested by certain policy-holders of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association to put a question to the leader of the House with regard to the printing of the report of the investigation made last year. It was understood that a certain number of copies were to be printed and distributed among the members of this House and other copies printed for the benefit of the public generally. The reason that I bring this matter now to the attention of the Senate is that I have received the following letter :

Office of Albert Sowles,
Swanton, Vt., Feb. 25, 1905.

Hon. H. J. Cloran, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

My dear Sir,—I have before me some meagre extracts of the result of an investigation, last year, by parliament of the position of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, of New York. I now beg to say that I am one of the victims of that concern and would like to get more light from the evidence taken by the select committee of which you were the chairman. I understand the evidence, together with the report of the committee, has been issued as a parliamentary paper, consisting of a book of some 650 pages. I beg to inquire if you can send me by mail the book as I am informed it gives some very instructive information as to the positions and rights of those policy-holders who took out policies prior to 1897. I get my information largely through the Hon. H. S. Foster, of 122 Victoria Street, Westminster, London, S. W.

I remain, dear Sir,
Your very obedient servant,
ALBERT SOWLES.

So far, as chairman of that committee and a member of the Senate, I have not had a copy of the report of that investigation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was it ordered to be printed by the Printing Committee ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It was the order of the House when the committee was appointed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am just advised by the clerk that Mr. Young has some copies of the report.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I should consider it Mr. Young's duty to distribute them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is some time ago, and I have not charged my memory with what was done. I do not keep track of all these things. A gentleman behind me says they were distributed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The gentleman behind the hon. gentleman is not the whole House. I was chairman of the committee, and I have not seen any copy of it yet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make further inquiry about it.

THE APPENDICES TO THE JOURNALS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know when the official documents of the House are to be printed ? I think they are three years behind now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What official documents ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All the documents which are supposed to be bound annually and sent to the members.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my hon. friend will state what they are I will make some inquiries. If he will give me definite information I will see about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I refer to the documents of the session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What session ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The sessions since 1902.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman refers to the appendices, I presume ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Last year the Printing Bureau was taxed to its fullest extent. They were at work night and day upon the voters' lists and then it was necessary to get the reports printed. As hon. gentlemen know the capacity of the Printing Bureau is very limited, and although all the staff was put on that could be crowded into the building, still it was impossible to keep up with the demands upon the bureau. I will make inquiry about the appendices.

CENSUS AND STATISTICS BUREAU BILL.

SECOND READING.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (5) An Act respecting the Census and Statistics. He said : The measure which I have the honour to submit for your consideration is mainly a consolidation of three existing statutes, the Census Act, the Criminal Statistics Act and an Act respecting Statistics. You will observe that two new clauses, 3 and 4, are introduced to provide for the establishment of a permanent census office and the appointment of the necessary staff. With respect to the general purport of the reason for introducing the Act, I may say it has been found, now that we have a quinquennial census for the purpose of ascertaining the population of Manitoba and the new provinces in the Northwest, that it would be very much more convenient to have a permanent bureau instead of being obliged to create a new staff for the purpose of taking our decennial census on each occasion. As a practical matter of fact, as probably my hon. friend the hon. leader of the opposition knows, the census work covers at least four or five years from the time the census is supposed to be taken, and another year is usually consumed making the necessary preparations for it ; consequently, when you add to that the time required to take the quinquennial census of the new provinces, which will now be a matter of considerable labour and importance, it is obvious that of the ten years which elapse from one census to another, very nearly seven are consumed in the task of preparing for the census or supervising the various statistics collected at that time, or taking the quinquennial census, and the Minister of Agriculture is strongly of the opinion that the public interests would be promoted by the creation of a public bureau. As to the minor details, which are, with the exception of the two clauses I have referred to, almost a re-enactment of the three statutes I have mentioned, I presume those can be more conveniently discussed when the Bill is referred to a Committee of the Whole. Of course, if there is any additional information that hon. gentlemen desire to receive, I will either give it or obtain it as the case may be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. gentleman tell us what the probable extra expense will be attending the establishment of this bureau ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As far as I am advised, it will be about twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars a year, according to the computation of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will it have the effect of reducing the labour that casually follows the taking of the census every ten years ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—To some extent, I would think it will, but it is intended likewise, I may say for the information of my hon. friend, to utilize this bureau for the purpose of collecting information between the years of the two decennial periods, of 1901, say, to 1911 ; but it is hoped that it will very considerably reduce the expenditure for taking the decennial census.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

FORMATION OF A FEDERAL DISTRICT AT OTTAWA.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called :

Hon. Mr. BERNIER (in the absence of Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville), moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a copy of all correspondence between the government and the Ottawa corporation, relative to the formation of a federal district.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF NEW YORK MUTUAL RESERVE COMMITTEE REPORT.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I might say, in connection with the matter of printing the report of the sub-committee on the New York Mutual Reserve Life Association, I mentioned to the hon. leader of the House yesterday that the report had been printed, and my statement was challenged. I want to say, as Chairman of the Printing Committee, that the statement I made to the hon. Secretary of State was correct, that every hon. member of this House, as well as every member of the other House, received copies of the printed report and that there are to-day in the hands of Mr. Young, who has the custody of those documents, over 300 printed copies, so that any hon. gentleman who wishes to get more copies may do so on application to him.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Do I understand, from the explanation offered by the hon. senator, that bound copies of the report of the investigation and of the proceedings of that committee were distributed to each member of this honourable House ? Do I understand that to be his statement ?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The statement I am making to the House is the statement made to me by the gentleman who has charge of these matters. Everything that is printed in connection with this committee was sent to every hon. member of this House as well as every hon. member of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—As chairman of that committee, I may state that I have received neither the report to this honourable House nor the printed copy of the investigation, and I believe there are many other members in the same position as myself.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend, who sometimes poses as a mentor of this House, possibly properly, speaks of the report, he means the evidence. The evidence was printed, but the report was brought up here and, for some reason, some peculiar circumstance or another, remained undisposed of. Now there is where the difference lies. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Gibson) asserts that the report was printed and circulated, while my hon. friend opposite means that the evidence only was printed. He is perfectly correct in saying that the report was never printed and never distributed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My remembrance is that the report was never adopted by the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But the substance of the report was introduced into the speeches of one or two hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The report was never adopted, but this honourable House ordered that when the evidence had been taken and the report made, it should be printed. Neither one nor the other has been done as far as I am aware of.

THE RESIGNATION OF THE MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the leader of the government, whether there is any truth in the ominous rumour about the streets of the resignation of some of the cabinet. It is said that the difficulty has arisen over that very vexed question, the school question, of which we have heard something in the past—that it is disturbing the quietude of the cabinet at the present time, and that some members of the cabinet have retired on account of the policy adopted by the government. Can my hon. friend inform the Senate of the facts concerning that rumour ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The fact is that Mr. Sifton, Minister of the Interior, has sent in his resignation. I will read the letter he has addressed to the premier :

Ottawa, February 27th, 1905.

Dear Sir Wilfrid,—After giving my best consideration to the matters which we discussed last evening, I have arrived at the conclusion that it is impossible for me to continue in office under present circumstances, and that it is better for all concerned that I should act at once. I, therefore, beg to tender my resignation as a member of the government, I trust that the unhappy necessity which has arisen will not in the least impair the friendship with which you have been kind enough to honour me.

Believe me,
Yours most faithfully,
CLIFFORD SIFTON.

Right Honourable
Sir Wilfrid Laurier,
G.C.M.G.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE.

The reply is as follows :

Ottawa, February 28th, 1905.

My Dear Sifton,—I received yesterday your letter of same date, whereby you tender me your resignation as a member of the government.

There is no alternative for me, but to accept it, and with much regret, it will be my duty to place it in the hands of His Excellency.

After our conversation of the other day, I had left you with the impression that the differences between us were more of words than substance, and until I received your letter, I had cherished the hope that it would be possible ere this, to find a comparatively easy solution.

Whilst I feel more regret than I can express at this termination of our official relations, let me assure you that should our old friendship ever be impaired, the fault will not be mine.

Yours very sincerely,
WILFRID LAURIER.

The Honourable
Clifford Sifton,
Ottawa.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The explanation is satisfactory as far as it goes, but no reason is assigned for the resignation. Mr. Sifton speaks of matters which he had discussed with the premier, but does not say what they are. I notice also that the reply sent by the premier to Mr. Sifton is equally non-committal, that there is no reason given. Could the hon. gentleman tell us what the point is upon which these gentlemen differed, or rather the point upon which the retiring minister differed from the cabinet ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have had no conversation with Mr. Sifton and no explanation beyond what his letter conveys other than what I understand—which may or may not be correct—that he differs from the premier on the language of the education clause in the Autonomy Bills for the two new provinces. That is what I understand ; it may or may not be correct ; there may be other grounds that I know not of.

THE MINISTERIAL CRISIS OF 1896.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With the consent of the Senate, as we have had one ministerial explanation affecting the present government, I take this opportunity to deal with ministeral difficulties which occurred some years ago. It is with extreme reluctance that I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a short time, to enable me to call attention to certain statements which

I learn, through the public press and from other sources, have been made in the House of Commons relative to events which occurred in the years 1895 and 1896, known as the ministerial crisis of that period. It is unusual to revive and discuss ministerial explanations of this character which were fully laid before both branches of the legislature some nine years ago, nor should I now were it not in self defence, but as statements have been made, and additional light pretended to be thrown upon those events, which directly and indirectly affect my honour as a public man, I must, therefore, be excused if I deal with them in a plain and unvarnished manner. As a result of the statements to which I have referred I find in the 'Sun' of St. John, N.B., a letter written by its Ottawa correspondent, of date February 12, commenting upon the debate in parliament, the following paragraph, which renders an explanation from me absolutely necessary, unless I were content to allow the misrepresentations to become record of parliament, without explanation or denial, which I do not propose to do. The correspondent says:

> The facts that the resignation of the famous seven was preceded by the resignations of Messrs. Ouimet and Caron; that Sir Charles Tupper sailed from England, not actuated by ambitions of his own and not induced by the machinations of conspirators in the cabinet, but at the request of Sir Mackenzie Bowell himself; that Sir Mackenzie Bowell entered into an agreement with his colleagues to resign in Sir Charles' favour, and that his failure to keep that agreement after Sir Charles' arrival, though he must have known his retention of office was killing the Conservative party, forced his colleagues, with whom the agreement was made to resign as the only way of making him keep it.

I should have called attention to these statements at an earlier date had my colleague, the Hon. Mr. Ferguson, who was a member of the cabinet at that time, been present. As he is not likely, owing to a snow blockade, to be here for some time, I do not deem it proper to delay explanation any longer.

I see it is reported that a debate took place in the House of Commons on the 10th of this month, in which the Hon. Sir William Mulock, Postmaster General, the Hon. George E. Foster, the Hon. John Haggart, and Mr. George Taylor took part. With the exchange of doubtful compliments between these gentlemen I have nothing to do, but I cannot allow the statements made by the latter three gentlemen to pass without calling attention to them and placing upon record a distinct and positive contradiction and denial of many of them. The discussion to which I refer arose out of a charge made by the Hon. Sir William Mulock, that the Hon. Geo. E. Foster with others had in 1896 played traitors to their chief, the premier of Canada at that time, and that the premier had denounced them as a 'nest of traitors.' To justify the course then pursued by what are now known as the 'bolters,' Mr. Foster declared he was justified in resigning on account of a difference of opinion on the policy of the government. Mr. Haggart justified his and Mr. Foster's action upon that occasion on account of an alleged violation of promises which he says were made by myself, and not fulfilled, which Mr. Taylor, to a limited extent, attempted to confirm, not one word of which, as I shall show before sitting down, is correct, or, in plainer language, true. It is difficult to understand why such statements were made after a lapse of nine years, unless believing the events of 1895-6 were forgotten, or that the great majority of those who were addressed knew nothing whatever of the facts, therefore their hearers could be the more easily misled and deceived.

Had Mr. Foster confined his explanations of why he and his fellow bolters left the government to that given in the House of Commons on the 16th day of January, 1896, I should never have deemed it worthy of further notice, but when he gave other and incorrect reasons, it becomes my duty, not only to call attention to them, but to prove out of his own mouth and from his own utterances that he had little regard, when making his last explanation, for facts as they appear upon the record. When he told the people of Toronto at the last Dominion election that he left the government on account of differences of opinions on questions of policy, and that His Excellency the Governor General, knowing the facts, called them back into the government, he knew he was telling what was not correct. I have in my hand copies of the report of speeches delivered by him in Toronto during the last Dominion election as reported in the 'Globe' the 'News' and 'Mail,' in which I find, that he in reply to questions put to him, said among other things, 'when asked why he left the government', that he did not purpose to answer the question, that belonging to the Privy Council, and that his mouth was shut, but added that on all points of importance they must have a union of ideas, and that any one disagreeing must resign. That he said was all they had done. Continuing, he said, 'when a member of the cabinet or members disagreed with their leader they had done as they were bound on their honour to do—resigned.' In another speech he said 'the Governor had been quite satisfied with the reasons for the resignation of six ministers on a question of policy, and had shown his confidence in them by reappointing them later.' That did not satisfy his hearers one of whom exclaimed 'that still leaves the question unanswered.' 'Why did you resign?' To which Mr. Foster replied 'I don't intend to answer. I am not at liberty to reveal the secrets of the Privy Council'—an ingenious way of evading an answer. The fact is, the reasons given in the House of Commons for his resigning were never discussed in the Privy Council before he resigned, therefore, he had no oath to respect in that particular. He had, however, the consent of the Governor General to make a statement from his seat in the Commons giving his reasons for leaving the cabinet, which reasons were read from a carefully prepared typewritten document, the result of a conference, after mature deliberation with those with whom he was acting. In that carefully prepared document, there is not a single word of explanation about a divergence of opinion upon questions of policy; on the contrary, he declared for himself and his colleagues that there was no divergence of opinion on questions of policy, that in fact they were all a unit upon that point. His and their reasons, you will observe, when I read from the official record were solely of a personal character and not one of policy.

Before referring to similar statements repeated in the House of Commons by Mr. Foster I deem it but right, in self justification, to lay before the Senate the fact that friends of the Conservative party in the north riding of Toronto, finding it difficult to rally a number of them to the polls on account of the events of 1895-6, and the part played therein by Mr. Foster, wrote urging me to send letters which could be read in support of his candidature, which I declined to do, giving my reasons therefor in the following letter which, I may add, was not published:

Belleville, October 28th, 1904.

My Dear Sir,—I owe you an apology for not replying to your letter at an earlier date. The fact is I was out of the city when it arrived but was reminded of its existence on receipt of your telegram.

If you will take the trouble to read the reports of Foster's speeches as they appear in the 'Globe,' 'News' and 'Mail,' I do not think you will ask me to write any such letter as suggested by you.

His answers to questions are absolutely untrue. He told the audience that there were differences of opinion in the cabinet upon questions of policy which led to his and colleagues resignation. This is not the fact. The reasons given by him in the Commons in justification of his action make no mention of differences of opinion upon questions of policy. The best evidence of which and of the untruthfulness of his statement is found in the fact that he and his fellow conspirators were to come back into the fold without any stipulation as to change of policy.

His dragging the Governor General's name into the discussion is most unwarrantable, knowing as he did, that the Governor General acted solely on my advice. I have no desire, however, to enter into a controversy upon this subject.

I humilated myself quite enough by taking them back. It was done in what I considered the interest of the party then, and have regretted it ever since. I do not propose to repeat it by writing such a letter as you suggest. I may be all he and his chums say I am, but I have not yet lost self respect.

I am content to let him alone to fight his own battles but decline further to demean myself by asking my friends to put confidence in him which I do not entertain myself.

You will pardon my writing this plainly. I do so, believing it best to be frank with friends.

Yours sincerely,
MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Not satisfied with excusing his resignation on the question of policy in Toronto, when addressing the electors, he became bolder when replying to the charges hurled at him by Sir William Mulock of being a 'traitor.' He exclaimed:

Am I not to be allowed to leave the government if I differ from it on points of policy or principle? Is a man to be branded as no gentleman because, differing from what is the policy and principle of his government he leaves it?

Again:

At whatever time a member of the government feels that he is out of accord with his premier and the government of which he is a member on points of policy or administration, he has a perfect right to send in his resignation.

He continued :

Suppose my hon. friend came to the conclusion that he could not agree with his premier on some line of public policy, would he have violated his standard of gentlemanly conduct if he had frankly told the premier so and left ?

And then he triumphantly exclaimed :

The Governor General made us again members of the following government without stain and without reproach.

How far are these statements true, as to the reasons given by him, for him resigning ? Let me put him in the witness box to answer the question. Turn to the carefully prepared document committed to writing by himself, approved by his colleagues in the plot, and you will read as follows :

I may say in the first place there is no disagreement between ourselves and the premier upon any question of public policy, trade or constitutional, with regard to which action has been already taken, or in respect to which an attitude has been assumed by the government under the present premier. I beg also to say that we retain our firm belief in the principles and policy of the Liberal-Conservative party with which we are in entire accord, and of which, in common with others we have been and will remain the exponents in so far as our ability admits. We have lost none of our confidence in the sound and healthy condition of the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada, or of our belief that it embodies a policy which the majority of the electorate considers essential to the continued welfare and progress of the country, or of our faith that under firm and prudent leadership it will come back triumphant from the polls.

Here I might rest that point in my case, he himself having given the answer to his own declaration that he and his followers left the cabinet on a question of policy, and leave the country to judge between us. He did, however, give a reason for resigning and it was that he and those with whom he was acting had no confidence in my ability to lead, upon that point I have no quarrel ; it is an opinion they had a right to hold, and act upon if they believed it. Even upon that point I shall show by their own utterances delivered in public that they did not believe what they said : if they did, then that which they said to the electors was told to deceive. They can take which horn of the dilemma they choose. Now let me read the real reasons given by them for leaving the cabinet. They are as follows :

Though with many misgivings we agreed to enter the government under Mr. Bowell in succession to Sir John Thompson, we have nevertheless unitedly and loyally striven to the best of our ability to make it strong and efficient and it has been with growing regret that we have seen our efforts in a measure of success less than that for which we had hoped and striven. We are of the opinion that the Liberal-Conservative party ought to be represented by the strongest government possible to be secured from its ranks, but necessity therefor was never greater than under existing circumstances, and we believe that such a government can be formed without delay. This we have repeatedly urged upon the premier with the result that we found ourselves face to face with parliament having a government with its numbers incomplete, and with no assurance that the present premier could satisfactorily complete it. Under these circumstances we thought it our duty to retire, and in this manner to pave the way if possible for the formation of a government whose premier could command the confidence of all his colleagues, could satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that its strongest element were at its head and impress the country that it had a government which was united and had power to govern. We affirm with the utmost sincerity that the action we have taken has sprang from no feeling of personal dislike or personal ambition, but has been solely dictated by our wish to sink all minor considerations in the presence of our great desire that the best interest of our country should be duly conserved.

Compare this statement with the utterences of Foster and Montague in public speeches delivered by them at Smith's Falls on November 15, 1895, and acquiesced in by Haggart, who was present at the time ; and at Orangeville on the 7th of December, 1895, a short time before reading their explanation in the House of Commons, for resigning. Mr. Foster said :

2. They had perhaps learned from the Grit press that their government at Ottawa was disunited and demoralized. Having reassured him as they had that the Conservative party outside of Ottawa was in good health, he was there to demonstrate to them with his two colleagues that were present. Dr. Montague was there also. And also for those that were not present that the Conservative government now as of old was a government which was united on its different lines of policy without a shred of disunion.

The 'Mail' in its report of the speech, adds :

He bestowed a warm eulogy upon Sir Mackenzie Bowell whose character after seventeen years administration of one of the greatest departments of the government had not shown one trace of dishonesty or incapacity.

Then during the Cardwell election, which took place not long after, Dr. Montague, also a member of the cabinet, spoke as follows :

For seventeen years Sir Mackenzie Bowell had been an honoured member of the government who had successfully administered the affairs of his department. During all these seventeen years not one mark could be placed against Sir Mackenzie's honesty either as a minister or as a public man. Not only that but the premier had always favoured the broadest lines of policy, had always supported plans for Canadian progress and development. In addition to that first as minister, and now as premier he had invariably supported the strengthening of the ties which bound them to the dear old motherland.

Again I leave the public to judge between us.

Now let me devote a short time to that exemplary statesman the Hon. John Haggart who rushed to the defence of his leader, Mr. Foster, with a reckless valor worthy of a much better cause. Their position was desperate and therefore required a desperate defence. In his bold recklessness he made so many charges and drew so largely on his imagination, in a short speech, that it will require some little time to analyse and dissect them. He commenced by telling Sir William Mulock that :

If the hon. gentleman knew all the facts in relation to it he would be one of the first to justify his hon. friend from North Toronto.

Adding that :

A correct statement has never been made of that affair, but very likely would be made shortly.

From what transpired it is quite clear that Sir William knows enough of the 'facts' to enable him to form a correct opinion of the conduct of these gentlemen in the years 1895-6. If not he will be further enlightened after reading this statement. A 'correct statement has never been made of the affair', says Mr. Haggart, 'but very likely it will be made shortly.' If so it will never emanate from a historian of the Baron Munchausen type of John Haggart.

He next refers to the retirement of the late 'Mr. Clarke Wallace, then member for one of the Yorks.' 'Afterwards Mr. Angers,' he says, 'left the government,' then two other French gentlemen, Mr. Ouimet and Sir Adolphe Caron, followed suit. They all had a right to do it : they resigned from the government. He then attempts to show that the position taken by these gentlemen was similar to that taken by himself and those who left the government with him in 1896. The retirement of these gentlemen was altogether of a different character and for reasons different from those given by Mr. Foster and those for whom he spoke.

Mr. Wallace before retiring waited upon me, and asked if it were the intention of the government to persist in their policy of remedial legislation ; if so, he added, he could not be a party to it. My reply was, that the policy of the government, as he knew, was, to push the question to a final issue, if no amicable agreement could be reached with the Manitoba government, and therefore he was, so long as he remained in the government, though not of the cabinet, responsible. His reply was to the effect, that he could not support such a policy, upon which declaration I told him the only course left to him was to retire, which he did by telegram from the west a few days after. In this, he acted not only within his right, but honourably and in consonance with his views upon the question.

In the case of the Hon. Messrs, Angers, Ouimet and Sir Adolphe Caron, the step taken by these gentlemen was based upon a question of policy. They believed and urged the advisability and necessity of immediate action being taken by the introduction of a Remedial Bill, having for its object the restoration of the rights of which the minority in Manitoba had, in their and in the opinion of the government, been deprived. As head of the government I differed from these gentlemen believing that every step should be first taken to induce the government of Manitoba to make such concessions as would prove satisfactory to the minority before the Dominion parliament should be asked to invoke its power and authority under the constitution, to redress the wrong. This more moderate course was suggested after reading the reply of the Manitoba government to a despatch sent to them from Ottawa, in which they had put a construction upon the wording of the despatch which was never intended by us and which we contended it did not properly bear. I also pointed out to them the strong feeling which existed in Ontario and in other parts of the Dominion against any interference with the legislation of Manitoba upon the question of education, and that until every possible means of an amicable understanding between the two governments has been exhausted, and failed, it would be impolitic and unwise to take the final step of remedial legislation. That in fact the feeling in Ontario fanned, as it was, by the Liberal press, and by Liberals generally, was as strong against interference with Manitoba's legislation, as the feeling in Quebec was in favour of interference, and therefore it was not only wise but judicious to move cautiously in the matter. The reasonableness of this course was ultimately concurred in by Messrs. Caron and Ouimet, but not by Mr. Angers, who for reasons which he gave from his seat in the Senate, declined to re-enter the cabinet unless immediate action was taken by the government in re remedial legislation. Messrs. Caron and Ouimet, on being assured that if the Manitoba government, after considering our reply to their despatch in which it was contended they had misunderstood and misinterpreted, did not give a favourable answer, a Remedial Bill would be introduced immediately on the re-assembly of the next session of parliament, withdrew their resignation. It is but justice, however, to Mr. Angers to add, that he declared he had no confidence in any concessions being made by the Greenway government, nor had he confidence in some others whom he mentioned, and therefore it was but a waste of time to further postpone action. For these reasons he refused to withdraw his resignation and assume the responsibility of delay. How he was rewarded for his fidelity, by those for whom he had sacrificed position and power, I need not detail. His reward was defeat at the hands of those for whom he had sacrificed much, while Sir Adolphe Caron who had been left out of the cabinet formed by Sir Charles Tupper, through the machinations of the Foster-Haggart combination was returned to parliament by a large majority. The attempt of Mr. Haggart to place the conduct of these gentlemen on a par with his own and those with whom he acted has neither reason nor foundation; in fact, the one was honourable and constitutional, while theirs was neither the one nor the other. A full explanation of these resignations and causes which led to them, and the reasons for their withdrawal can be learned on referring to the Senate Debates of 1895, pages 657 to 678 inclusive, which I do not deem necessary to quote or repeat here. What they are is well known to Mr. Haggart, unless, as in many others things he can conveniently forget.

He next refers to Sir Charles Tupper's return to Canada, and with an apparent innocence says:

> I cannot say how he came out here. My own idea is that he came out at the request of Sir Mackenzie Bowell and some of his colleagues in the government.

Here is another instance in which he finds it convenient to forget. He knows that he and the other members of the cabinet were consulted, and that both he and Mr. Foster objected to the return, at the time, of Sir Charles to Canada. In the light of subsequent events their reasons can be divined. The facts are that at that time negotiations were pending between Canada and the imperial government on the question of a fast line of steamers between Canada and England, and that Sir Charles Tupper was urging the home government to grant aid to that scheme in the way of a mail subsidy. The correspondence was being conducted by cablegram, and Sir Charles suggested that if he were in Canada, a more satisfactory understanding of the case could be arrived at than by cable communication. I concurred in that view and laid it before my colleagues, all agreeing except the two gentlemen to whom I have already referred. I acted on my own view of the case and wired Sir Charles to come to Canada. What followed it is unnecessary in this connection to retail, nor is it necessary for me now to give the conclusions at which I have since arrived, as to the reasons why these gentlemen were opposed to Sir Charles' return to Canada. The whole facts as Mr. Haggart says may all be told at some period in the not far distant future. I cannot but express the profound gratitude which I felt on reading the next sentence in that gentleman's defence of his leader Mr. Foster, in which he, in dulcet tones, childlike and bland, that ever distinguish the meek and enchanting voice of that honourable and gentle gentleman, thus referred to myself He said 'I have no objection to that honourable gentleman. I have the kindliest feelings for him.' Who could not sleep happy after such a declaration coming from such a source ? That is, if he were not reminded one of Æsop's fables, in which is related the kindness of the rustic who took the torpid viper to his bosom, warmed him into life, and then in return for his kindness had the poisonous fangs of the reptile plunged into his bosom.

The most audacious statement of this gentleman is the following utterance :

> It was with the consent of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, as well as the rest of his colleagues, that Sir Charles Tupper was asked to form a government. All were loyal to Sir Mackenzie Bowell until it was known by his colleagues that he was a party to Sir Charles Tupper taking the leadership of the Conservative party. From day to day, from time to time, like a sick girl hanging on to life, he did not carry out his resignation as his colleagues in the cabinet expected of him.

The statements made in the above extract are so far from the truth that language fails to properly characterize them. For what these gentlemen may have conjured up in their own minds I am not responsible. That they wished Sir Charles Tupper to form a government, and that I should retire is quite correct. I neither sent for, nor did I give consent to Sir Charles forming a government at that time, nor at any other time. So far from that statement being correct, I declined to give advice when tendering my resignation after the session to His Excellency, as to the gentleman who should be asked to form a government. It is true that I had interviews with Sir Charles after the bolters had resigned, but not before. It was at these interviews that arrangements were made for the recalcitrants to re-enter the cabinet, at which no promise was made by me, nor agreement entered into that I should retire and leave the field clear for him. On the contrary I told Sir Charles that in taking the gentlemen back, it must be distinctly understood that it was done without any pledge or promise from me as to my future action. It would be untrue, were I to say I had not, even at that time, made up my mind as to the course I intended to take after the pledge which I had given to my loyal colleagues in re the Remedial Bill, had been fully fulfilled. It is quite correct that I was a party to Sir Charles Tupper taking the leadership of the Conservative party in the Commons, but that was after the arrangement had been agreed to that those who had resigned should be taken back into the cabinet, not before. It was so understood when Sir Charles consented to enter the cabinet under my leadership, as premier. His statement that 'from day to day, from time to time, like a sick girl hanging on to life, he did not carry out his resignation as his colleagues in the cabinet expected of him,' is untrue, so far as it affects the non-bolting portion of the cabinet. Those in the cabinet who remained loyal after the conspirators had left, know it to be untrue. From day to day, they were informed what was transpiring. They knew, and so did the gentleman (for such I must term him in parliamentary language) who now prates about a 'sick girl' after my explanation had been made in the Senate, that I was anxious to be relieved of further responsibility, and to rid myself of further intercourse and association with those who had in a most unprecedented manner played the part of traitors. Turn to page 16 of the official Debates of the Senate of 1896, and it will be seen that I used the following language in explanation of the reason why I had not resigned :

> I beg to state that after several interviews with the Governor General respecting the resignation of seven of my colleagues in the cabinet, I yesterday waited upon His Excellency for the purpose of tendering my resignation. His Excellency intimated that he was not at that moment prepared to receive it. The chief reason for this attitude on the part of His Excellency, is that the speech from the Throne, although presented to parliament has not yet been considered, nor an expression of an opinion given by parliament upon it. It is regarded by His Excellency as unfitting that the premier, as head of the administration, should not have a full opportunity of reviewing the situation and testing the feelings of parliament thereon.

Yet in the face of this record the Commons was told by Mr. Haggart, that 'like a sick girl hanging on to life,' I from day to day continued to cling to office. This, however, is but a fair specimen of his whole tirade of misrepresentations of the events of that day which left a stain upon the political escutcheon of the Conservative party which will never be effaced so long as these gentlemen are accepted and recognized as members of it, not on account of their desire to depose a premier, but on account of the time and manner of attempting to accomplish it.

'My friend,' exclaimed Mr. Haggart, 'had nothing to gain, he was getting no promotion, nor was I.' Quite true that at that time he was getting no promotion, but can it be truthfully said that he was to get no promotion when the conspiracy was hatching long before Sir Charles Tupper's return to Canada ? Facts which have since transpired and to which I shall call attention later on, lead to a different conclusion. 'From that moment to the present day' says Mr. Haggart, 'I have never felt sorry for what I did at that time.'

This I believe, knowing from years of association, that he is incapable of being 'sorry' for anything he ever did. There is this marked difference between us : I do regret, and that, too, sincerely, the events of that period ; and that for which I feel most 'sorry' and which will last so long as I live, is that I ever consented to recommend to His Excellency the return to the cabinet of Mr. Haggart and those with whom he was associated in the plot. It was done in what I then considered to be the interest of the Conservative party ; subsequent events have convinced me it was a fatal political error, never to be repeated.

Mr. George Taylor, M.P., for South Leeds, who took part in the discussion, rose to give his version of one of the events of that period to which I shall call attention before closing, and told the House of Commons, that Sir William Mulock was not justified in attributing to me the use of the word 'nest of traitors' as he had never seen it published, but added 'some words escaped me when in a passion.' This, to say the least of it, is charitable. I may now say I have no recollection of using the words 'nest of traitors' at the time to which Sir William refers. I may add, however, that if I did use them, I was justified in doing so, and if I did not use them then, I ought to have done so ; and that there may be no mistake about it, I use them now, in the fullest sense of the term, and shall I believe satisfy the most credulous before I conclude that I am justified in doing so. That the bolt was not the result of some new light as to my ability to lead but the result of mature deliberation and scheming is shown by the time for springing the mine, just after they had assisted in preparing an address to place in the hands of His Excellency the Governor General with which to open parliament and before an answer thereto had been vouchsafed either from the Senate or Commons. No one can understand such a course, unless it was the culumination of a scheme long in hatching. That it was so is beyond doubt. I have the authority of the Hon. John Costigan, a member of the government at that time, for saying that a month or two before the eulogistic speeches made by Foster et al. in which I was extolled as one able physically, and intellectually fitted for the position of premier, he, when in the office of Mr. Foster, was approached immediately after entering by that gentleman with the question if he did not think some younger blood should be at the head of the government, adding 'the premier is too old for the position,' and that Costigan's reply was that he was of opinion there were too many young men in the cabinet who believed themselves better fitted for the position, and then walked away. Who the young man was, it is not difficult to divine. This idea of my age may account for the objection the gentleman had to Sir Charles Tupper's return to Canada when suggested by me at a later date, knowing that if Sir Charles were in the country and their plot to depose the premier proved a success his (Foster's) chances for the premiership would be nil, as proved to be the case notwithstanding Sir Charles' age which is a few years in advance of mine ; no doubt the acceptance of Sir Charles at the time may have been in the hope that that gentleman, though of mature age, if successful at the polls, would not hold the position long, and that in a short time the ambitious young man would rise to the much coveted position of premier. In addition to this interview, Mr. Costigan adds that when on New Year's Day he called at the residence of Mr. Foster to pay the usual New Year's greeting, he was met at the door by the servant who must have been waiting for him and informed that Mr. Foster was in the library and wanted to see him immediately, and that before he had time or opportunity to extend the compliments of the season to the ladies of the house, was ushered into the presence of the then Finance Minister and at once approached with an invitation to join the nest of conspirators who were hatching a scheme to depose the premier and install another in his place. This, Mr. Costigan declares, was a surprise and led him to ask what he (Foster) meant. Mr. Foster's reply was that an arrangement had already been made to reconstruct the cabinet under Sir Charles Tupper as premier and that Sir Alex. Lacoste, Chief Justice of Quebec, and Sir Adolphe Chapleau, then lieutenant governor of Quebec, were to form part of the new cabinet, that an appeal was then to be made to the country. This, Mr. Costigan assured me, was all new to him, and he at once asked how that was to be accomplished in the face of the declaration made by him (Mr. Foster) in the Commons, on behalf of the cabinet, and by the premier in the Senate, that an early session would be held in the next year and a Remedial Bill introduced, if in the meantime a satisfactory and amicable arrangement could not be effected between the Dominion government and that of Manitoba. To this Mr. Foster replied that that could be explained by the new premier making a declaration that a Remedial Bill would be introduced immediately after the election on the reassembling of the new parliament, but before that could be done it would be necessary to secure the resignation of Sir Mackenzie, and make Sir Charles premier. To this proposition Mr. Costigan says he replied he could not agree; that he had no fault to find with Sir Mackenzie, that they had accepted office under him in good faith, and that until he had lost confidence in him he did not know why he or they should take the course suggested, adding that every individual member of the cabinet had not only the right, but should resign if he or they lost confidence in the premier either on the ground of a difference of opinion on the policy of the government or for any private reason of his or their own, but did not think it right or proper for members of the cabinet to conspire for the purpose of compelling a premier to resign, and that for his part he had every confidence in the premier and would not be a party to any such scheme as that suggested. Mr. Costigan adds, the conversation upon that subject then ceased and no further information was vouchsafed to him as to the manner in which the plot was to be carried out. I may add, that my relations up to that time with my colleagues and their families were such that upon that same New Years Day I called at Mr. Foster's house to pay the accustomed New Years' greeting, and on comparing notes with Mr. Costigan am led to the conclusion that we were in the house at the same time, I in the drawing room paying my respects to the ladies and Costigan in the library closeted with the conspirator receiving information and being solicited to join in the coup for my overthrow, yet these gentlemen declared no 'nest of traitors' existed, and that they 'remained loyal,' until, they say, I broke faith with them.

The first intimation I had of the plot was a message received from the Hon. John. F. Wood, then Controller of Customs and a member of the cabinet, who told me that 'something was transpiring which would require my serious consideration' or words to that effect, and that I must be prepared for it, but declined any further information, voluntarily declaring that no matter what occurred he would prove my friend and remain true to me. The manner in which he proved his allegiance was by joining the other six and resigning with them. He repeatedly afterwards sent a friend of his, who by the by is a Liberal, asking an interview with me to enable him to explain, personally to myself, why he had taken the course he did. My reply was 'no, I will not meet him. No explanation he can make can justify his treachery.' I never met him for that purpose and consequently no explanation was ever made. It may and no doubt will be said, it is all very well to make these statements about a former colleague who is dead, and cannot reply. I would not have referred to this branch of the subject were it not that, fortunately, the gentleman who brought the message direct to me, and conveyed my replies, is still living, and should it be necessary can be produced to confirm every word I have uttered upon this subject. It was not long after this that I learned from a deputation which waited upon me consisting of the Hon. John Haggart, and the Hon. Dr. Montague, with a request that I should resign and make way for Sir Charles Tupper. I need scarcely say this was a surprise. I listened to them and they departed as wise as when they entered the room, as to my intentions or the course I might, in the future, take. Receiving no information from me, as to what I intended to do, the caballing continued, the rendezvous being the office of the Hon. Geo. E. Foster, then Finance Minister.

When the conspiracy was at its height, one of my colleagues, Mr. John Costigan, accidentally dropped into the office of the Minister of Justice, and the conversation at once turned upon the difficulties, and dissensions in the party, which had occurred when Mr. Dickey, then Minister of Justice, expressed the belief that if Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Mackenzie could meet and have a conference he believed an understanding could be arrived at in a very short time which would settle all the difficulties. Up to that time I had not met Sir Charles. Mr. Costigan then said 'if you think so why does not Sir Charles call upon him'? to which Mr. Dickey answered: 'Sir Charles is fearful that Sir Mackenzie will not receive him, not having called upon him since his return to the country.' Mr. Costigan replied that from what he knew of me, he did not believe a word of it, that Sir Charles was an officer of the government of which Sir Mackenzie was the head, that it was his duty to call upon the premier, and that he was sure Sir Charles would be courteously received, and he (Costigan) would wait upon me, if he wished, and ascertain whether there was any reason why Sir Mackenzie should not meet him. Mr. Dickey expressed his thanks. Mr. Costigan asked him to wait fifteen minutes, and he would return and let him know the result of the interview. He did call and found me in consultation with Sir Adolphe Caron, and Hon. Mr. Ouimet, and informed me of his conversation with Mr. Dickey. I at once replied that I knew of no reason why I should refuse to see Sir Charles; he knew where to find me and if he desired to see me to discuss any question, I should be glad to meet him. Mr. Costigan then returned to the Minister of Justice's office and found he had gone to Mr. Foster's office, where he followed and found him closeted with other ministers, into which room he was invited, but declined to go. Upon informing Mr. Dickey of the result of his mission, he (Mr. Dickey) expressed regret he did not know it a few minutes before, as they had just all signed, and forwarded their resignations to His Excellency the Governor General, at which Mr. Costigan expressed surprise, telling him he thought he was in a great hurry, as he had promised him to wait fifteen minutes for his return. Mr. Dickey repeated his explanation when asked why they were in such a hurry, and if they thought an interview between Sir Charles and Sir Mackenzie would result in a compromise of some kind being arrived at. 'Oh!' replied Mr. Dickey, 'Sir Mackenzie is about to, or has, sent in his resignation and we want to forestall him.' Why, was not explained. 'You are in error,' exclaimed Mr. Costigan, 'I have just left Sir Mackenzie, and he has not sent in his resignation, nor does he intend to do so.'

This, declares Mr. Costigan, created as great consternation as if a bomb shell had burst in their midst. Not more so than when they were informed next day that their resignations had been received and, on the recommendation of the premier, accepted by His Excellency.

Then the caballing continued to prevent the possibility of the filling of the vacancies created in the cabinet by the acceptance of their resignations as charged by Sir William Mulock. I shall not detain the Senate by a detailed statement of the means resorted to to prevent gentlemen who, I have every reason to know, would have readily accepted seats in the cabinet, had it not been for representations made by these patriotic gentlemen, who had, they say, the welfare of the Conservative party at heart, and not their own advancement.

So far was this espionage carried that when a prominent gentleman from Toronto visited Ottawa, at my request, he had scarcely set foot in the city before he was beset by the bolters and their emissaries, and among other things was told that the Colonial Secretary, The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, had expressed, through the Governor General, a wish for a change in the Canadian premiership, and that Sir Charles Tupper should be placed at the head of the government in Canada for the purpose of enabling him (Chamberlain) to assist in carrying out his colonial policy. I need scarcely say that neither myself nor friends believed the story. To set this point at rest, Mr. Weldon, representative in the Commons for Albert, N.B., when in Halifax, without my knowledge, cabled Mr. Chamberlain informing him of the use to which his name had been put, asking for a reply. Copies of question and answer are now under my hand, which I shall place upon record. They are as follows :

Halifax, N.S., January 21st, 1896.

Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, London,—Rumour is freely circulated among members of Liberal Conservative party in Canada at present unhappily divided, that you are urging Governor General to favour one of the rival aspirants for premiership, which rumour is doing much harm. Kindly cable contradiction.

RICHARD C. WELDON,
Member of Parliament.

Next day Mr. Weldon received the following reply.

London, January 22nd, 1896.

Weldon, M.P., Halifax, Nova Scotia,—Statement absurd, and absolutely without foundation.

CHAMBERLAIN.

It is needless to say the answer was just what was expected, and equally needless to pursue this branch of the subject further, though numerous other instances could be given equally absurd and equally untrue, all of which prove the existence of a conspiracy which they now deny. I may add that I have a letter from Sir Adolphe Chapleau, sent unasked, on his hearing of the use that had been made of his name, denying positively that he ever agreed to enter the cabinet that Mr. Foster says was to be organized under the premiership of Sir Charles Tupper.

There is but one other point to which I desire to call attention, and that is the statement made by Mr. George Taylor during the debate which has led to this explanation. He said :

It was at the request of Sir Mackenzie Bowell that I had an interview with Sir Charles Tupper and brought these two gentlemen together. They made the arrangement that Sir Charles Tupper would conduct the session and then he would become the premier minister. That was the agreement that was made and these gentlemen had nothing to do with the arrangements, further, until after the arrangement was fully concluded between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Charles Tupper.

I am utterly at a loss to know or understand how Mr. Taylor could have given utterance to such a statement, unless it be that he had talked it over so often with others that he believed it himself. That is an idiosyncracy prevailing, we know, with some people. There is but one grain of truth in the statement. I met Mr. Taylor but a few times during the crisis, and was upon each occasion reticent as to what I said during our conversations, for the reason that I knew not who were engaged in the conspiracy, and for the reason also that during the strike friends had whispered in my ear that he was an emissary and working in the interest of Foster and Haggart, though I confess I put little confidence in the tales at that time. I have already stated that I did not even suggest to His Excellency the name of any one to be sent for to form a government when tendering my resignation, hence it is not probable that I asked Mr. Taylor, as he asserts, to send for Sir Charles Tupper to undertake that responsibility. His statement that an arrangement was made by Sir Charles Tupper and myself that he should act as leader in the Commons during the then pending session is correct, but the further statement that after the session I agreed to retire and Sir Charles take my place, is not correct. No such arrangement was made between us. I had decided as to the course I should take, but did not inform him. For the opinion which he and his friends may have formed and believed, I am not responsible. This statement of Mr. Taylor's is only a reproduction of one made in the House of Commons during the debate on the ministerial crisis in 1896, in reply to some remarks made by Sir Richard Cartwright. Turn to page 72 of the Official Debates of the Senate of that year, and the following denial will be found :

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. Before proceeding with the debate on the address I desire to make a statement in reference to the course which I pursued in connection with the ministerial crisis, for the purpose of placing it upon record and for the reason that an hon. member of the other House has made a statement which might hereafter be used to my disadvantage. It is not often, nor do I consider it comports with the dignity of this House, that reference should be made, or comments indulged in, upon the proceedings in the House of Commons. At a time, however, when ministerial explanations are being made, after a crisis in the cabinet, a departure from this wholesome rule may be justified. I have already stated that in the negotiations which led to the return of six members of the cabinet who had resigned, there were no stipulations nor conditions. I was, therefore, not a little surprised on reading in the official debates in the House of Commons of the 15th inst. the following statement by Sir Richard Cartwright :

It is impossible that even such a crew could dream of returning except on a most distinct understanding, whether written or verbal, that within a very short space of time Sir Mackenzie Bowell must make way for Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.

An hon. MEMBER. You are right for once.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, right for once and right always, and right all through.

The interpolation was unwarranted, and not based upon facts. I do not accuse the hon. member of any desire to mislead the House, nor do I blame Sir Richard Cartwright for concluding that some understanding of the character indicated had been arrived at between Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., and myself. They are, however, both incorrect in the view they have taken. I desire, therefore, in order that my future course may not be misunderstood, to make this definite explanation :

When I met my colleagues who still remained in the cabinet and submitted to them the names of the gentlemen who had honoured me by consenting to accept positions in the new cabinet, I stated minutely and positively the line of policy I proposed to follow. I also stated, with perfect clearness, the course that I intended to take personally, after the policy I had announced had been carried out. I desired to leave my colleagues without any doubt as to the course I intended to take, and I justified my decision by arguments based on the best interests of the Conservative party—which interests I believe to be identical with the welfare of the country—this all occurred before negotiations were reopened for the return of the ministers who had retired, and at a time when it was thought reconciliation was impossible. At the meeting to which I have alluded, there were present:—Hon. Sir Adolphe Caron, Hon. Sir Frank Smith, and Hon. Messrs. Costigan, Ouimet, Daly and Ferguson.

I have but to add, that when full explanations are given I have not the slightest doubt the party I have served from my boyhood and the country at large will approve of the course I have taken. I should not have referred to this unfortunate ministerial crisis again, had it not been that the remark was made by an hon. member of the House of Commons and has become part of the permanent record of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT. May I ask who the hon. gentleman was who interrupted Sir Richard Cartwright ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. Mr. Pope.

That denial and explanation has remained on record for about nine years and never been contradicted. The charge is now resurrected to aid in a defence of an act unparalleled in the history of any country, where free institutions exist. There are many other events which occurred during that memorable year that have come to light which prove that a conspiracy existed culminating in the resignation of seven gentlemen, most of whom received their reward by rejection at the polls by an avenging electorate.

I have in this explanation shown that the Hon. George E. Foster in his explanation to the electors of the North Riding of Toronto at the last election and repeated in the House of Commons, that his reason for resigning his seat in the cabinet in 1896, was on account of a difference of opinion on a question of policy, is not correct, and that too out of his own mouth. I have also established the fact that but a short time before he, for himself and colleagues, in a carefully prepared typewritten statement, gave as his and their reasons for resigning my unfitness for the premiership, that he and another of his party, concurred in by Mr. Haggart who was present at the time, used language of the most eulogistic character, in reference to myself, at public meetings addressed by them in which they extolled my administrative abilities and 'broadness of mind' in dealing with questions of state, and that, upon this personal point, if he then believed what he said, he did not believe what he uttered in his explanation in the House of Commons when explaining the reasons for his own and for his fellow conspirators resigning. I have also given sufficient evidence to prove that he was the chief of the 'nest of traitors.' There I propose to leave him to the judgment of an impartial and discerning public. I have shown by unimpeachable evidence that the Hon. John Haggart had no foundation for his statement that he and his associates 'remained loyal' until a promise, which he says was made by me, was broken, said promise being that I was to resign and make way for Sir Charles Tupper to enable him to form a new cabinet. I have quoted from official records to prove that I tendered my resignation to His Excellency the Governor General, and that he refused under the circumstances then existing to accept it, that this action of mine was not the result of an understanding or agreement with Mr. Haggart or any of those with whom he was acting, but from a desire to cut myself clear of traitors by whom I had been surrounded. Let me add that instead of hanging to office from day to day, from time to time, like a sick girl hanging on to life, I had during the time of Sir John Macdonald placed my resignation in his hands to use whenever he deemed it in the interest of the party to do so. I have also under my hand, a letter written to the late Sir John Abbott tendering my resignation on account of an attempt made by the same John Haggart and others of the same ilk, to prevent a solemn promise made through me by Sir John Macdonald to a colleague, unless that promise was carried out, which resignation was not accepted owing to the intervention of Sir John Thompson who pointed out that owing to the unfortunate illness of Sir John Abbott he was then about retiring from the premiership and that therefore the letter must be withdrawn. These facts were known to Mr. Haggart and yet with unblushing cheek and consummate reckless audacity which ever characterizes him, he rose in his place in the House of Commons and told his hearers that I 'from day to day, from time to time, like a sick girl hanging on to life,' refused to resign. Certainly I did not resign until the duty and courtesy due to the representative of the Queen had been fulfilled, nor did I resign just when that gentleman demanded.

I have also given the facts in connection with Sir Charles' return to Canada in 1895, facts well known to Mr. Haggart though he found it convenient to forget them. From what followed Sir Charles' presence in Canada at that time, it is clear, the tactics of the Foster-Haggart combination were changed. The inference is that finding their intention to foist Foster upon the party as leader impossible, they approached Sir Charles, and no doubt impressed upon him the necessity of a change in the hope that after an election it would not be long, owing to age, before retirement would be necessary, and the 'young man' could then mount the Throne, and rule for a time. But as Burns puts it 'The best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft aglee.' So it was with them : a disgusted electorate, upon the first opportunity, relegated them to a forced retirement from office to the opposition benches where they will remain, if I can interpret public opinion, so long as they are recognized as important factors in the Conservative party, though led by as upright and honourable a public man as ever sat in parliament.

I should not be doing justice to Sir Charles Tupper in this explanation were I not to add that during the time he was in the cabinet under my premiership his treatment of me was all that I could expect or desire. I can not say the same of the Foster-Haggart combination.

An apology is due to the Senate for occupying so much of its time in referring to what may be termed ancient political history—history, too, of a character not creditable to those who figured ingloriously in it, and who resurrected the events of that period in an attempt to rehabilitate themselves in public opinion. My only justification for referring to these events now is that I could not allow a life of thirty-seven years spent in active politics, during which time I have taken, I think I may say, without being accused of egotism, not an unimportant part, both as a private member of parliament and as a minister of the Crown, in all the great and important measures that have come before parliament during the long period of time, to be besmeared by men of the reputation, politically and otherwise, of the Hon. John Haggart and his associates without a protest and exposure of their chicanery and treachery, even though they had an unimportant champion to rush to their rescue with a statement, the emanation of a distorted imagination. It is with great reluctance that I have been compelled to re-open a controversy which was closed some nine years ago, that is so far as parliament is concerned. Had these statements been confined to the private and insidious tales and misrepresentations which have incessantly been poured into the ears of party friends by these gentlemen and some of their followers, I should, as in the past, have treated their utterances with silent contemps, but as they have in a fit of desperation placed incorrect statements upon the parliamentary records, I have in self-defence made this partial explanation, and now leave the issue between us to a discerning public to render their verdict, having no fear of the result.

NORTHWEST PROVINCIAL AUTONOMY BILL.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I beg to call attention to an incendiary appeal sent broadcast to the country by a gentleman who is supposed to be responsible to the people of this country. It is an appeal that I consider should not emanate from a man who holds a position of responsibility to the public. We have at the present moment a Bill in the interests of the development of Canada under consideration before another part of this legislature. A member of this parliament—I do not say which House he belongs to—has sent forth an appeal daring the government of Canada to pass this measure and calling provisions in that measure criminal. I think it would be well, under the circumstances, that this honourable House should give expression to its opinion in regard to such an appeal. Here we have an ordinary measure for the development of Canada, adding two provinces to the Dominion, containing a clause respecting certain rights, and a member responsible to the people of this country writes to those whom he calls his Orange fellow countrymen, his Orange friends, asking them to rise en masse and dare the government to pass the Bill with that clause, calling the provision in that Bill a criminal act. I say that it is not right that any honourable man, having at heart the welfare of his country, should make such an appeal to the people of this very enlightened country, and the hon. gentleman who signs the appeal is T. S. Sproule. It is published in all the papers of Canada. This is a copy of the Ottawa 'Free Press,' and the article in the hands of every citizen of this country. In that article an honourable member states to the people of Canada that the Liberal government of Canada has dared to place before the country a Bill containing a clause which is criminal, and calling upon his fellow Orangemen to dare the government to pass the Bill, and we are to allow that appeal to go forth for the next three or four weeks, and have its effect! I say it is time to call a halt. It is time to say to the country that the government and this body do not pass Bills containing clauses detrimental to the interests of Canada, or depriving the people of any of their rights. It is proper, and it is just that this parliament, and this part of parliament, should put the public on their guard against such incendiary, unjust and unfair appeals. Let the measure be adopted on its merits. Let the clause be discussed on its merits according to the wants and needs of this country and of the population.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Yes there is.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have called the attention of the House to an incendiary appeal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not a question of privilege. No member of this House is involved and this discussion is altogether out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am sorry the hon. member from Nova Scotia is in accord with T. S. Sproule, and does not want the matter ventilated in parliament. If it is necessary to be in order, I have the means to be in order; that is, to move the adjournment of the House; but I contend I am perfectly in order in calling the attention of parliament to such an incendiary appeal.

The SPEAKER—If I am to render a decision on the point raised, I consider the point of order well taken; there is nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—May I not rise to call the attention of the government to an incendiary appeal?

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman can put a question to the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has to give notice of a question, unless it is a question of privilege.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

That when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Wednesday the 15th instant at three o'clock in the afternoon.

He said : To-morrow, under the present rules, the House would adjourn until Tuesday; Wednesday will be Ash Wednesday, and therefore a holiday, and as some hon. gentlemen are anxious to have an adjournment, I thought we might, without interfering in any way with the public business, adjourn over until Wednesday the 15th rather than Thursday the 16th as I have it in my notice, because I find there are some important measures which hon. gentlemen wish to have considered before then.

The motion was agreed to.

PRODUCTION OF ALUMINUM IN CANADA.

MOTION.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Domville, for the appointment of a select committee of five to be composed of :—

The Honourable Boucher de Boucherville, M.D., C.M.G.

The Honourable Michael Sullivan, M.D.

The Honourable William Cameron Edwards.

The Honourable J. H. Wilson, M.D., and the mover.

To inquire into the production of anhydrous alumina and aluminum in Canada.

With power to employ stenographer, to have such report printed and with leave to report from time to time.—Hon. Mr. Domville.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE said : If the hon. Secretary of State will allow me to refer to what I said the last time this subject was under discussion, he will see that I had no idea of promoting any private industry. I wish to make some remarks on the question of clay. I have before me here all the various authorities on the subject, going right back to the time of Pliny.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Anything before the flood we will accept.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I will not take up the time of the House going into the whole subject now. I have spent considerable time on it, and think the information I have collected will be of some interest to the country. When I last addressed the House on this subject, I think my hon. friend misunderstood me. What I really was driving at was how we could utilize the clay we have in this country to produce aluminum. As we all know, alumina is a clay, and some clay carries more percentage of metal than others, and there is thirteen times as much, in volume, of alumina in the world as there is of iron. The clay of Canada has not yet been used to make aluminum. As I explained on a former occasion, aluminum must not be confused with alumina. The former is the metal, the latter the clay from which it is produced. The clay has to be refined and treated with electricity. We have great electrical power in this country and only need a little enterprise to turn our clays into the beautiful metal we have all seen. To-day it is imported from Germany. Why? Because the attention of Canada has never been directed to cleaning up clay by electrical process. The reason for that was that patents in Europe and in the United States precluded chemists and others spending their time in finding a process to utilize the clay. If they had discovered a way to clean up the clay as it should be cleaned up, they would have been met with patents in Europe and the United States preventing them using the electrical process to melt the clay. With those patents in existence, there was no use producing the cleaned up clay when it could not be used. Those patents have expired in Europe, and in a few months will expire in the United States and they do not exist in Canada. I think we have a duty to perform in this House to promote the progress of this country. If we can bring to the notice of the country the fact that we have great wealth in a certain direction only requiring to be developed, we should bring it prominently before the public. In this country, as in all other countries, the clays differ in quality, some being purer than others. An impure clay mixed with magnesia and other ingredients produces an alloy. We do not want an alloy, but pure aluminum. It would cost more to get rid of all the foreign element in an alloy than the metal would be worth. I ask the government to allow us to have this committee to look into the question, and if possible present some practical views and ideas to the country. Some hon. gentlemen think I am presumptuous in this matter. Intelligence is always presumptuous; if it knows a little more than its neighbour, it is not fit to live. We are not dwelling in the past; we are living in the twentieth century, in an age of progress, and why should we not in this Senate direct the attention of the country to new industries that may be developed? That is my plea for asking for a committee to bring in a report, not on what anybody is doing, not on who is manufacturing or wants to manufacture, but simply to show whether there is a fair prospect in this country of turning our clay into metal. Every pound of aluminum made in this country will represent added wealth; not a dollar expended in its production will go out of the country. From the digging of the clay by the workmen to the conversion of it into aluminum by electrical power generated at the mighty falls of the St. Lawrence and other rivers, it will circulate hundreds of thousands of dollars in this country. That is why I ask for the appointment of this committee. Acting upon the suggestion of my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, I will strike out the words in the last paragraph 'to have such report printed.' I inserted those words without considering the effect they might have, and I can assure my hon, friend there will be no considerable expense attending the meetings of this committee.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I have looked into this matter to some extent, and while I am not one of those who would support it in a general way, or suggest in this way that certain enterprises should be promoted in this country, this being an entirely new matter in Canada, and believing there may possibly be something in it, I, as one of those named in the motion, say I am willing to act if it is agreeable to the Senate. If the committee is appointed we will investigate the subject as thoroughly as we can and see what there may be in this industry. I therefore support the motion.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I desire to express my appreciation of the able manner in which the mover of this resolution has presented his case to the House. The subject presents many important features, some of which ought to be brought before the country, that the public may see the advantages which are likely to result from the establishment of the aluminum industry in Canada. It is a new industry, and the metal when manufactured is very useful, but I do not know whether we ought at the present time to incur any considerable expeuse in connection with this investigation, and if it involves any considerable expense I would hardly feel inclined to ask that the committee be appointed. If the mover of the resolution will strike out those words which involve expense, I shall have great pleasure indeed in supporting his resolution and will do everything in my power to assist in the investigation.

The SPEAKER—I may say for the information of the hon. gentleman, that the mover of the resolution has stricken out the words 'to have such report printed,' and it now reads, 'With power to employ a stenographer and with leave to report from time to time.'

The motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTS FOR GOVERNMENT WORKS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (51) An Act respecting Contracts for Government Works.

He said: This Bill makes provision in all cases of public works being carried on that tenders shall be invited, except where there is a pressing necessity and delay will be injurious, or where the work can be more expeditiously and economically executed by officers of the department, or in case the estimated cost is less than $5,000; but should the department in any case call for tenders, even though the amount is less than $5,000, the important provision of this is that tenders must be submitted to council. The minister himself cannot act except after having obtained a minute of council approving of the course.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A very good Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I should like to know what the provisions of the present law are, and what particular provision in the present law this Bill amends.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The law is not uniform in several departments. The same principle prevails in the Department of Railways and Canals. I am reading from the Consolidated Statutes, section 11 of the Act under which railways and canals are administered. It is as follows:—

> The minister shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of all works except in case of pressing emergency, in which the delay would be injurious to the public interests, or in which, from the nature of the work, it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the minister.

That makes no provision for a case where the work would cost less than $5,000. The addition to the words I have quoted prevails with regard to other departments, the Public Works, for instance, and it is proposed now that that shall be made uniform, but provided that in all cases where tenders are invited, if the minister thinks it is in the interest of the government that the work could be more expeditiously performed by contract, even if the amount is less than $5,000, then he must submit the tenders to council.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose it is the minister himself who decides as to the urgency or not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (53) An Act to amend the Act respecting the Department of Railways and Canals. He said: When the Bill respecting contracts for government works was under consideration, I read the clause in the Railways and Canals Act, chapter 37, of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, but hon. gentlemen will have noticed there is no provision there that the work may be performed by the department, by its own servants, or given out without tender where the amount is less than $5,000. This Bill provides for this particular portion of it. Section 11 is the same down to the word 'department.' The new words are:

Or in cases where the estimated cost of the work is less than $5,000, and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

Then the following is new:

Whenever, in the case of any work, tenders are required to be, or are, invited, the minister shall submit all tenders received therefor to the Governor in Council, and the contract for the work shall be awarded under the direction of the Governor in Council.

To that extent it limits the discretionary power that the minister has exercised. In the past where the amount was $5,000 or less, he had the right to call for tenders and award the work without its going to council. It was thought it would afford greater protection and insure uniformity to add these words.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If it is over $5,000 it goes to the Governor in Council?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, in any event; if it is under $5,000 and he calls for tenders it must go to the Governor in Council.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (54) An Act to amend the Public Works Act. He said: This Bill amends the Public Works Act in the same direction as the Act relating to the Railways and Canals. The following words are added to section 13 of the Public Works Act:—

Whenever, in the case of any work, tenders are required to be, or are, invited, the minister shall submit all tenders received therefor to the Governor in Council, and the contract for the work shall be awarded under the direction of the Governor in Council.

That is the only addition to the law, making it compulsory, where tenders are called, in all cases to refer to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does this law apply only to the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Public Works, or will it be a general law for all the departments?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Bill (51) which we have just read the second time—respecting contracts for government works—is for all the departments. The one I am reading now is to amend the Public Works Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the first one refers to all the departments I do not see the necessity for the other two.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was thought better, as there are special provisions in the Acts relating to the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Public Works, to pass these Bills. The Minister of Justice thought it would make the law more clear, and that is why the additional legislation is necessary.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

FREE TRANSPORTATION FOR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) moved the second reading of Bill (D) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, as regards the free transportation of senators and members of the House of Commons. He said: This Bill does not need a very long explanation. It simply provides to give effect to the law as it now stands, providing for the free transportation of members of parliament and their baggage. The Bill simply adds after the word 'baggage,'

Upon presentation of a card of identification approved of and certified by the Clerk of the Senate, or by the Clerk of the House of Commons, as the case may be.

It would do away with the necessity of carrying passes. There are some sixty or seventy railways in Canada, and a member of parliament is obliged to have a pass for each. By this amendment one certificate would suffice. It does not enlarge or restrict in any way the present law ; it simply gives effect to the law as it exists. It is a matter of convenience. I may say this system prevails elsewhere and has been found satisfactory, and I do not think any objection has been seriously taken to this measure.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Do the railway people not object to that ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No, they do not.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This Bill should receive very careful consideration by this House. I do not see how, under legislation of this character, you are going to protect the railways from fraud. If a person claiming to be a member of parliament produces to a conductor something which purports to be a certificate such as is called for in this Bill, and the conductor does not take up that certificate, the party presenting it keeps it in his possession, and how is the railway to find out whether that certificate is a bona fide document or a forgery ? Under the law as it stands, the railways, for their own protection, issue passes, and the holder of a pass must produce it to the conductor, who recognizes it as having been issued by the company. It bears upon its face evidence that it is bona fide issued by the company for the purpose of enabling the company's employees to identify the holder. But if you alter the law and substitute for the pass a certificate such as described here, how are you going to protect the companies from fraud? Suppose a person gets hold of a blank form and forges a certificate, the conductor is not supposed to know how these certificates are issued or anything about the signatures. The holder puts it back in his pocket and no charge can be brought against him for forgery. It would be a very dangerous proceeding and subject the company to the possibilities of fraud. I have not heard a word from the railway companies one way or the other, but in my humble opinion it is opening the door to opportunities for fraud on the part of people who are disposed to be dishonest.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not think the hon. senator's fear is well founded. It is quite as possible to commit fraud with passes as with a single certificate—much more so. It is well known that when you have thirty or forty passes in your pockets you only use one or two or three during the year. Where do the others go? I have heard it stated, although not by hon. members of this House, that passes given, either to officials or representatives of the people, have been used by others, because the members do not use them. Therefore, the question of fraud is as likely to occur with a pass as with a certificate. I would suggest in order to make the matter absolutely sure, if the hon. senator thinks that fraud would be perpetrated by using a certificate, it would be easy to place a portrait of the member on the card and that would be a complete identification. However, I have no reason to believe that any hon. member of Parliament would give his passes to anybody else. The hon. senator asked, how is the conductor to know that the signature on that card is that of the clerk of the House or Senate? How is he to know the signature of the president or of the secretary of the company? These passes can be forged just as well as certificates from this or the other House. I do not think the fears of the hon. senator are well based and I know from my own experience and the experience of many members of parliament who have travelled every day, that the conductors would be delighted to have a certificate from this House or from the other House instead of the passes. I know that, because the conductors who are interested in the matter have said so. They would be only too well pleased.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.).—I think this Bill would be quite inoperative and that it would lead to fraud. How can conductors tell what the certificate of the clerk is, or whether it is genuine or not ? Surely it is no hardship to carry passes. If we did not get the passes which the companies supply so generously, that would be a hardship, but now it is said to be a hardship to use them. I think the Bill coercing railway companies to supply us with passes is most unfair and unjust. Before that Bill was passed the railway companies behaved very generously with members of parliament. I think in every case they gave them free passes and now, not satisfied with that, we wish to throw them aside and obtain a certificate from the clerk of the House. I hope my hon. friend will withdraw the Bill, because it is wrong in principle and will lead to fraud.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I regret that the hon. gentleman from Victoria has thought proper to reflect on the action of this House in 1903.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And in doing that he was out of order. I fail to see that there is any greater danger of fraud or forgery in connection with the certificate than already exists in connection with passes, and there are two things to be said in favour of some sort of simple certificate; one is that under the present system a member cannot help feeling, to a certain extent, under an obligation to the railway company. It was just with the view of doing away with that sense of obligation, or largely with that view, that the provision was placed in the Act of 1903. Then it is inconvenient to carry a large number of passes about one's person, and there should be some one single pass, or piece of evidence, which would entitle one to ride free on trains. I regret that the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière has thought proper to introduce this measure, because it is not necessary. If hon. gentlemen will turn to the Act of 1903 they will find that section 25 of that Act gives power to the railway commission to make regulations and by-laws for nearly everything. Subsection (g) reads as follows :—

With respect to any matter, act or thing which, by this or the Special Act, is sanctioned, required to be done, or prohibited.

Section 40 further authorizes the board to make general rules governing, so far as shall not be inconsistent with this Act, proceedings under this Act and the practice and procedure under this Act and generally for carrying this Act into effect. I think the proper course of procedure in this case would be to bring the matter before the railway commission and let the railway commission decide upon the form of certificate which is to be adopted. I do not think that this is a sort of a Bill the passage of which through the two Houses would tend to increase the respect of the public for the Senate and the House of Commons. It is not desirable to call special attention to this matter, and the better way is to let the commission exercise their power and decide what form the certificate is to take. In Australia the certificate is in the shape of a sort of medal, made of metal with the member's name engraved on it. Either such a medal or a certificate from the clerk of the House would constitute, I think, good evidence, and would be a convenient way of doing the thing, but I object to our passing this Bill, because it is unnecessary and the object can be better attained in the way that I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I am not very particular personally about the method of identification of members of this and the other House travelling over our railroads, but it is desirable that we should do away with passes and have some way of identification.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A brand on the forehead.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Whether as proposed a certificate issued by the clerk of the House, or, as I would prefer, by the clerk of the railway commission. I would prefer the latter. I had some experience myself last year on two different occasions travelling in the Dominion. Not having passes I had to pay my fare on railroads. I remonstrated with the conductor, and told him all about the law. He told me he knew no law except the instructions received from the manager of the road, and that I would have to pay. And I was in the dilemma of either creating a little scene by being put off the train or paying, and I did very humbly pay on those two occasions. I did not murmur, and would not have brought the matter before the House, but I mention it now, since the Bill is before us, to show that it is, as I believe, well that since by law and by right we have free transportation, we should have a way of doing it without being subjected to a great deal of annoyance, and that we should be relieved of the bother of carrying a load of passes when we have them, or paying our fares, as we have on occasions to do, when we have no passes from railroads, because some roads do not send passes. I, therefore, without displaying any enthusiasm whatever, shall vote in favour of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We ought to pause before deciding that this Bill is a necessity. There are many ways in which the railway companies might be imposed upon. There is, in my opinion, no great hardship in carrying a few passes. There is no reason why we should object to carrying those passes, and we ought to guard, as far as possible, against any injustice being done to the railroads; not that I think we are under such heavy obligations to them, but we ought not to offer an opportunity whereby fraud could be perpetrated upon them. The certificates, coming from the Speaker of this House, or from the clerk of this House, could be very readily used by some one not a senator or a member of the House of Commons. That being so, we should watch ourselves very carefully indeed and not do anything which would permit that certificate to be handed over to some one else who might use it. It is said that they might adopt the same methods in reference to passes. I say no, because a pass has its number. The railroad knows full well what that number is. The conductor takes the number of the pass and very likely the name of the individual. This is reported at one of the head offices. The railroad knows then who has the pass and who is the one travelling upon that pass and, therefore, has a direct check to prevent any fraud being perpetrated upon the railroad. And I think that in itself is sufficient to make us hesitate before we change the system and permit certificates in lieu of passes. When a member is travelling on a pass it is a sufficiently strong guarantee to the railway company that the individual has a right to travel free, and that it is a pass issued by the railroad, and it is numbered—

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You could number the certificate.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Is there that same guarantee when each and every railroad has a number on each pass issued by them to the party travelling upon it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—What is the difference?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It is easily seen what the difference is. The railway issues the passes, puts the members' names upon them, and makes its conductors take the numbers. You cannot travel any distance before they would take the number. Is it a hardship for us to carry a pass and show it to the conductor? I think it is a proper and correct protection to the railway company and therefore I feel that we would be legislating hastily if we allowed ourselves to pass this Bill whereby we would put ourselves in the position of allowing wrong-doing either by ourselves or by some one travelling upon our certificate. I, therefore, feel strongly opposed to the Bill, and think that no good purpose can be served by our passing the measure.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I think all that has been said against the Bill can be answered. There is no more opportunity for the practice of fraud in the case of presenting a certificate of the clerk of this House than there would be in the case of presenting a pass. There is just as much identification in one case as in the other. I apprehend when the clerk of the House would issue his passes they would all be numbered. I apprehend a list of those, giving the number, would be furnished to every railway company and they would have on record just the same number for every member of the House or every member of the Senate that they would now have for the passes that are issued, and there is this difference about it: so long as the matter stands as it is at present, the railway company issue their own passes. You are dependent upon them for the pass, and the member who does not apply for the pass and put himself under a compliment to the railway company may be omitted from the list, and those who do not apply for them do not get them.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I had no pass in my case.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—And a railway company may send a pass and it may not reach the member and unless he chooses to put himself under a compliment to the company by applying for it he will not get the pass at all.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The railway company is held responsible if it neglects to send the pass.

Some hon. MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—They would be just as responsible under a certificate as under this system.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Hon. gentlemen say the railway companies are not bound to send passes. If hon. gentlemen look at the Act they will see they are under obligations to send them.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—This does not amend the law as to that at all. It simply substitutes a certificate of this House. Neither certificates nor passes are required under the law. The onus, therefore, is upon the railway company to pass any one who is a senator without having any kind of a certificate or means of knowing that he is such, but by means of this certificate there is an authority to some officer to pass the person.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman give his opinion on the question I raised that this Bill is unnecessary and that the matter can be better arranged by action on the part of the Railway Commission ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Who is to put the Railway Commission in motion? There is no process provided in the Act for the Railway Commission undertaking anything of the kind. Who is to put them in motion and who is going to say what other restrictions might be imposed by such a certificate, if they did take action in the matter? It is better for the House which has dealt with the matter before by compelling the giving of passes to members, if they intend the law to remain as it is, to define what the method shall be.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I think the hon. gentleman from Acadia (Hon. Mr. Poirier) made a mistake when he did not stand up for his rights. He should have allowed himself to be put off the train, and thus have maintained the rights of the Senate. He would have put the railway in an awkward position, indeed, if he had displayed his usual courage and thoughtfulness. He would have come to the rescue of the House in that way and the whole case would be saved. A railway conductor who would put a legislator off the train would have great courage.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—He is not supposed to know the senators.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—It is his duty to know. My view is about the same as the view of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I do not think we ought to raise the question. The law gives us the right to travel on the railways, and the railways should do their duty properly with regard to it. We present the passes or we do not present the passes. I do not like this way of settling it. It may be a little more convenient to members to have one single certificate, but, on the other hand, I can see great objection to it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman state how the railways and their conductors would find out whether any hon. member was the person described in the certificate? How is the official going to identify you or me unless you have some card?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—That is not my business. I do not propose to put that question to myself.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. member suggests he should be put off the train; that is not the proper method.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Members of the House of Commons and senators are allowed to ride free. The only object of a certificate or pass is to enable a conductor to decide whether the person is a member of either House. The railways run the risk ; we run no risk. We ride free under the law. No certificate is necessary. The law does not require us to produce anything of the kind. The railways issue passes as a simple matter of identification in their own interests, but it is not the passes that enable us to ride free. The law declares that we shall ride free, and the pass is only issued in order to enable conductors to identify the passenger. Why should we be required to produce a certificate, or a pass either? We are not required by law to do so, but as a matter of courtesy when we are asked by the conductor we produce the pass to show that we are entitled to ride free. If any conductor will run the risk of putting any member of parliament off the train, he is running a very big risk in regard to his company and rendering them liable to an action for damages, and justly so. So that as far as senators and members of the House of Commons are concerned, the carrying of a pass is in the interest of the railways as a matter of identification and if the railway companies say it is better and more satisfactory for them to issue passes we should be willing to accept them.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—There are two sides to this question. Looking at it from the side of the holder of the pass, the argument of convenience is strong, and I would be disposed to look at it from that standpoint. It is more convenient to look after one piece of paper than after a dozen; but I must be frank and honest in confessing that these passes have not hitherto caused me much inconvenience, and any inconvenience that they may have caused I have borne with as good grace as I could muster. We must look at it fom the standpoint of the railways, because they have rights as well as the holders of the passes. It has been suggested in opposition to this Bill that an injury might be done to the railway companies, that frauds might be perpetrated. I would not like to be a party to that. I should like to have justice done and to do justice. While I would be inclined to act on Shakespeare's advice and 'endure the ills we have' rather than 'fly to others that we know not of,' I would favour the second reading of this Bill and refer it to a committee. Then the railway authorities might be communicated with and an arrangement arrived at which would be mutually satisfactory.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was adopted; contents, 21; non-contents, 9.

The Bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY ACT, 1903, AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (36) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903. He said: The Senate is aware that the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mr. Blair has been filled by the selection of a judge from the Supreme Court of Canada, Justice Killam. It was thought of the very first importance that a man of well known attainments should be selected for the responsible position of chief commissioner, and Justice Killam seemed to be, from his past experience, one who would fill the position with credit to himself and with very great advantage to the people of Canada. He had already served as a judge for twenty years, and had, therefore, become entitled, under certain conditions set forth in the law affecting judges, to a retiring allowance. He naturally hesitated to change from his judicial position to the chairmanship of the railway board, unless he was secured in the years he had spent on the bench, and the years to come during which he would have filled his judicial position, and the object of this Bill is to give him the benefit of the Act relating to the retirement of judges. The time that he will serve on the railway board will count just as the time would have counted had he remained on the Supreme Court bench.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Coburg).

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He does not draw the allowance as commissioner?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He draws the allowance as commissioner, but not as a judge.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE SEAT OF SENATOR RUFUS CURRY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved:

That the report of the Clerk of the Senate, respecting the absence of the Honourable Mr. Rufus Curry, during two consecutive sessions of parliament, be referred to the committee appointed to consider the orders and customs of the House and the privileges of parliament, committee to meet——

The motion was agreed to.

THE PRYOR DIVORCE BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Owing to the fact that the hon. senator from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) was not present when this Bill was brought up, it was not proceeded with. I now move that Bill (B) An Act for the relief of Arthur James Pryor, be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading to-day and that it be now read the third time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Why should it be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading now? Pryor has been separated from his wife six or eight years, and why should we be in such a great hurry?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I raise a point of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—His wife has been living with another man.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—How do you know?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We have the evidence of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There has been no notice of this motion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is a mere matter of routine. However, I will move that the Bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ACTING MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I wish to ask the leader of the government who is the acting Minister of the Interior?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the premier has been acting up to the present time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (48) An Act respecting the Toronto and Hamilton Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. eKrr, Toronto.)

CONTRACTS FOR GOVERNMENT WORKS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (51) An Act respecting Contracts for Government Works.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of this Bill is to provide that in all cases, even where the amount to be expended by a department on any public work is less than $5,000, if the minister calls for tenders he must come to council with the tenders, and the contract must be awarded under an Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is the work which is being done on the post office here now done by contract or day's work?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is being done by day's work.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should think it is day's work from the length of time it is taking to do the work. It has extended over a year now. The progress is very slow for the number of men employed. When the western block was being rebuilt after its destruction by fire the work was done by day's work, and a great deal of time was wasted. It took three or four months to do what could easily have been done in a week. I am very glad that this Bill has been brought in, because it will stop that sort of fraud upon the public.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the work upon the post office has not been going on steadily this winter, except to a limited degree.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is entirely deceiving himself if he thinks that this Bill will remove the difficulties he points out. The widest possible scope is given, by the first clause, to the minister at the head of the department in calling for tenders. He need not invite tenders in cases of pressing emergency, in which delay would be injurious to the public interest, or in cases in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously or economically executed by the officers and servants of the department, or in cases where the estimated cost of the work is less than $5,000. All this is left to his discretion. I would ask my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, if that is the law as it at present stands?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me if the principle of inviting tenders is to be recognized, as embodied in this clause, it should be recognized in its entirety, and this element of discretion ought not to appear in the Bill. If it is the law now, that is no good reason why it should be continued.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read a third time presently. He said: The law as it stands to-day is in exactly the words which the hon. gentleman has quoted. There is no difference between the two. In some departments where the work was under $5,000 a practice had grown up for some years that the minister decided when tenders were called which one of them should be accepted. Now, it is to remove any imputation that might be made against the tenders that they are all to be brought to council that the lowest tender which gives security shall be accepted.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (53) An Act to amend the Act respecting the Department of Railways and Canals.

IN THE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is much in the same line as the other. There is no change in the law as it stands to-day down to the word 'department,' after which these words are added:

> Or in cases where the estimated cost of the work is less than $5,000, and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.
> 2. Whenever, in the case of any work, tenders are required to be, or are, invited, the minister shall submit all tenders received therefor to the Governor in Council, and the contract for the work shall be awarded under the direction of the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend if the words 'any work' include supplies?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not supplies; it must be work to be executed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is there any restriction placed upon the department in the ordering of supplies requiring tenders to be submitted?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where the amount is of any considerable magnitude, it has always been the practice of the department.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I make the inquiry because I know the practice to be contrary to the statement made by my hon. friend. It is a well known fact that many friends of the government are accorded the patronage of inviting friends of the party to furnish supplies entirely without tender, and it seems to me that the restriction which applies to work should apply to supplies also. It is just as important that the government should secure supplies at the least possible expense as to apply the Act to work being done by the department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If public advertisements are to be inserted in the newspapers the cost of calling for tenders generally exceeds the cost of the purchase, and, therefore, the practice has been to send out a large number of tenders, notably to friends of the government—no doubt about that—but allowing fair competition, and it is for the minister to select the lowest tender as a rule. That is as I have understood it. I have no personal knowledge other than when occasionally administering a department I have found that to be the practice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My observation has been that the element of competition is notably absent in such cases.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A bad example they have been following.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (54) An Act to amend the Public Works Act.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This Bill, as will be seen by reference to it, is precisely in line with the two preceding Bills, but the Minister of Justice considered it desirable to insert in the Public Works Act a clause exactly identical with the clause which has just been passed in Bill 51 and I think in Bill 53.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

FREE TRANSPORTATION FOR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill D) an Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, as regards the free transportation of senators and members of the House of Commons.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Order of the Day for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Bill should contain a schedule to show what the certificate ought to be.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I think when the Bill is before the committee will be the time to offer amendments if it does not meet the views of all the members of the Senate in its present form. The principle of the Bill was adopted yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT, 1903, AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (36) An Act to amend the Railwoy Act, 1903.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I explained yesterday that the object of this Bill is to preserve the privilege that Judge Killam has at present, in being transferred from the Supreme Court to be chief commissioner of the railway board, of having his twenty years which he has already served as a judge to count, and that the years to come while serving on the board in a semi-judicial capacity will also count.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Will his superannuation allowance be based upon the salary he is receiving now or upon the amount received as a judge?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If he is three years in the position, it will be on the amount he is at present receiving—no, perhaps I am wrong in that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why does the Bill refer to twenty years' service ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because he has served twenty years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the provision in the Bill is fifteen years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That clause is simply referring to the existing law. Under the existing law when a judge has served fifteen years he is entitled to certain advantages.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is he not debarred by age?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clauses will explain the superannuation he is entitled to. It is graded as the law now stands. It is simply adopting the law as it exists to-day, allowing the combined service to count, but it will be on the salary he receives as judge.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It ought to be very clearly stated.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The salary of which he was in receipt at the time of vacating the judicial office.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to read it over before giving an opinion upon it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Line 20 reads:

An annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary of the judicial office which he held at the time of his appointment as such commissioner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The latter part of the clause reads:

His Majesty may, by letters patent under the great seal, reciting such period of service, and, in cases (a) and (b), such chief commissioner's age, grant to him an annuity, payable as aforesaid, equal to the salary of the judicial office which he held at the time of his appointment as such chief commissioner, or which he resigned for the purpose of accepting such appointment, to commence immediately after his resignation as chief commissioner and to continue thenceforth during his natural life.

It would be the judge's salary.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that not a new departure for the government ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a new departure.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because last year we had a similar Bill before us and I think the hon. minister stated that the principle contained in the Bill now before us was a vicious principle.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is specially adapted to the position Judge Killam holds. He had twenty years' service and he naturally declined to accept the other position unless some provision was made that when he had to retire his twenty years service should count, and that any additional years on the board as chief commissioner should be added to the twenty years of his service as judge.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was precisely that principle that was declared vicious by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not recollect the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The circumstances were these: A Bill was introduced by the government granting the same advantages to persons who had served as lieutenant-governors. I suppose the hon. gentleman remembers now? The government dropped that clause because they found it very vicious.

On subclause (c) of clause 3,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to make an observation with reference to subclause (c). It seems to me the principle is a vicious one of perpetuating, so to speak, or continuing in office the chief commissioner to a period of age when he cannot give such services to the country as might be required. I do not think that provision should be made empowering the commissioner to remain in the office of chairman of the board of railway commissioners up to the age of 75 years. The duty devolving upon such an officer is very considerable, necessitating physical and mental vigour, and I do not think a man of those years can render satisfactory services to the country in such an office.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The hon. gentleman thinks he should be chloroformed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is a very wide difference it seems to me between the office of judge and the office of chairman of the railway commission. I can very well appreciate a judge performing his duties up to that age very satisfactorily, but the duties performed by the chairman of the railway commission are entirely different.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was thought in dealing with this matter to take the law as it existed to-day in reference to the judges. The point my hon. friend raises is not likely to arise in this case, because, as he knows, the appointments of the railway board are for a fixed period, ten years, and the question would have to come up at the expiration of that time. His term of office would absolutely cease at the end of ten years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Would that law apply to judges who have accepted positions in the Senate ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am unable to answer.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

The senate adjourned .

Bill (76) An Act respecting the Red Deer Valley Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

AMENDMENT TO THE AUTONOMY BILL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the hon. leader of the House if he would be kind enough to favour us with a declaration similar to the one which I heard was to be made in the Commons to-day, with reference to the amendment that the government propose to make to the Autonomy Bills, if the matter is decided.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that any amendment is to be proposed in the House of Commons to the Autonomy Bills.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not the amendment, but the announcement of the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that the matter is to be brought up.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Stick to your guns.

PRYOR DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the third reading of Bill (B) An Act for the relief of James Arthur Pryor.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I object to the passage of this Bill on principle. I object to divorce cases being brought here at all. I object on principle, and I object to this measure in particular, because I hold in my hand the evidence, and I can find nothing in law or scripture to warrant a divorce on such grounds. I am told it is not the custom to debate before the House any evidence taken in the committee. I think it would be a very sad thing for the country at large if divorces are to be granted on such trivial matters as are contained in this document and without any proof of facts at all. With these remarks I move in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. McDonald (C.B.), that this Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not had the pleasure of reading the evidence to which the hon. gentleman from Rothesay has referred, but he is perfectly in order in discussing the evidence. It has been printed so that it may, if necessary, be discussed here, and if it appears the evidence does not make a sufficiently strong case to warrant the House in passing the Bill, then the House would not be justified in passing it. We have in the past, on various occasions, discussed evidence in connection with divorce bills, and I think the House would be very glad to hear from the hon. gentleman his reasons at length, citing the evidence.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—As a member of the Divorce Committee, I can honestly say that in every instance the committee has been most careful in taking the evidence to see that the charges were sustained, and it is only when it is clear beyond all doubt that the respondent is guilty of conduct warranting a separation that divorce is granted. I do not challenge the opinion of my hon. friend on the evidence he has read, but I think he must have turned over two pages at a time if he has come to the conclusion that the charges in the Bill have not been sustained by the evidence. The conclusion of the committee was that the defendant had been guilty of acts which would warrant this House in granting a divorce. In no single case has the Divorce Committee ever recommended a divorce unless the charges in the Bill have been proven beyond a doubt. This case is no exception.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—In this case the hon. gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) says that the evidence does not contain proof of the charges set forth in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Not to my mind.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I have not read the evidence and, therefore, am not in a position to vote on the question. I do not desire to read such matters unless I am compelled to, and I have not read the evidence in this case. I would suggest that it would be well to let the third reading of this Bill stand until members have had an opportunity to read the evidence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am in precisely the same position as my hon. friend who has just spoken. I was away a few days and on my return found the evidence on my table, but have not had time to read it, and, therefore, would not be justified in recording a vote after the statement that has been made by the hon. senator from Rothesay. In order to justify the votes which I give in the Senate on divorce bills, I must be convinced that the evidence is of such a character as to warrant us in granting a divorce. We in Canada have laid down one principle, and that is that divorce shall not be granted except on proof of the commission of one crime. If that has not been proven in this case, I shall vote against the Bill. I have in the past read the evidence for the purpose of enabling me to give an intelligent vote, and if the hon. mover, with the concurrence of the hon. gentleman from Rothesay, will postpone the third reading for a few days, we will be in a better position to pass judgment on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I am quite willing to have it stand over.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yesterday, as a matter of courtesy for an hon. member who was not present, I set down the third reading of this Bill for to-day in the absence of the hon. gentleman who has it in charge. That is an additional reason to the reasons advanced by the leader of the opposition that the consideration of the Bill should be postponed to some future day. I, therefore, ask permission to withdraw my motion and have the order discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading on Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That is quite satisfactory, and I beg leave to withdraw my amendment.

The order for third reading was fixed for Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I have no objection.

The order for the third reading of the Bill was fixed for Tuesday next.

CENSUS AND STATISTICS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (5) An Act respecting the Census and Statistics.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may observe that this is mainly a consolidation of the Acts now on the statute-books. There are two clauses to which I would direct the attention of the House, clause 3 and clause 4. Those are substantially—in fact entirely—the only alterations which are being made in the existing statutes. Under these provision is made for the creation of a permanent office which shall be occupied with the continued compilation of statistics in the intervals between the taking of the present decennial and quinquennial census. Those are the main features of the Bill, and hon. gentlemen will observe that in each case the particular section of the Revised Statutes is referred to where they simply re-enact it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should like to ask the hon. minister if the number of officials created by the Bill will add to the expense of taking the census?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Not according to the information supplied me by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, in whose department this matter is. He hopes that the total expense will be somewhat reduced by means of this measure. There will be an annual expenditure of some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, according to his computation, but we will be in possession of a much larger volume of statistics than we at present possess. Now, my hon. friend knows we are obliged to have a quinquennial census for the purpose of obtaining information as to the population of the Northwest and Manitoba, and in practice it has been found that the census requires to be commenced, as matters stand, a year or eighteen months before each decennial period. And as he probably knows it takes at least four, and perhaps five years before all the information that is required to be collected by the census can be collected, revised and published. Then when the five years have expired we have to take the quinquennial census again, so that in reality but very little addition will be made to the length of time that the census staff is at present employed. As far as I can estimate, probably not more than two years out of the ten, or three years at the outside, will be required, in addition to the time during which the staff is now employed. And it has been found very inconvenient in practice, after these men have acquired a certain amount of experience, to break them up and form a census staff each five years. That is the chief reason which induced the Minister of Agriculture to recommend this Bill to the lower chamber.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is it likely this new system will lead to a very correct enumeration ? I think there are very few people in the country who believe in the correctness of the census as it is taken at present. There is a great deal of carelessness, and if this will lead to a correct enumeration it is a very good Bill. The trouble is to get a correct enumeration. The young men employed are careless and take the names in a haphazard way. In our province we do not place any reliance at all on the taking of the census.

On clause 10,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does not this provide for more information than has been obtained in the past? I remember one census when the education of the people was not taken. I see there is a provision for it in this Bill. I think it is a very good amendment. The fourth clause provides for the taking of the census of the different factories, as to what is to constitute a factory—'Warehouse, factories and other buildings therein.' I remember very well some very severe strictures being passed upon the census that was taken a few years ago, the one before the last, as to what constituted a factory and what constituted manufacturing industries. Objection was taken then to the smaller factories, where two or three or half a dozen people were employed being set down as factories, which added, of course, materially to the number of those engaged and the different classes of industries. Will this include the smaller ones to which objection was taken some eight or ten years ago, or will it be regulated by instructions from the department ? My hon. friend who has this Bill in charge understands very well what I mean, because I think he took very strong objections to the census on these grounds. If my recollection serves me right, and I think it does, it was on this particular point. I am not referring to these matters as objections. The provision in reference to the education of the people, is a good one as it will afford a full knowledge of the matter in the different provinces, enabling the provinces to take steps to remove any obstacles in the way of educating the rising generation, where it is most required, and so far as the factories are concerned, it is simply for the purpose of bringing under the notice of the Senate the objections taken before, so that these matters can be regulated.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As I understand, the instructions issued by the minister are to define factories as places in which not less than five persons are engaged. If my hon. friend remembers, the objections that were taken to a number of industries that were enumerated were that they consisted of single persons, and I remember one set of cases in which there were 100 distinct factories, so called, I think for knitting, and the average amount of capital in these was considerably under $8 each. My hon. friend will find the details in the third volume of the census of 1891, if my memory is correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman's memory is good.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—And he will also find that these one hundred factories to which I alluded employed one hundred ladies of advanced age, earning a wage rather under $14 each in the course of a year. I think the Minister of Agriculture has instructed his officials that these may be treated comprehensively, without special reference. My hon. friend will notice that this is a re-enactment of section 5 of chapter 58 of the Revised Statutes, and it is not amended in any way.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 32,

Every officer, census commissioner, enumerator, agent or other person employed in the execution of this Act, who, in the pretended performance of his duties thereunder, obtains or seeks to obtain information which he is not by or under this Act duly authorized to obtain, is guilty of an indictable offence.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Should not these officers be sworn ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They are sworn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. member give us any reason why this clause is introduced ? Has it been the practice of some enumerators to demand information not called for by the Act ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The reason assigned by the Minister of Agriculture was that complaints had been made to him, particularly I think on the part of certain manufacturers, that persons who had been employed in collecting those statistics had improperly attempted to obtain information from these persons with respect to their private business, or business secrets which they had no right to obtain, and of course we desired, while obtaining all the information that the census required, to take no unfair advantage of, or pry unduly into the private affairs of any person. It was to meet these complaints that this clause was introduced.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A very good reason.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN SENATORS AT WASHINGTON.

Mr. SPEAKER—I deem it my duty to take this the first opportunity after the reassembling of the Senate to bring to its notice the very cordial reception which was given to your Speaker, and to the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, ex-premier and senator and the Honourable Senator McSweeney, at the inauguration of the president of the United States, at Washington, on the 4th of March last.

On learning of our presence in the city the president accorded us a private reception, and requested me, as your Speaker to convey to the Canadian Senate his high appreciation of our attendance at his inauguration, and his hearty wishes that the intercourse between the public men of both neighbouring nations should be more frequent and more intimate.

I desire at the same time, on behalf of myself and colleagues, to thank the Senate of the United States for the very gracious act it performed on the day of our arrival, by adopting the following resolution granting to us the courtesies of the Senate and the privileges of the floor, of that honourable body.

In the Senate of the United States,

March 3rd, 1905.

On motion by Mr. Spooner :

Resolved, that the courtesies of the Senate, including the privileges of the floor, are extended to the Honourable Raoul Dandurand, Speaker of the Senate of the Dominion of Canada, and the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell ex-premier and senator of the said Dominion, who are at the capital to attend the inaugural ceremonies.

Attest :

CHARLES G. BENNETT,
Secretary.

As this resolution is of record in the minutes of that body, I have felt that this act of courtesy on the part of our brother senators from over the line should be officially recognized and taken cognizance of as a friendly act towards our whole chamber, and duly recorded in our own proceedings.

The honourable Senator McSweeney, whose presence at the American capital had not been announced, was granted the same reception as that given to his colleagues.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can only echo the sentiments contained in the statement made by the hon. Speaker. Unsolicited by any of us, all the courtesies that could possibly be extended to people from Canada, were extended to us at Washington. Intimation was given to us that the Senate, learning that we were in the city, extended to us the courtesies alluded to by the hon. the Speaker, and the interview with the President was of a character that was gratifying to us and to every Canadian. The president was exceedingly affable. I need not refer to the speech made by the Speaker of the Senate in which he reciprocated the sentiments of the President in reference to the feeling which should exist and which we hope will continue to exist between the two countries and the hope that there would be more frequent intercourse between us. He spoke particularly of some remarks which had been made by the Premier of this country, and I thought it my duty to reaffirm them and to say that the feelings stated by the Speaker were shared by those who were in opposition to the government. In reference to the hon. senator from Moncton, had it been known that he was in the city his name would have been included with ours. I regret that it was not. Being an Irishman, however, though he was invited to the floor of the House, his gallantry led him to the gallery, to the more congenial company of the ladies, while the Speaker and myself had to go to the floor, where we could look up to him and envy his position. Should any representative from Washington visit this country, I trust that the same courtesies will be extended to him that were extended to the Speaker of the Canadian Senate. The more of these interchanges of civilities and courtesies occur the better friends we will all be in the future. (Cheers.)

Hon. Mr. ELLIS moved, seconded by Mr. Kerr (Toronto), that the statement of the Speaker be recorded on the Journals of the House, and that a copy of the same be transmitted to the President of the United States and the President of the United States Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 21, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

PETITION OF DAVID THOMAS OWEN.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I may not be in order now, but I think this is the proper time to call the attention of the House and the hon. Speaker to a certain petition which comes from a foreigner. Some three or four years ago the question came before this chamber, and there is a very elaborate decision on the part of our hon. Speaker's predecessor in the chair upon the point, deciding that a foreigner had no right to lay a petition before the parliament of Canada. I need not discuss the matter, because, as I have said, the whole question is treated very fully in this decision of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, when he was Speaker of the House. Therefore, I merely call the attention of the hon. Speaker and the House to the facts.

Hon. Cr. FERGUSON—Is it from a foreigner?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The petition is from a gentleman in Cleveland, Ohio.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What petition does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—David Thomas Owen, of the city of Cleveland, State of Ohio.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Has the petition been received ?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It is being laid before the House to be received, and I think this is the proper time to call attention to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Better move that it be not received, and let it stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It may stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the meantime the Speaker can look into it. The petition cannot be read until it is received. It has not been received. It can be referred to the hon. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If this petition is, as the hon. gentleman states, the petition of a United States citizen to the House praying for the passing of an Act with reference to some letters patent which are about to expire—I am not familiar with the details, but something of that nature—I should like to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that a great many petitions have been received this session, and other sessions intervening since that decision was given, from foreigners, and legislation granted in the same way as if they were our own citizens.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Without objection ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Without objection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there had been an objection it might have been different.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The practice of receiving petitions from those who are not British subjects has been growing, and I mention this so that the hon. gentlemen will have to judge of the circumstances as to our practice in the past in regard to petitions.

The SPEAKER—I suppose this matter will stand till to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved that the reading of this petition be deferred until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Is it understood that the hon. gentleman asks for the ruling of the Speaker upon it ?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF FOREIGN ENGINEERS ON THE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY SURVEY.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

By Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) :

Will call the attention of the government to a portion of the report of Judge Winchester, who was appointed to inquire into the truth or falsity of the allegations that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway managers were employing civil engineers from the United States to the exclusion of Dominion engineers, as follows :—

Referring to the capability and availability of Canadian engineers, Judge Winchester says : Mr. Hays and Mr. Stephens, having stated that they were unable to obtain capable Canadian engineers to do the necessary work in connection with this railway, I made inquiry with reference to the capability and availability of engineers bona fide residents in Canada, and examined a number of eminent engineers on that question. The consensus of their evidence is that there was a sufficient number of capable engineers to perform the work as well as, if not better than, the American engineers appointed, and that had reasonable efforts been made by Mr. Hays or Mr. Stephens, they would have had no difficulty whatever in obtaining the necessary talent for the work to be performed.

Judge Winchester quotes from the evidence of Sir Sandford Fleming and others as to the ability of Canadian engineers and says : In addition to the evidence of the engineers above mentioned, who were unanimous in stating that Canadian engineers were not inferior to the American engineers for the work in question, and some of whom stated that they were superior, having a better knowledge of our northern country, and that a sufficient number were available for such work at the salaries offered, I examined Mr. William Mackenzie, whose firm are constructing the Canadian Northern Railway, and he stated that he did not know a single engineer in connection with that railway who was an American. I also examined Mr. A. W. Campbell, Assistant Commissioner of Public Works for Ontario, and a civil engineer, and who had charge of the construction of the Temiscamingue and Northern Ontario Railway. He stated that he had no difficulty in obtaining Canadian engineers to take charge of the location and construction of that railway ; in fact, he had so many applications that he did not know what to do with them.

The conclusion of the report is as follows : As the result of the evidence taken before me during the investigation I am of the opinion that there was no earnest endeavour made to obtain Canadian engineers for the location of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway by those having authority to employ such ; that had such an effort been made there would have been no difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number capable not only of locating, but of constructing the whole work. In the word 'engineers' I include all from the chief engineer and harbour engineer to transit men, draughtsmen, levellers and topographers. There was, however, a very earnest desire to obtain American engineers for the work, and in some cases applications were made to the heads of other railway companies to relieve men for the purpose of having them brought to Canada to be employed on this road. I have already stated the number of American engineers so employed on this road. I find also, from the evidence, that the Canadian engineers are not inferior to the American engineers for the work in question, but having a superior knowledge of the country they are better qualified for that work. I also desire to state that the Canadian engineers are not asking for protection for themselves, but merely desire that no discrimination be made against them. That discrimination has been made against them, in my opinion, there is no doubt.

And will ask if the government has taken any steps to enforce the Alien Labour Act ? How many United States civil engineers are employed on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway survey, and how many Dominion engineers ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That question cannot be answered during Mr. Wainwright's absence. It will have to be put off for some weeks. I have a letter from the Department of Labour to say that it cannot be answered until Mr. Wainwright returns. He was called away to the other side of the Atlantic by the death of a relative, and is not expected back for some time.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—An additional reason is the fact that I was asked, as a special favour, to postpone this motion for a number of days, and I now name the 4th of April.

The motion was allowed to stand until the 4th of April.

THE LOAN AND SAVINGS COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Whether the government has been informed that there exists in Montreal a company known under the name of ' The Loan and Savings Company,' the principal office of which is situated at No. 26 St. Alexis Street, Montreal ?

When was this company incorporated by letters patent under the Act 40th Victoria, chapter 50 ?

Has the aforesaid company ever made and transmitted to the Minister of Finance the returns required by section 22 of the said Act ?

At what date was each of these returns received by the Minister of Finance ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government have no knowledge of the existence of a company under the name of the Loan and Savings Company. I have had a search made among the records to know whether any such company was incorporated, and cannot find that it ever was. The name is not to be found anywhere in our returns, and the Finance Minister has no information on the subject. It must be a fake.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to bring to the notice of the House an article that was published in the ' Mail ' on the 16th March, under the title of ' A stain upon the Senate.' It reads as follows——

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—Will the hon. gentleman wait until to-morrow ? I will be in a position then to give an answer. I have not the paper here.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All right, I will bring it up to-morrow.

NICOLA, KAMLOOPS AND SIMILKAMEEN COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto) moved the third reading of Bill (34) An Act respecting the Nicola, Kamloops and Similkameen Coal and Railway Company, as amended.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Perhaps the third clause of this Bill goes further than most of us would be willing to allow a Bill to go. It strikes me that it is rather retroactive in its character, and if such be the case, I should like to have the promoter of the Bill explain that third clause.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The hon. senator is quite right in saying that the third clause is retroactive. It is intended to be retroactive. The circumstances connected with it require that it should be or the company would pass out of existence. I may state the case shortly in this way and there is nothing more practically to be said about it ; this company was incorporated by the province of British Columbia in 1891, by chapter 47. Time was given for the commencement and completion of the work. The time so granted expired, and in 1903 a subsequent Act of British Columbia was passed striking out the clause in the previous Act under which the company was limited as to time for commencement or completion and so on the face of the Bill it appeared that the company stood incorporated to build without limitation of time whatever. Then, in the same year, this parliament passed an Act, chapter 164, in which they declared that the works of that company were for the general advantage of Canada, transferring the jurisdiction over the company from the province to the Dominion parliament. The preamble for that Act recites the two previous Acts of the British Columbia legislature, and this parliament at that time acted under the impression that the company was in fact in existence, the time limit having been struck out, but it turned out that by the strict reading of the General Railway Act of British Columbia there was a question whether this company had or had not a limitation of time granted to it, and whether the limitation of time which had been granted in the Act incorporating the company was not the one which was to govern rather than the general clause in the Railway Act of British Columbia which gave a time, and which would have operated upon this company as it was understood by the parliament of Canada it would at that time. There was also the fact that the last Act of British Columbia contained a provision by which it was declared that that Act was not to go into force unless certain conditions were first performed, the deposit of money in the hands of the government of British Columbia, security for construction of the road, which deposit was made and certain other conditions performed in the way of security. These have made the matter so involved, that it is a very grave question whether the company is or is not in existence at all, and whether the Act which was passed in 1903 was not absolutely ineffective and did not apply to a company which had no existence. To remove that objection this Bill has been introduced, and for that reason the organization of the company having been kept up, and this difficulty only having been discovered recently, it is proposed that the existence of the company shall be practically confirmed, and that is the reason it is retroactive, and it is not retroactive to any other extent. That was explained to the committee before the House of Commons, and there was a special reference to a special committee of that House to look into the matter. They reported accordingly and upon that the House of Commons passed it and it was the subject of explanation here before the Railway Committee. I hope with this explanation the Senate will see that the Bill is a proper one.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

MURPHY DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) moved the third reading of Bill (A) an Act for the relief of Edward Albert Murphy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no intention to oppose the Bill in any other way than to record my vote against it, but I take this opportunity to call the attention of the House to some faulty matters which I find in the report of the committee. This marriage which is to be annulled has been contracted twice, once in the States and once in Canada. I do not know which one of the two marriages is to be annulled.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—A double barrelled marriage.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will read from the petitioner's evidence. He was asked—'Do you remember the circumstances under which you were married?' and he answers 'yes, at Rouse's Point, the 29th June.' He does not say what year. 'And then we were married again in St. Patrick's church by Father Quinlivan'?

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What year?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It does not say. Then he is asked 'under what circumstances did you happen to go to Rouse's Point?' And he answered 'Well, there was some question of putting off the marriage and she was very anxious to get married, and I thought that was the best way out of it and we went off like fools.' I think the committee should be a little more careful in taking the evidence and let us know in what year the marriage took place. I will not go over the evidence. There are very nasty things in this document which might justify the recommendation of the committee in the opinion of those that think marriage can be annulled by granting a divorce, but the first fact which is brought out in the evidence seems to have been condoned altogether and that is the worst circumstance. The petitioner says 'and one day I went to Mr. Living's house to see her and my wife threw herself into my arms and burst into tears and in that way prevented me from getting a divorce, so I let the whole thing drop.' Is it because it was dropped that he is now divorced ? A few letters were produced during the taking of the evidence and especially a letter which is supposed to be in the handwriting of the respondent. He is asked 'Is that the letter you refer to ?' And he says yes, the first letter about December, 1897.'

Q. Is this letter in her handwriting ?—A. Yes.
Q. That is her signature ?—A. That is her writing. There is no signature.
Q. But at all events you identify it as her handwriting ?—A. Yes.
Q. This is the letter that you received ?—A. Yes.

And the letter is marked exhibit 3. If we turn to exhibit 3 we will find that letter, but it is signed. Who put that signature there ? The evidence shows that it was not signed. I am taking this occasion to draw the attention of the House to the manner in which this evidence has been taken, and I think it is in a very loose way.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no doubt about the adultery.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, but there is a question whether it has not been pardoned ; he says he 'let the whole thing drop.' The fact that the wife went to see him and ask his pardon and he let the whole thing drop prevented him asking for a divorce, and he comes three or four years afterwards asking for a divorce on account of a circumstance for which, in his testimony, he says he did not dare ask for a divorce. That is all I wish to say now, but we might have a little further discussion to-morrow on another Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am sorry the hon. chairman of the Divorce Committee (Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) is not in his place. I am quite sure if he were present he would satisfy my hon. friend fully that the committee dealing with that case dealt with it on the same lines that they have dealt with all the cases that have come before us. The evidence in the case was undoubtedly conclusive, that the wife of the petitioner had been guilty of the grossest crime that any woman could possibly commit. The fact was clearly proved. My hon. friend says that the petitioner condoned his wife's offence. I dare say in the inception of the trouble between the woman and her husband, had she reformed, as she at one time promised to do, he possibly would have allowed the matter to drop, but after bearing patiently for years with conduct which must be intolerable to any husband, he was forced to seek relief. With reference to the double marriage, we as a committee have nothing to do with that. My hon. friend will not say that a legal marriage was not solemnized in this country. It was, and we took cognizance of that legal marriage, which had been duly solemnized in Montreal. We had to deal with it when it came before us, just as we had to deal with other marriages. If my hon. friend will read the whole of the evidence, he will conclude that any man who has stood the trial and torture to which Murphy was subjected, justly deserves relief at the hands of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I wish to put the matter clearly before the committee who have to deal with marriage and divorce. I would ask them not to force this hon. House to vote for divorces that are not proper—I will not say outside the law. I regret having consented to a divorce being granted last year to a man who was unworthy of it, a man who, finding his wife in adultery, said, in answer to a question put to him as to what he did : 'I went back to the hotel and smoked a cigar, and then next day I left,' thereby condoning the crime of the wife ; yet the committee granted him a divorce. This year we have another case of the same kind before us. I will not mention the case ; I am not speaking now of this particular case, but I would ask the committee, when they present a report to this House recommending that a divorce be granted, that they should see that it is a case of extreme gravity and serious consideration. This country is not given to breaking up the family ties and social conditions, and I hope that the committee, when it presents a Bill here granting a divorce to citizens of Canada, will only do so for very serious and grave reasons, and that when they recommend a divorce to this House it will be on evidence that will not be trivial. As the hon. member from Stadacona has pointed out, this divorce is recommended without facts and without data upon which we can go.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For some fourteen or fifteen years I have been a member of the Divorce Committee. Several other members of this chamber, who have had considerable experience in the matter of weighing evidence, and are likewise familiar with conditions of social life, have also been members of that committee. I had not thoroughly appreciated the responsibility which devolves upon that committee, until I heard the remarks which have just fallen from the lips of my hon. friend from the Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran). It is unfortunate that we have not had the advantage of his ability, theological and parliamentary, on that committee. I am sure, with the suggestions which he has made as to the responsibility of members of that committee, and the necessity of their properly discriminating as to the evidence and of their preserving the integrity of the family ties, to which he has so feelingly referred, we would more than appreciate the enlistment of his ability as a member of the Divorce Committee. I am sure the committee will not overlook the suggestions he has made. I am not authorized in any way to speak on behalf of the members of that committee, but I can assure him that hereafter we will endeavour to appreciate to a very much greater extent than we have in the past, the very serious responsibility which, as he has been good enought to point out, devolves upon us.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—It was not my intention to make any observation upon the third reading of this Bill, and I would not do so now had it not been for some of the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman opposite (Hon. Mr. Cloran). He was not content, as the previous speaker in opposition to the Bill was, to confine himself to suggestions as to omissions in the evidence. In regard to these omissions I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that all these cases are initiated in the House by the presentation of a petition. That petition, on which the subsequent proceedings are based, becomes, like every other paper in the case, an important document and is preserved along with other papers, including the evidence. If the hon. gentleman will turn to that petition he will find that the dates and places are all set forth with great particularity, and the evidence substantiates the allegations in the petition. While it might appear to him that there are omissions in the evidence, he will see that they are not really material. As to a double marriage, there was one marriage—there could be but one marriage. There might be two or more ceremonies of marriage, but there was only one marriage, and it is that tie which the Senate is asked to dissolve. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Cloran) made his objecion and spoke of the laxity with which the committee were in the habit of conducting their examinations. Now I should like to say to my hon. friend who thinks the committee are not sufficiently careful and not sufficiently impressed with the gravity of the duties which they have to discharge, that I will not yield to the hon. gentleman or to any man in this chamber, or to any man living, in my regard for the sacredness of the marriage tie. I have hitherto, during the six or seven years that I have served on that committee, acted in that spirit, as I shall continue so to act so long as I am honoured with a position on that committee. I profess to know when a fact is established by sufficient evidence. It has been my good, or bad fortune to have been engaged for over forty years in elicting evidence, in weighing evidence, and in drawing conclusions from evidence, and so far as the case now before this House is concerned I regret to say, for the sake of the parties concerned, that in the opinion of the committee, the allegations in the petition of wrong-doing—I do not repeat the words used in the petition for obvious reasons—but the act of wrong-doing was established by the evidence up to the hilt. There could be no escape from the conclusion at which the committee arrived. I do not intend to answer the reference to a case which was heard at a previous session, although it would be interesting to some hon. members to learn that a man who saw his wife commit an improper act and went away and smoked his pipe, was condoning the act which he witnessed. I will not argue that point, but if the case should be referred to again I may see fit to go into that more fully. I will say just a word with regard to this case and the other to which the hon. gentleman referred. I hope the number of these cases will be as limited as possible for, as I said before in this chamber, and I wish to repeat now, and to repeat with all the emphasis that I can command, I have always tried to find, in sitting upon an inquiry of this kind, some proper and reasonable ground on which to reject the petition. If it comes to my mind that the party seeking the divorce is himself, or herself, guilty of the act complained of, they will not get a dissolution of the marriage tie by my vote.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Had it not been for the remark made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) I would have allowed this matter to go to a vote, if a vote there be, without making any remarks ; but the insinuation cast by the hon. gentleman that the Divorce Committee neglects its duty and does not thoroughly understand the duties which pertain to it, is something to which I am not prepared to quietly submit. My hon. friend stands on a very high plane according to his estimation. He pretends to say that a certain thing ought not to be done, it matters not whether the alleged crime was committed or not. He appeals to the House that we are asked to separate the ties of father, mother and children. Is he superior to a judge on the bench ? Is his judgment superior to the jurisdiction of a court ? Does he feel that he has a right to come here and censure the committee and charge them with having failed to do their duty honestly, fairly and justly ? I know full well that the members of that committee are sincere, upright and honest ; that they do their duty and refuse to grant a divorce except on one ground. If that is the case, and if there is a separation allowed under the laws of Quebec, is it wrong that there should be a divorce under the jurisdiction of this parliament ? Are we to say to a person who comes here for a divorce that because he failed to take the law in his own hands, but, on the contrary, showed humanity, he is to be denied the right which he is supposed to possess under the law ? It is unfair and unreasonable that we should be expected, in that committee, to act otherwise than we have acted in that case. In reference to the present case, if my hon. friend from Victoria fully understood all the offences that had been committed, and had any feeling of generosity in his heart, he would say that Murphy had acted with great forbearance, more so than nine out of ten men would have acted ; and that being so, I ask in all fairness why this case is appealed against ? If there ever was a case in which the interference of parliament was justified it is this Murphy case. The man was afflicted almost from the day of his marriage until the time that he left his wife, and why ? On account of her habits and on account of what she did, and he must have been almost more than human to put up with the abuse he received at the hands of his wife. Not only that, but he strove by every means possible in his power to save her from ruin. He sent her to one place after another for the purpose of trying to reform her. He did all he could, all that human nature could be expected to do to try to restore that woman to society. She refused to be reclaimed, and is he to-day to be told that because he could not accomplish her reform, he should be tied for life to that woman ? It is unfortunate that this matter should be brought up to-day, and that the impression should go abroad that a married man or woman may commit every offence imaginable, and the injured partner need not look for redress to parliament. It would be an unfortunate thing if such an idea should be promulgated. I hope those who have brought up this matter to-day will reconsider the position in which they are putting parliament. We all know full well that if certain offences are committed, parliament has the power to grant a divorce. In this case, the commission of the offence has been proved, and all that is asked is that the divorce be granted in view of the evidence.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that human sentiment ought to take the place of divine law ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We know full well what the law of Canada is in this matter, and I do not suppose we have to interfere with the divine law when we have the statute law to act upon.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am not in accord with the statement that the statute law takes the place of divine law.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

INSPECTION AND SALE OF SEEDS ACT.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading (Bill 7) an Act respecting the Inspection and Sale of Seeds.—Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said : I should like the hon. Secretary of State to postpone the second reading of this Bill till Thursday. It is a Bill of some importance, and I have not been able to give it proper attention, because while I think the intention of the government is in the right direction it seems to me the provisions of the Bill are impracticable, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to postpone it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection.

The Order of the Day was allowed to stand till Thursday next.

FREE TRANSPORTATION OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day being called :

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill D) an Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, as regards the free transportation of senators and members of the House of Commons.—Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) moved that the hon. Speaker do now leave the chair.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suggest that the hon. gentleman might let this stand till Thursday. He thinks it is a matter of the most vital importance that this Bill should be rushed through. Usually when more than one member asks to have a Bill stand over the request is complied with. There was some discussion in connection with this Bill, and I tried to make it clear to the House that the Bill was unnecessary, because the Railway Commission had the power to do what it provides for, and it is not the sort of legislation to exhibit before the country.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I proposed before this stage was reached to have an interview with the Railway Commission, but on making inquiry I found that the Railway Commission was sitting at Niagara. I understand the commissioners have returned and I ask to have the Bill stand till Thursday in order that there may be an opportunity to consult with them, and ascertain if they have the power to deal with it. The hon. Secretary of State produced a telegram from the secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company asking that the measure be not proceeded with until they had an opportunity to be here.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—This Bill has been a very long time on the order paper, and I have, at the request of several hon. members of the House, postponed it until now, and it has to pass the Commons yet. The session is getting on, and private member days will probably be scarce in the House, and I think we should pass this Bill now. It was read the first time on the 23rd of February, and at the request of the leader of the government I agreed to postpone the next stage from the 23rd February till the 9th March. Then, when it came up for second reading, I postponed it by request, and then I postponed it again. The principle of the Bill has been adopted by this House by a vote of more than two to one, and I may say there was absolutely no opposition that I know of outside of this House. The Bill is a very simple one containing three short lines, simply inserting the words 'upon the presentation of a card of identification' approved of and certified by the Clerk of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Commons as the case might be. I have had conversations with gentlemen outside of this House interested in large railway companies, and they consider this is rather a guarantee from the fact that there will be one single certificate issued, instead of having 50 or 60 passes over all the railways in the country. There are from 60 to 70 railways, and members have to have a pass over every one of them. Consequently I am told this Bill offers a great deal more security and as the hon. Secretary of State said, he had received a telegram from some one connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway asking a postponement of this Bill, I have reason to believe now that the Secretary of State has no further objection to the Bill, and that the gentleman who telegraphed on that occasion withdraws all opposition. It is a convenience for the railway companies, and I think it will be a convenience for all. It is not a new thing : it exists in many other countries.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he were proceeding on a long journey where he is not known, would he leave his pass at home and go with the certificate of the Clerk? I do not think there is a gentleman in this House who would feel secure in going along with his certificate only. If he is going a long journey where he is not known would he leave his pass at home and trust entirely to the certificate of the Clerk?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Certainly, one certificate would carry any hon. gentleman over every railroad. To-day every hon. senator may travel without a pass—simply enter the railway carriage and say: 'I am here by Act of parliament and you have to carry me as far as I care to go.' But the conductor may say: 'We do not know that you are a member of parliament. How can you prove it?' If this Bill passes he can prove it by exhibiting his card of identification.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This is a matter in which we should go it a little slow, if I may use that expression. In the first place my hon. friend says that this Bill has been now over a month on the order paper, and that the session is wearing somewhat to a close. Well, we know that for a number of years past, parliament has never closed short of four months, and we are only a little over two months here. Then again I think we had better carefully study what possibly might be the outcome of the passage of a Bill of this kind. When the railway companies give a pass, under the existing law, if it is under the law that they give it, they acknowledge their acquiescence in the law. They accept the enactment, and give each member a pass so that he can be recognized by their conductors. That is the object now in granting a pass. Supposing that we decline to recognize the action of the railways, and the Speaker of this House gives any senator a certificate that he is a member of this House, on the strength of that the conductor is supposed to allow that senator to ride free. That is supposed to enable the conductor to recognize him as a senator, but supposing he refuses to recognize him and puts him off the train with that certificate in his possession, what course is to be adopted by the senator? He brings an action against the Canadian Pacific Railway, say for having been ejected from the train. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway occupies rather a peculiar position as regards this country. They have a clause in their charter that the parliament of Canada is not to interfere with them in the matter of rates until such time as they earn 10 per cent upon their invested capital. A member ejected from a train brings an action against the railway company for damages, and if he is to succeed in that action he must undoubtedly prove that the Canadian Pacific Railway is earning ten per cent upon its capital. That would be a reasonable ground for the Canadian Pacific Railway to take in answer to an action brought against them for ejecting a member of parliament from a train. Their reasonable answer would be 'we are not earning 10 per cent upon the invested capital of this company and we claim that the Act that calls upon us to carry members free is an infringement upon the contract that we made with this country, and that no person has a right to succeed.' If the Canadian Pacific Railway waives all that and grants us a pass by which the conductors acknowledge each member and carries us free over their line, I think we should accept it without raising the question at all or dictating to them that we won't accept that thing and that we persist in riding upon a certificate issued by the Clerk or the Speaker of this House. I do not think it would be safe to proceed in this way without the acquiescence of the railway companies as a whole. The Grand Trunk might possibly acquiesce. There is no difficulty with them, and no loop hole for them to get out of it. The Canadian Pacific Railway may take advantage of the conditions I have presented. Then what is the object of a pass? What is the object of a certificate from the Speaker of this House? It is not to enable the member to ride free. That has been accomplished by Act of parliament. It is declared that we shall do so. It is to enable the conductor to recognize that man and decide whether he is a member and whether as such he is entitled to ride free. Now the railway companies should have their own way of deciding who is a member. They should have an opportunity of satisfying themselves and I say that when they by their own act issue a pass to each member they are acquiescing in the law and establishing a method whereby they claim and agree to recognize a member and allow him to ride free.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What about the railways in Canada which have not issued passes ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the Consolidation Railway Bill was before the Senate, hon. gentlemen know that I spoke in opposition to this particular provision in the Act. I am opposed to all this kind of legislation and really one would suppose from the remarks made by the hon. mover that it was a matter of such vital importance that the delay of a few days or a week or two would be detrimental to the interests of this great Dominion. I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax is a very reasonable one. I would go further than that. This is matter affecting the internal economy of arrangement of the railway companies, and if this is to become law, if the Bill is sent to the Railway Committee where we can obtain the opinion of those who are connected with the railways, we would be better able to ascertain their feelings in the matter, and if they find it is to be adopted by parliament they might suggest a mode of carrying out the intentions that have been suggested by the hon. mover. It does seem to me that this kind of legislation is undignified. I may be wrong but it seems to me that it is beneath the dignity of this Senate to dabble with questions affecting their own individual interests, and I might say their pockets to that extent. We know how liberal they have been. It was stated by one hon. gentleman when I took objection to that clause in the Railway Act, that I no doubt had travelled on passes, and the answer to that was 'yes. I have received complimentary passes from the railroads. I accept them from a railway just as I accept an invitation to a social or dinner from any gentleman who thinks proper to invite me and act upon it,' but to be constantly legislating upon questions of this kind in order to facilitate the travelling of members, I repeat, is beneath the dignity of a body of this kind, and the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, I think is a very reasonable one. If the Railway Commission have the power to deal with this, they could deal with it in a manner probably that would meet the views of the hon. gentleman who has made the motion, and they might suggest a simple mode of accomplishing that end. The question of identification is one that would be no safer under this system than it would be under the ordinary pass, unless—and that is what I would move if we go on and get into committee—the photograph of every member who receives a certificate shall be attached to it in order that the conductor may know when he presents it that he is the person entitled to use it. At the centennial in Philadelphia passes were granted to the press, and the moment you received a pass you had to have your photograph on it, and they look at your photograph and then at your face. A fraud could be committed with a certificate the same as with a pass.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would you stick all photographs up in the police court ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No I would suggest the rogues' gallery. To be serious in this matter I hope the hon. gentleman will accept the suggestion of the hon. member from Halifax. It is not of such vital importance that we should push it through in a few minutes. I do not think it will hurt any of us to produce our passes in the future.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—I have been listening to the observations of hon. gentlemen on both sides, and it seems to me that a great deal has been said that is not businesslike. Some of the gentlemen who have spoken, like myself, know very little about railroads and railroad matters. When this legislation, making it compulsory on the part of railway companies to carry members free, was under discussion I do not think I took any part in it. I had no personal reason to do so certainly, because during my time in parliament I have always been supplied with all the passes I needed. In fact, I have only travelled on two or three lines, and my experience in that regard was not at all different from that of every member of parliament. They were all given passes, personally, as I said, there was no particular object. But when that legislation was introduced and passed, I think almost unanimously by the Senate, and became law, it seemed to me that it was a little strange that the legality of that law should be questioned to-day. I cannot understand why it should be advanced as a reason why this Bill should not be passed that we had no authority to introduce such legislation. The government agreed to it and I suppose the law officers of the Crown understood it, and if we now reject the Bill on account of the illegality of law we passed a year ago, surely we will be stultifying ourselves in a way it is difficult to understand. Again I must say that I have more or less sympathy with the object of this Bill. It is simply to enable members of parliament to have their transportation with the least possible inconvenience. That is all, as I understand it.

Since this law was passed, I have had at least twenty-five passes from all quarters of Canada from little roads of four or five miles in length to roads of two thousand miles in length. I do not carry all of them about with me. If I had the certificate asked for in this Bill, I would have no need to carry anything else. I would be able to say 'here is my certificate that I am a member of the Canadian Senate,' and nothing more would be required. I could present that anywhere. It identifies me and takes away all the responsibility of lugging these passes about. It is a convenience not only to myself, but also to the railway officials. A fear has been expressed that possibly a senator, on account of not being known, may be thrown off a train. That would be an extreme case, and to advance it shows the weakness of the case they are trying to support. There is not an old gentleman in the Senate that is not known all over the country. With our grey and bald heads there would be no trouble in identifying most of us. This Bill has been before the Senate for several weeks, and gone through the regular phases and is now to be referred to Committee of the Whole. I see no reason why it should be delayed simply because somebody wants to study it more carefully. I should say that any man of ordinary intelligence could study that Bill and know all about it in five minutes. Why do we want to study it so carefully if the law under which we are now acting is legal? Why waste more time with it? As the leader of the opposition has said, it is not a matter of very great importance, but I should say that if the mover of the Bill is allowed his rights the Bill will be passed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The remarks made by the hon. member for Halifax, strike me as being inconsistent with the duty of this House. We should not abrogate our rights, privileges and powers and put them in the hands of any commission or committee. On two occasions the hon. gentleman has suggested that we should pass this matter over to the hands of the Railway Commission. This House is quite capable of dealing with it, although to certain members it appears to be undignified. I cannot even accept that word undignified. Last year this parliament passed the Act unanimously.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Well, without a vote. This session the hon. member from de Lanaudière brings in a Bill to amend the Act, and I do not see how that can be described as undignified. Then the hon. member from Belleville says it might appeal to the pockets of certain members. I have a distinct recollection, although not the richest millionaire in this House, of having moved an amendment to the Railway Act two years ago to the effect that no railway company should be allowed to give a pass to anybody, and all the millionaires voted against me. I did not have a seconder to my amendment.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Because you did not mean it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—My words and my motion were there, showing whether I meant it or not. I could not get a seconder for my amendment. The result was that a clause was carried granting free transportation without regarding it as a favour from the company, to put members of parliament on a basis of absolute independence of the railway companies. That was done two years ago. The hon. senator from de Lanaudière comes this year and asks, what? Simply to make that Act more effective. We are to-day presented with passes by the different railway companies against the law. The law says that the companies shall transport us freely. We need no passes. I have heard the hon. senator say that we need nothing to identify us, that we can travel on the railroads free, and if any conductor should attempt to put us off a train we have our recourse in the courts of the country. That is true, but it is not practicable. If one is in a hurry, rather than be put off for refusal to pay ten or fifteen dollars, he would pay the money, and then, rather than fight the case in the courts to compel the company to reimburse the money, he would suffer the loss. Under the circumstances, it is absolutely necessary that members should have a means of identification. That is what we want, not passes. I object to the word 'pass.' What this House and the other House want is a means of identification, to satisfy the conductor that we are entitled to be carried free. Our present means of identification is a pass. I say we are not entitled to accept passes from the railways according to the law, and, under the circumstances, I am thoroughly in accord with the Bill presented by the hon. member from de Lanaudière. As the hon. senator from Cape Breton said, the Bill is very simple and does not require much time to be understood. But the hon. senator from Halifax tells us that the secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has wired the government to hold the Bill up. I am not prepared to await the good-will of the secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway. We are here masters of the situation, doing nothing wrong. We are acting in accordance with the law and in the interests of the railways, of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to correct the hon. gentleman's statement that the Bill was passed unanimously by this House. When the hon. member from Charlottetown (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) moved an amendment I seconded it, and if that amendment had been carried it would have killed the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—Whether the Bill passed unanimously or not, I believe every member accepts passes from the railways. When this Bill was under discussion last Thursday I was called hurriedly to Montreal. I did not have my bundle of passes with me; I had to go direct to the train, and had no pass in my pocket. There happened to be on the train with me a senator from Montreal who knew the conductor, and I was carried free. I might get a telegram at any time to leave the city and not have time to go and get my passes. If we simply had the one certificate, we could carry it with us all the time. I do not think it is undignified to ask for it. The law provides that we shall be carried free, and why not have something to certify to the conductor that the holder is a member of parliament. We can delay the passage of the Bill for a few days if there is any good reason for delay, but I intend to support the Bill.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I should like to have the original section read in order that we may know what we are amending.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Subsection 5 of the Act is very simple. It provides that—

> The company shall furnish free transportation upon any of its trains to members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, with their baggage and also for the members of the board, &c.

This inserts after the word 'baggage' the words which appear in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The Act as it stands provides that a member shall be carried free because he is a member of parliament. If we pass this Bill we limit that by requiring the member to have a certificate of identification. I see that the committee is determined to pass the Bill, but I think we ought to stand upon the right we have, that the fact of a man being a member of parliament is sufficient.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—That is an important point. Unquestionably we are by this Bill relieving the railway companies of the obligation to carry a member of parliament, unless he has a certificate of identification. If he should lose it——

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—He can get another.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The railway company under this clause will not be required to carry a member unless he furnishes a certificate of identification. If you lose your certificate or if it gets burned, you must pay your fare whether you are a member of either House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—You have to do it now if you lose your pass.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—You are putting it in a shape that the obligation rests with the member to produce a certificate to prove that he is a member. If you have not your certificate and you have to pay a fare, you cannot get a return, because it is your own fault if you do not produce the certificate.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not see why such a storm is raised over this certificate. I suppose every member of the two Houses has a pass from the Railway Department, which is sufficient identification on any train, and that ought to be a sufficient certificate of identification.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It comes to the same thing.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—If you have the pass from the Railway Department with you, it is a double security, so there is no danger that a member will be put off a train if he happens to leave his certificate at home. I do not understand that this Bill will relieve the government from issuing passes on their lines. If it does, the idea advanced by the hon. member from Wellington is good, but if it does not relieve them, his ideas ought not to prevail.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The government railways are not governed by the General Railway Act. They are exempt from it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I agree with the hon. gentleman from Glengarry; what we are after now is a means to reach a certain end, and if the hon. senator's suggestion is a good one, a certificate from the Railway Department is just as good as a certificate from the Clerk of the House. It is getting at the same thing in a different way. The hon. senator from Wellington has raised a question of law. He pretends that this Bill would take away the right which we now possess under the Railway Act. Probably he is right in that, and it would be well to see to it that if a member did not have his card of identification, he should not be deprived of his right to free transportation. That is a point to be taken into consideration. I would suggest, from a legal point of view, that his point is well taken and is a point that might give rise to a great deal of litigation. I would suggest to the mover of the Bill that he insert a word or clause in his Bill to provide that, notwithstanding the non-presentation of a card of identification, the railway is still obliged to carry him. Let it be complete. If we are going to do anything, we should do it thoroughly. If the hon. senator from de Lanaudière will allow me, I will propose an amendment to meet the objection of the hon. member from Wellington.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is a good old saying to leave well enough alone. This proposed certificate would apply properly to members of this House, because under Divine Providence we are here for life, but frequent changes take place in the House of Commons, and if a member of that House, after receiving his certificate of identification, should cease to be a member, he might use that certificate during the whole of the year. You are throwing on the railway companies a responsibility which you have no right to impose. The only reason that has been given—I would not like to say it is a childish one, but I will say that it is a very simple one—is that a member of either House might go on a journey without having a particular pass. It is not very much of a burden for a man to carry a book to contain his passes. What does a railway company give him a pass for? To have the privileges of that railway, and if a man neglects to carry his passes with him it is no fault of the railway companies. None of us would be over-burdened with the weight of a book to contain our passes. It is as easy to carry twenty as to carry one. You are putting on the Clerk of this House and the Clerk of the House of Commons the onus of giving a certificate to the railway companies that we are members of parliament. A conductor might refuse to accept it, because it is not an order from his company, and he would be acting within his rights to say: 'My instructions on this road are either to collect a ticket or to examine a pass furnished by the company.' You are simply putting an additional burden on the members of this House and an unnecessary burden on the railway companies when you seek to compel them to accept a certificate from the clerk. Take the case of a member who is unseated; he holds his certificate to the end of the year. Now, we know that in the local legislatures—and this is what we have to be careful about—the railway companies grant passes to members for six months only. Why? Because they consider six months sufficient time for these men to do their legislative business during the year. If a pass is granted for six months, and an election should take place and a new set of men be elected, then the railway companies can give the new members their new passes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—When a man ceases to be a member his pass ceases.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The pass once issued is valid, unless otherwise ordered, until the end of the year, and the certificate from the Clerk of the House would run in the same line.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, when a member ceases to be a member of parliament his right to free transportation ceases.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I say a gentleman who is a member of the House of Commons and is defeated at the polls would not, under this clause, be required to return his certificate, neither is the railway company obliged to find out whether he has been defeated or not, but under this Bill the conductors must accept the certificate of the clerk that he is still a member, though a defeated candidate, and you compel the railway companies to carry him to the end of the year.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is an assumption which should not be made in this House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—What takes place now when there is a general election?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman should not make the assumption that a member of parliament would use his pass after being defeated at the polls.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It could be done. My hon. friends asks what is the difference between the proposed certificate and an ordinary railway pass. The difference is this: all a railway company has to do now is to issue instructions to its agents which will appear in the working book at every station that pass so-and-so is recalled, and any one who presents that pass to a conductor upon a railway train will be obliged to give it up and pay his fare. Is there any provision of that kind in the certificate you are now granting under this Bill? There is nothing of the kind. It is simply a certificate which is good until otherwise ordered. There is no limitation to it. That is the difference between the ordinary railway pass and a certificate. I venture to say you will live to see the day that there will be far more complaint to the Senate and the House of Commons if this law is enacted, and far more trouble travelling on a certificate from the clerk, than under the courteous treatment we receive from the railway companies under the present system.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman has not answered my question—what takes place now when a general election is held?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I say if the railway company see fit, they can cancel the pass. It is issued to a certain date, unless otherwise ordered, and the railway company has the privilege of recalling the pass. In this certificate which we propose to grant, there is no difficulty in the upper House, but we are legislating for both Houses of parliament, and if I am correctly informed, it takes in the members of the local legislatures.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Say a general election takes place three months after the certificates are issued. A member of the House of Commons might be defeated and yet for nine months after his defeat he could use this certificate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—There is no provision here for the withdrawal of the certificate. Some hon. gentlemen say 'No'; if that is the case we had better make provision that the certificate of the clerk may be recalled and then we will be doing something that is practical, but as it stands now, a certificate once issued by the clerk cannot be recalled.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If I leave home without a pass and get on a railway in some part of the country where I am not known, how is the conductor to identify me? I must either pay my fare or he will put me off the train. I have not a pass on one half of the railroads of this country, and I think there should be some means by which a member of parliament could be identified by a conductor on any train, particularly when he has not a pass.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—That question is very easily answered. If the law as it stands compels every railway Company in Canada to furnish members of parliament free transportation, the railway company which does not do that is not complying with the Act of the parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—How are you going to force them to do it ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—When the Bill was at its second reading, I quite agreed with the object which the hon. gentleman who introduced it had in view. But I thought he was taking a wrong way to attain his end, and I think the short discussion since the House went into committee has shown that the hon. gentleman has done so. My view was that the matter should be settled by the Railway Commission. If hon. gentlemen do not care to go to the Railway Commission, the wiser course would be to have the matter referred to our own Railway Committee, as suggested by the hon. leader of the opposition, and the committee will elaborate something which will work. Hon. gentlemen must see that this Bill, instead of improving the position of members of both Houses, makes their position very much worse.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The provision of the law which it is proposed to amend, is subsection 5 of section 275 of the Railway Act of 1903. That provides that the company shall furnish transportation upon any of its trains to members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada with their baggage, and so on. There is no qualification. The railway companies are bound to furnish transportation to the members of the two Houses. What does this Bill do ? It says after the word 'baggage' insert the words 'upon presentation of a card of identification approved of and certified by the Clerk of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Commons as the case may be.' So that if my hon. friend from New Glasgow had been travelling under this clause on the occasion to which he has referred, he could not have passed because he was bound to present his card of identification, and when he had not that card of identification his right to travel free was gone. The right of free transportation is limited to those who present certificates. I think it is perfectly clear that the Bill in its present form does not carry out the intention of the House or of the hon. gentleman who has introduced it, and the better way would be to let the committee report progress and take time to make this measure more perfect, or to refer it to our own Railway Committee, or to the Railway Commission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Had we not better provide for a first-class car ? They are under the law compelled to give us free transportation, but it does not say what character it will be. Supposing under the present law they say 'There is a second-class car, or a cattle car and we will carry you in that.' There could be no answer to that. You could not compel them to give you a ride in a first-class car. If you are travelling, and want to travel in a pullman you pay for that. The answer to that is that the pullmans do not belong to the railway company, but belong to another company. The whole system belongs to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and you have just as good a right to claim a seat in a pullman without paying anything extra for it—that is where the companies own the pullmans themselves—as you have to claim the right to sit in a first-class car, and if the railway companies thought proper to be a little ugly about it they might say 'very well there is a second-class car for you, we have not any room anywhere else, you can go there, and if my hon. friend wants to facilitate the comfort of members he had better add that it shall be a first-class car or a pullman. I think he should go further and if he has his wife and children with him he should ask for a drawing-room.

Hon. Mr. McKEEN—And a dining-car.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a very good suggestion. I do not know whether that would answer for the prohibitionist. We might put in another sentence. They might furnish you with wine, and others with stronger taste, with Canadian whisky. That is the position we are in, and by the passage of this Bill as has been pointed out so forcibly and correctly by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, we are placing ourselves in a much worse position than before.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move that the committee rise and report recommending that the Bill be referred to the Railway Committee for the purpose of giving the railway companies an opportunity of being heard on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We are not the servants of the railway company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I should like to say a word or two on the subject. Have any gentlemen complained of the manner in which they have been treated when they were carrying their passes by any railroad in the country? If so it has not been reported on the floor of the House. I have been doing some little travelling myself during recess, and I found whenever I had a pass to show there was no trouble whatever. I was carried as the law provides without any charge for railway transportation. I passed over a certain portion of a road on which I had no pass, and there were gentlemen there who knew me and could certify that I was a senator of the Dominion. I told the conductor of the train who I was, and the position I held, and that I was entitled by law to pass over that short distance of a Canadian road without any charge, have free transportation over it, but he insisted that I must have something from those who were over him, from his superior officer to show, that whatever identification I had from those who were with me was of no effect with him, that I must have the authority of the superintendent of the road or some person over him. He would not have recognized a certificate from the Clerk of the House, or the Speaker of the Senate, or any other individual, because they have no direct control over him. He would only have taken such a certificate from those who employed him and paid him. I think this matter was left in a very satisfactory way before. It is not a great deal of trouble to members of parliament or senators to carry round a few passes in their pocket books. They have to carry something there and I believe it is much better not to meddle with this and just leave it as it was last year. If this Bill were withdrawn it would be just as satisfactory to members of parliament, and more satisfactory than it will be if this is changed and we are required to carry this certificate without a pass from the superintendents or managers of the different roads to show we are entitled to free transportation. They would not recognize a certificate from any except those who are their superiors or controlling officers in the road to which they belong.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I beg leave to amend my motion. At present it is not in order as I proposed it, and I simply move that the committee rise.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—That would be hardly fair to the Bill. If the committee rise and report progress it would be better. I desire very much indeed to offer my extreme sympathy, condolence and commiseration to the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton who complains very seriously of fatigue and exhaustion to his system on account of travelling around the country too much. If hon. gentlemen will look at him they will see how seriously he is affected. But while I sympathize with him, I cannot entertain the proposition that it is necessary to change the system under which we have been using passes for some time. In the first place if you pass this legislation what do you do? You compel every member of this House to make provision for getting these certificates. At the present time the company is compelled to look after that matter.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The companies do not do it.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Some do not do it, and I suppose there will be a great many members of this House and members of the other House who would expect to travel upon the roads without a certificate. I do not think it is a hardship on any one to carry a pass, and I am sure it has no more effect upon the majority of the members of this House than it has upon our hon. friend from Cape Breton, and they will not suffer very much physically.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It appears that we are losing sight of the way in which this legislation came to be introduced into the Bill of last session, and the object we have now and the means of doing it. Surely we all understand perfectly well that the object of the legislation last year was to get rid of the idea that an imputation could be made against gentlemen who were engaged in legislation here that they were carrying a bundle of passes in their pockets and so could not exercise a free and independent judgment with reference to a Bill. We know well that that charge has been made repeatedly, and it was largely to get rid of that that this clause was inserted in the Railway Act. So much then for the object of the legislation. Then as to its effect, it needed nothing more than that legislation to entitle any member of this House or of the House of Commons to free transportation without identification of any kind whatever. But as a matter of convenience, perhaps, to the railways more than to anybody else, and to relieve them from the difficulties into which they might get by putting a member of either House off the train because the conductor did not recognize him, it may be a convenient thing that there should be a card of identification. It has been urged here then—and I do not think anybody could quarrel with that—that the pass is nothing more or less than a means of identification of the person named in the pass, and of the order of the railway company in the case of free transportation to such person. The certificate of identification would be nothing more or less than a means of letting the officer of the railway know that this person was entitled to free transportation, and the statute would be complied with. The companies would take good care that the certificate should be honoured. There may be a question as to the suggestion which has been made whether or not this does not limit the right which has been given by the statute already, if you insert these words that it is upon presentation that the right to travel shall exist, and by the phraseology of this amendment the right to travel might be limited, as compared with what it is now. That is very easily dealt with. I was just looking over the words, and by practically transposing the phraseology here that would be left entirely as it is. Let me read the words of the statute down to where I commenced the amendment as it was proposed in this Bill. It reads :

> The company shall furnish transportation upon any of its trains for members of the Senate and the House of Commons, with their baggage.
> Upon presentation of a card.

It is proposed to add 'upon presentation of a card.' By striking out those words we might make it read after the word 'baggage' something like this :

> And the Clerk of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Commons, as the case may be, may issue a card of identification to each senator and member of the House of Commons, showing that he is entitled to such transportation.

It does not make it obligatory to have the card. It does not interfere with the right that the member has, but it puts him in a position in which he can show that he is not there as a trespasser if he is not known by the conductor, as he may not be known, and it puts him in a position in which he can say : 'I am travelling by right of statute.' That is the only thing. If the hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill will permit me to suggest such an amendment, I will move that it be so amended. I think it is important we should do it. Personally, it seems to me that we would be making a mistake—and I say this with great deference to the hon. gentleman from Halifax—to leave this matter to a board of commissioners or anybody else. On looking at the statute, it is very clear to me—although I do not say it is absolutely clear—that they have no power to intervene, that if they do intervene and issue a pass of some kind, it is just a reason why the railway company may object. Again the board of commissioners may issue such a card as no member of the Senate would care to use. It may be so qualified in its terms, it may be couched in such a way and include such conditions, that he would not care to use it. If there is any objection to doing it in the form shown in this Bill, as proposed by the hon. gentleman who introduced it, or amending it in the way I have indicated, then this course could be adopted, that an order of this House could be passed providing for the Clerk of the Senate to issue a certificate, so that the statute and that certificate would answer every purpose, but perhaps it is fairer to put it in the form of that Bill. That is a matter of judgment and opinion.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Before the hon. gentleman moves that amendment, would it not be well, in making the amendment he proposes, that the responsibilities of the railways should cease with regard to the enforcement of this Act by a certificate from the Clerk of either House, as the railway companies themselves do upon the passes which they give to us as complimentary. Each railway places its own conditions on the back.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is what we do not want.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—And the conditions are that the holder of the pass shall not hold the company liable for any accident that may befall him. That precludes the possibility of any member of this House or the other House ever suing for damages which may occur when he is on the railway. Under the certificate issued by the clerk there is no provision of this kind and will the companies accept that? When the certificate is granted by the clerk of either House, will the railway company then be liable for any damages that may happen to a gentleman holding that certificate, being a member of either House of parliament.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I would answer the question by saying, without wishing to be bound, for I have not considered it—that question has never been put to me to necessitate my investigating the law on it, but I would say my impression is that to-day, under the statute, the railway companies are liable, are bound to carry and carry safely, and use every care, and I was going to say that is one reason why the statute should be passed, or some regulation of the kind adopted and acted upon rather than a pass, because it has been suggested before—I do not know that it is the case—that the railway companies are persisting in issuing passes because they wish you to exhibit a pass and so exhibiting it and travelling on it, you are not standing on your rights under the statutes, but on your rights under the pass, which exempts them from liability.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—You say they are not liable?

Hon. Mr. KERR—They are liable as common carriers. I would suggest that the committee rise, and ask leave to sit again. We can phrase it in a way that will pass criticism, and put it in such a form that we do not circumscribe or enlarge the statute.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing the railways were to issue instructions to the conductors not to recognize the certificates, what position would you be in? You have to provide against contingencies of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would be a violation of the statute.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the amendment suggested be adopted, you say, 'such certificate shall entitle you to free passage, &c.' otherwise they might say, 'We will not recognize you.'

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Supposing the matter stands like this: It is enacted and it is in force that members of both Houses are entitled to free transportation. The railway company may properly say, 'we will give you free transportation on application, and in that way you will only be entitled to a free pass from time to time,' and you could not help yourself.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It is quite clear from the remarks made with regard to the clause, that it deserves further consideration, and I will amend my motion and move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman might consider the bearing of this Bill upon the Intercolonial Railway. The Intercolonial Railway is not within the Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—First order of the day to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has no right to cut out third readings by this Bill. One would imagine that this was a matter of life and death; and it is a matter of almost no consequence whatever. The hon. gentleman wishes that this should take precedence of all the other comparatively important business of the House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am always willing to accommodate the hon. gentleman from Halifax as he is always willing to accommodate other members. The committee will sit again on Thursday afternoon and this Bill will be the first order of the day after third readings.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 22, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE PETITION OF DAVID THOMAS OWEN.

The SPEAKER—A question was raised yesterday by the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface as to the right of a foreigner to petition the Senate. The reading of the petition was adjourned till to-day. I should like to know if any hon. gentleman desires to make any remarks on the question before I decide the point of order.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Decision !

The SPEAKER—I have examined the authorities that were referred to by the hon. gentleman yesterday. I find that we are all agreed upon the right of three classes of citizens to petition parliament—British citizens living in Canada, British citizens living outside of Canada, but not having lost their citizenship, and aliens living within the borders of Canada. As to the right of aliens pure and simple to petition parliament, it seems that there is a consensus of opinion that they have no right to petition parliament, although they are allowed to do so under certain circumstances. There is no fixed rule as to the privilege granted by parliament to aliens to petition parliament, and my idea would be to judge each case upon its merits. In the present instance it is a petitioner who had obtained some rights and privileges under the Patent Act. I should be disposed to assimilate the rights of the alien having obtained rights under the Patent Act to the alien or foreigner living in Canada; and holding this opinion, I must say that the point of order is not well taken.

The petition was then read and received.

SOVEREIGN FIRE ASSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (No. 26) An Act to incorporate the Sovereign Fire Assurance Company of Canada, with one amendment. He said: The amendment is simply striking out from the Bill the power of the company to do a marine business. It is restricted to fire alone.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MORTALITY FROM TUBERCULOSIS.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called.

By the Hon. Mr. EDWARDS

That in the opinion of the Senate the time has arrived when parliament should take some active steps to lessen the widespread suffering and the great mortality among the people of Canada, caused by the various forms of tuberculosis.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I move that this Order of the Day be discharged and that it be the first Order of the Day for to-morrow. The hon. Mr. Béique has consented to allow this motion to take precedence of his.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think he should have the consent of the whole House, as well as the consent of the hon. gentleman.

The SPEAKER—He has asked the permission of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He cannot make the motion simply on the consent of the hon. gentleman.

The SPEAKER—He mentions that he has the consent of the hon. gentleman.

The motion was allowed to stand.

SHIPMENT OF GRAIN TO THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

How many cars of hay were shipped free of charge to persons in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in 1904, during the months of October, November, December, January and February, of 1905, respectively. Also, was there any grain, bran or flour shipped to Nova Scotia, the above named months, free of charge, and what would have been the amount chargeable for freight on the above, provided freight had been charged ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The information by months cannot be given for some time, but it is being prepared. However, the total number of cars of hay carried free up to the 27th of February, 1905, was 1,713 cars and the freight charges on same would amount to about $80,836 ; these cars were for stations in Nova Scotia. There was no hay carried free consigned to New Brunswick, neither has there been any grain, bran or flour carried free during the time mentioned.

THIRD READING.

Bill (40) An Act respecting the Niagara-Welland Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

PRYOR DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved the third reading of Bill (B) An Act for the relief of James Arthur Pryor. He said : I observed by the newspapers that hon. gentlemen took exception to this Bill, because they did not think this case was sufficiently proved. I do not concur in that. I think it has been sufficiently proved, but I do not wonder hon. gentlemen took exception, because it has been the custom in this Senate in divorce cases for the petitioner, if the respondent is a woman, to prove the case in the blackest possible manner, and to show the woman to be the lewdest and worst character that could be. This is an exception to that rule. The gentleman who has asked for a divorce has been content to simply prove enough to secure him the divorce. We have proved by reliable evidence, by gentlemen whom I know very well myself—because the parties live in the country near where I live—that the respondent has been guilty of adultery. He has proved by a gentleman who was called that the woman is married again and living with a new husband, which is sufficient proof of adultery to grant a divorce in Canada. I happen to know Pryor. I have known him for twenty-two years. There is no more credible, respectable or worthy man in Canada than Pryor. This woman left him. There might be some excuse for a woman leaving her husband, but she left four children, the oldest fifteen years of age. Pryor took charge of two of the children, kept them in his own home north of Wolseley and cared for them. The younger he took to his mother in Walkerville, Ontario, and she has provided for them from that time until now. Mr. Pryor, on account of those children, did not wish to blacken the character of their mother, as he might have done, because I have heard the most discreditable and outrageous stories concerning this woman that possibly could be told, and you have evidence of the fact that she was a bad woman and that she neglected her children. I can understand her leaving her husband, but when she neglects four small children and goes away and lives with another man, it shows that she is inhuman. In order to save his children, Mr. Pryor refrained from proving more than was absolutely necessary that their mother was a disreputable woman. He proved his case in the mildest manner possible. It is sufficient to prove that the woman has been living with another man in adultery, and I am sure when hon. gentlemen realize the condition of this case, no one will be found to oppose it. Apart from that, what do we find ? We find a committee in which there were four professional men, and one other gentleman who is equally competent and intelligent enough to judge, have given their decision after hearing the evidence, and recommended that the divorce be granted. Upon those grounds alone I think the Senate should pass the Bill. I therefore, without saying more—because I have heard many things which it is not necessary to repeat—ask that the Bill be read the third time.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Before the motion is put, I should like to make a few remarks. I was not present in the House on Friday last, when, as I understand, a motion for the six months' hoist of this Bill was moved by the hon. gentleman from Rothesay. But I have read the remarks that he made on that occasion. This is a sort of motion that we are constantly up against, not necessarily annually—it is not quite so bad as that, but very frequently, almost always after there has been an influx of new members. There is sure to be amongst them some who are conscientiously opposed to the principle of divorce, and the objections to the Bill generally take that line. Now, I have before me the remarks made by the hon. gentleman on Friday last. I will read them to the House. He said :

> I object to the passage of this Bill on principle. I object to divorce cases being brought here at all. I object on principle, and I object to this measure in particular, because I hold in my hand the evidence, and I can find nothing in law or scripture to warrant a divorce on such grounds. I am told it is not the custom to debate before the House any evidence taken in the committee. I think it would be a very sad thing for the country at large if divorces are to be granted on such trivial matters as are contained in this document and without any proofs of facts at all.

Now this is a very severe criticism, and while I have the greatest respect for the hon. gentleman's religious convictions, and also for his knowledge of this subject——

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have no knowledge of the subject at all—if the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him—I am not up in divorce matters.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Then if the hon. gentleman had no knowledge of the subject, why did he make such a statement? Why does he say that the matters contained in this document are no proof at all ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Not to my mind.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER. Aye, but he does not say that. I canont allow that remark to go on the records here unchallenged. I have heard what my hon. friend on my left has said with regard to the evidence in the case, which goes to show that in 1896 this woman left her husband and, after having resided away from him without any apparent reason for a period of four years, she, representing herself to be a widow, was married to a man named Hooper with whom she has since resided at a place called Grenfel. They are known in the community as Mr. and Mrs. Hooper.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What is the matter with the law there with regard to bigamy ?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am not discussing that matter at all. I am speaking now with reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Rothesay. The parties who called on this woman with reference to the divorce proceedings were shown her marriage certificate, and she has resided with Hooper and has been known as Mrs. Hooper in that community for five years. Unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to say that these people are more than mortal, I do not know what higher or better proof of the only ground on which we can grant a divorce, that is infidelity to the husband and adultery, can be given. My hon. friend further says, in his reported remarks, that he has been told that it is not the custom to debate in the House evidence taken in the committee. This is to a certain extent true, for although there is no rule or law in the House which prevents debates being held upon these reports, or upon evidence taken before the committee, it is not, as he says, customary to do so, though it is not infrequently done. One reason is that the House recognizes as a fact that the committee charged with the duty of hearing the evidence and seeing the witnesses and having them examined before them, have a much better chance and opportunity of knowing what is the value of the evidence than those who only read it in cold print in the House after it has been distributed amongst the members. On that ground and, further, on the ground that the evidence which we are generally obliged to hear is a mass of nauseating and disgusting particulars, the House is as a rule, very glad indeed to be spared the infliction of hearing debates on the reports of the evidence. I have always contended that in this regard the Divorce Committee occupies a different—not necessarily superior—position to that of other standing committees of this House. It is a special committee authorized to administer oaths and to take evidence, and as such they are constituted a sort of court or tribunal, and in that respect are different from the other committees of the House. We all know that members of the other committees, both in the Senate and the House of Commons, are constantly subject to be pestered and canvassed by parties who are interested in the Bills coming up before them, lobbyists, individuals and corporations who are interested in these Bills. Nothing of the kind ever occurs before this committee. I have never heard an instance of any one attempting in any way to canvass or influence any member of the committee with reference to the passage of the Bills before them, and I am sure nobody has ever thought of doing that any more than of trying to canvass or influence a judge who was to try a case in one of the courts of our land. No member of our committee has any personal interest whatever in any of the Bills that come before us, nor has any further desire than to see that the law of the land, whether it be right or wrong—in the opinion of some gentlemen it is not right—is carried out. Whether right or wrong, it is given to us to administer, and our anxiety is to see that that law is dispensed in such manner that all the parties who come before us shall have an opportunity of getting justice. I have also always thought myself that standing in the peculiar position that that committee does, to reject one of its reports after it has taken the trouble to go exhaustively into the evidence is a reflection on either their good faith or their judgment; and, more, that when, in addition to the motion to give it the six months hoist, the motion was accompanied with such language as was used on that occasion, I would be derelict in my duty to my colleagues on that committee if I did not emphasize our position with reference to that matter. It is a very curious thing that the objections which are taken to these Bills, and which have been taken since I have been in this House very rarely indeed, have been—I may say never—from legal gentlemen, or those who have had experience in sifting evidence. They have come from laymen who probably have never had any experience in legal matters except, perhaps, like some of us, in getting judgments against them, but as far as the legal gentlemen in the House are concerned we have never had, outside of the committee, anybody to find fault with our findings. The members of our committee have been chosen presumably on account of the peculiar fitness they are supposed to have to deal with matters of this kind. Five members of the committee belong to the legal profession, and every one of them, with the exception of probably myself, occupies the very highest position at the bar in the community to which he belongs. Our leader, the gentleman who has occupied the position for many years, and probably will continue to occupy it as long as his colleagues have an opportunity to elect him, Senator Gowan, has had experience of two generations in the courts and on the bench in this country, and we all are anxious to see him come down here when he is able to come, and to welcome him with the affection and respect we all feel toward him. The other members of the committee, who do not belong to the legal profession, are all distinguished in other branches of business in this country, and it is more than a reflection on the committee, when their findings are not respected by the House. I will say further that most of the members of this committee have acted upon the committee for more than a decade, and their experience is very valuable. The House never, as far as I know, has changed the personnel of the committee, unless obliged to do so by the resignation or death of some of its members, and the members who remain on the committee, by their experience, are of very great value to the House. I will say too that with the experience we have gained, it is very gratifying to me to be able to state that it very rarely happens that our verdict is not unanimous. I have known but very few instances of all that have come before us where any member of the committee has dissented from the verdict of the majority. With regard to the hon. gentleman who has made this very serious charge against your committee——

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I made no charge against the committee.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The hon. gentleman has made a very serious statement. He thinks it is no charge against the committee when he says there was no evidence to warrant the recommendation contained in the report. I must congratulate the hon. gentleman on being possessed of a very beautiful white soul.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Boots?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—No, the soul of his body. To those of us who have grown up to man's estate and have necessarily, not because they looked for it, but in some way or other got mixed up with the seamy side of human nature, it is really lovely to see that a gentleman who has attained the age of the hon. member from Rothesay is able to look at this case in such an innocent way and see no evidence of adultery in the life of these people who have been living for the past five years together and known as man and wife. He must have an idea that they are leading an idyllic sort of life in which there has been nothing but platonic attachment existing between them in all these years. The hon. gentleman's indictment has been in very scathing terms, unfortunately it was very terse. It reminded me of the moral in the Irish song 'Widow McChree'—'one comfort, 'twas not very long, but sthrong.' If the hon. gentleman has not succeeded in convincing any of you of the enormity of the offence which we have committed, it is no fault of his. We might apply to him the epitaph which was found in an Arizona graveyard, on the tombstone of a noted gambler. 'He done his damdest. Angels could do no more.'

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I really think the strictures of my hon. friend are uncalled for. I am the last man in this House who would cast a slur on that committee, I read the evidence in the case and perhaps erred in believing that I had any right to criticise the evidence or even to vote on the Bill. Therefore it might be well perhaps for us to pass some resolution allowing the committee to grant those divorces without even consulting the House. I thought I was strictly within my right when I said, without the explanation we have had to-day from the promoter of the Bill, that I could not, in my humble judgment, see any good reason for granting the divorce. I do not think my hon. friend should have charged me with attacking the Divorce Committee. I have not read the report of my speech in the Debates; I presume that what I said was correctly taken down. I said before, and I say again, that on religious conviction—although perhaps I have no more religious convictions than my hon. friend who has just spoken—I am opposed to granting a divorce on anything but the clearest evidence of adultery. In the church which claims me as one of its followers, they decline to endorse these divorce cases, I might say almost in toto; so much so that the leaders of our church have laid down the doctrine that they will not solemnize a marriage with a divorced person notwithstanding what parliament may say. They believe there is a moral law which is above parliament, that there is sacred writ which says that divorce for any cause but the one should not be countenanced in this country or anywhere that Christians live. I congratulate my hon. friend on the way he has pleaded for this gentleman. I have no doubt he is a very worthy man. He probably has had great cause of offence, but in my humble judgment I do not see in the evidence placed in my hands sufficient grounds for granting a divorce. If I am in error I apologize to the committee for having in any way trenched on their responsibility or work. I thought their duty was to take the evidence and report it to the House, asking the House to decide what should be done in the case. If I am wrong, then I regret exceedingly that I should have said anything at all on the subject. No great harm has been done. There is no use bringing such a malediction on my humble head, because after all it has only caused a postponement until to-day. My hon. friend has had a chance to come from the west and make an explanation to this House which perhaps this House may accept as sufficient ground for granting the divorce. I have my own ideas and views, and notwithstanding the castigation my hon. friend has endeavoured to inflict on me, I still humbly say I believe all divorces should be very carefully guarded and only granted in the most extreme cases. In my opinion there is not sufficient ground in the evidence reported in this case to warrant the Senate in granting the divorce.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Do I understand that there is a motion in the hands of the Speaker for the six months hoist?

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman from Brandon says that the committee, of which he is a member, is something more than a standing committee, that it is a special committee in its character, and that what goes on before that committee must be accepted by this House. He says the committee is composed of gentlemen of legal standing who are able to judge the weight of the evidence given before them, and therefore what they decide must be accepted by this House. If we go back to the past we will find that the decisions of the committee have not always been respected, and, layman as I am, I remember one case in which the finding of that specially valuable committee was reversed by the House. I refer to the Odell case. The evidence had been taken, the report made and the Bill presented; and this House, after considering the evidence in the case, came to the conclusion that the Bill should not be passed. A division was taken and the Bill was rejected. If my recollection is correct, the members of that committee tendered their resignation. They met and brought in a report resigning as a body. The resignation was not accepted, happily for the House and for the country, and the hon. gentlemen are still sitting as a committee in their judicial and legal capacity. But the hon. gentleman will allow us to look into the evidence. No Bill of divorce can be passesd until the evidence is brought before the House, and why is the evidence reported? Is it not that every member may ascertain for himself, by reading it, whether there is proof of the allegations in the petition, and whether that proof would warrant the House in granting a divorce? If we look into the evidence in this case, we will be amazed at the facts that are brought forward. We are in the face of a case, not of adultery, but of lunacy. If this woman is not responsible for her acts, I do not see how you can call it a case of adultery. Mr. Pryor, the petitioner, said his relations were not very pleasant. His examination reads as follows:

Q. Why were they not pleasant?—A. She seemed to be worrying about something, I do not know exactly what, always seemed to be in trouble. I sometimes asked her if it was me that she was troubling about, and she said no.

Q. You say that she appeared to have some trouble in her own mind?—A. Yes.

Q. Was the trouble in connection with your treatment of her, or anything of that kind?—A. No.

Q. Did she ever complain of your treatment in any way?—A. No, Sir.

Q. Where were you during the whole of your married life?—A. In the Assiniboia district.

Q. In the neighbourhood of Chickney and Kenlis?—A. Yes.

Q. Those two places are quite near one another?—A. Yes.

Q. Were her parents living near you?—A. About eight miles from where I was.

Q. Did she remain steadily with you?—A. Yes, she had left me two or three times.

Q. Did she come back?—A. Sometimes she would come back, and once or twice I went after her.

Further on he is asked:

Q. Did she say why?—A. Not in particular.

Q. But did she say why?—A. No.

Q. Did she say anything further than that she would go?—A. No.

Q. Did she give any reason at all, make any suggestion to you?—A. No.

Q. Say anything at all about why she was going?—A. No.

By the Chairman :

Q. Did you ask her why ?—A. I asked her and she said I was too good for her and that she was going away and she would never come back.

Q. What was your reply to that ? Did you discuss it with her or remonstrate ?—A. Yes, I did, but I could not get any satisfaction out of her.

By the Hon. Mr. Wilson :

Q. After she went away, the previous time, on returning would she give you any reason or explain to you why she left ?—A. Not in particular.

Q. Was there anything said at all ?—A. No, she would never tell me exactly.

Q. Did she give any reason whatever why she left you ?—A. No, Sir.

Q. She would hardly leave and remain away for weeks and come back without explaining why she left and why she came back ? (No answer.)

By Mr. Thompson, counsel for the petitioner:

Q. Explain how she acted before any of these troubles came, anything particular you noticed in her actions and what she said ?—A. Sometimes in her actions just before she would go away she would lie down, probably in the bed. I have known her to lie down eleven days at a time. I have taken her meals to her and her eyes seemed to be closed and she would not give any reason for it. I asked her if it was my acts that made her do this and she said no, that she had nothing against me in any shape or form. Then she would get up and walk the floor and ring her hands and cry.

We are evidently in the presence of a nymphomaniac or lunatic. Nothing could disturb her except she would fall in those spells. The examination continues :

Q. Did you ever see Mrs. Pryor since she left you and if so, where and when ?—A. I could not swear exactly to it. I thought I saw her, but she was too far away to say.

Q. You saw a person you think was her ?—A. Yes.

Q. Where ?—A. In Grenfel a year ago last summer.

Q. At what house ?—A. At the house. I was told afterwards where they lived.

Q. Where she and Hooper lived together ?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you had any family by the marriage of Mrs. Pryor ?—A. Four children.

Q. One died ?—A. Yes.

Q. Four living ?—A. Yes.

Q. There were five children by that marriage? —A. Yes.

And this idea impressed the mind of one of these legal gentlemen so much that he asked the following questions :

Q. What age was your wife at the time of the marriage ?—A. She was about sixteen I guess.

Q. During those spells of feeding and staying in bed ten or twelve days did you call in any medical gentleman ?—A. No.

Q. No doctor ?—A. No.

Q. Was your wife ever in the lunatic asylum ? —A. No, she never was in the lunatic asylum.

But there is a beginning of lunacy as well as a beginning of all other disease, and there is no doubt this woman is a lunatic. There is the testimony of her husband, and that is the whole evidence given by the husband—nothing more.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—What does the hon. gentleman say is the only evidence ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no other evidence than that which I have read.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (Windsor)—What about marrying another man ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am coming to that. But that is the only evidence of the party who lived with her during those six or seven years. Another man is called in as a witness, Arthur Reeves, and he is examined as follows :

Q. Would you swear the certificate was in that condition when you handed it to Mrs. Pryor ?—A. I could not tell the nature of it. I signed something, but I could not exactly tell the nature of it.

Q. You are still acquainted with both parties? —A. Yes.

Q. Do you know where the respondent, Mrs. Pryor, is living ?—A. I do.

Q. Where ?—A. At Grenfel.

Q. In the town ?—A. In the town.

Q. Did you see her at any time this winter ? —A. Yes.

Q. Where ?—A. In her own house.

Q. Where she is living at Grenfel ?—A. Yes.

Q. By what name does she go now ?—A Mrs. Hooper.

Q. Did she show you any documents ?—A. She did.

Q. What was that ?—A. She said it was a certificate of her second marriage.

Q. To whom ?—A. To Mr. Hooper.

Q. Was Mr. Hooper with her at the time ?—A. No, not then.

Q. Can you tell shortly, give us an idea of what was in that document, if you have any memory of it at the time ?—A. Well, I did take notice of the document, and the marriage took place at Boissevain, Manitoba, on July 12, 1900. Madill was the Methodist minister that married them ; she was married to Herman Claud Hooper.

Q. Did she say anything to you as to her relations with Mr. Hooper ; how they were living ?—A. She said he would not leave her.

Q. That he had said he would not leave her on her own statement. Did she say anything as to living with Mr. Hooper, or how she was living with him ?—A. No.

By the Hon. Mr. Wilson :

Q. She did not say whether they were living as man and wife ?—A. She said that nothing would part them ; I supposed they were man and wife.

And further on—here is the greatest proof of the adultery, and see how it is coming out :

We came in in a sort of back kitchen or woodshed to the west end, the furthest from the street, and we went from that into the living room. There was kitchen, dining room and everything combined. This is where we were during the conversation. The house is very small one story house, and at the end there was the bed-room, and the door wide open when I came in, and I could see clearly in. It was a small bedroom with one double bed and no other bed.

That is one of the proofs of adultery. Then, further on, the Attorney himself gave the following testimony :

I have known the applicant and respondent for a considerable length of time. I knew them before their marriage and have been acquainted with them since. I know they were reputed to be married about the date mentioned, and I have seen them together since that time. Now, on or about the 27th December last I went to Grenfel to serve a copy of the notice of this application on the respondent. Mr. Richardson, a lawyer of Grenfel, went with me. He was on very friendly terms with the family, and I wanted to find out what I could, and I took him along with me. When I served the notice on her she mentioned that that was the same as she had read in the papers.

By the Chairman :

Q. Where was she at the time ?—A. In the house in Grenfel.

By the Hon. Mr. McMullen :

Q. Better mention her name ?—A. The respondent. In the house she said it was Hooper's house—Hooper with whom she was living at the time, and she spoke about the house. They had quite a number of things to see about their house, and showed us the plants they had got and how they kept them and how they lived in the house. We were looking at the plants ; they had a fine assortment of plants, but they mentioned that they could not leave together, she and her husband—speaking of Hooper as her husband—that one had to be there ; that they could not go away together ; that either she or her husband had to remain in the house all the time.

By the Hon. Mr. Kerr :

Q. To look after the plants ?—A. Yes, to look after the flowers, they had rather nice flowers, and we were surprised to see them. I asked her if she was willing to show me the certificate of the second marriage with Hooper. She seemed a little doubtful at the time, and I do not remember whether we made any suggestions as to a charge of bigamy. I think there was something mentioned as to a charge of bigamy. I said that I did not wish to use it, I would pledge myself that I would not use my knowledge for that purpose, that I wished to see it for the purpose of the present application and no other, and Richardson, who was very friendly, assured her that she might depend on my word in that particular. She then showed Richardson and myself the marriage certificate. She held it in her hands all the time, but allowed me to see it. My recollection of the name of the bridegroom mentioned in that certificate was the same as the witness Reeve has said, Herman Claud Hooper. I would not be positive. I think it is different from the name given on the certificate from the official in Winnipeg. She said ' That certificate is all right with one exception, they put my name down wrong, it was the fault of the clerk. They put ' May ' instead of ' Mildred.' I saw that name. She said it was a mistake of the clerk, but I said ' Here is the name " Lillian " in connection with it.' The name was given ' Lillian May Pryor ' for the respondent. I called her attention to that, the name ' Lillian ' being put on, and she said ' I added that myself after I left Pryor.' I said ' However, this is your name, this is intended for you ? ' She said ' Yes, that is for me, that is my name, that is intended to represent me,' and Mr. Hooper was sitting right by us. I said ' This is intended for Mr. Hooper here.' I showed her the name, Herman Claud Hooper ? She said ' Yes, that is the name of my present husband.'

That is the proof and the only proof of the adultery, and of the second marriage. He saw the certificate in the hands of the woman. The woman said she had that certificate and that the clerk first had given her wrong name and that she had added another name to that certificate and that is the proof of the second marriage.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—What about the proof of the certificate ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no proof there of adultery. There is proof of mania, lunacy. That woman is crazy, she is a lunatic and should be in an asylum, and is it because a man happens to have a wife who becomes a lunatic that he has a right to come to us for a divorce ? If a man whose wife becomes a lunatic has that right, then the decision reached by the committee may be right, but if a man in the ordinary course of life whose wife becomes a lunatic, has no right to obtain a divorce in a court, I do not see why a divorce should be granted under these circumstances ; here, I do not see why we should grant a divorce to a man who has the misfortune of having a wife who becomes a lunatic and is not responsible for her acts. It is rather the duty of the Senate to reject this divorce Bill, and I therefore move the six months hoist.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is a feature in this Divorce Bill that I think this honourable House should not be called upon to sanction or endorse. The feature of the Bill to which objection ought to be taken by all men who wish to see our laws respected and enforced consists in the fact that the committee come before this honourable House and state to-day that the petitioner for the divorce in this case was cognizant of the fact that his wife was married to a man named Hooper and condoned that marriage, let her live with him for five years without invoking the aid of the law to have that woman condemned for bigamy. The committee boldly come before this House and say that although the petitioner knew that his wife was living with another man in a neighbouring town, under a figment of marriage which was null and void, the committee say that that is sufficient ground on which to grant the petitioner a divorce. I say in making that statement or coming to that conclusion they sanction the violation of the law of Canada. They should have told the petitioner: 'If you want a divorce prove that your wife is a bigamist.' Send him back to his district and let him have that woman brought before the courts of the country and condemned, as she ought to be condemned, if she is not a lunatic as the hon. gentleman has stated. I am not prepared to go into the details of the evidence, but that bald fact stands out, that this woman was living in open violation of the law, presumably under the sanction of the law condoned by her husband, who comes before parliament asking for a divorce. I say this honourable House should not be called upon to sanction such action on the part of any citizen no matter where he may live, no matter what religion he may profess. The law requires that social ties in this country must be respected to the utmost, and I am in hearty accord with the senators who say that a divorce can only be granted for the most serious and the most grave offence.

I go further and say that in granting a divorce—I do not know whether the constitution would permit it—I would try to have the case tested in court. Where one party is guilty and the other is not, I would ask that the benefit of the divorce be simply given to the one who is not guilty, and the one who is guilty should not be entitled to re-marry, because otherwise in future years we will get into the same condition of things as exists in the United States, and as is beginning to exist in France and other countries where the moral law is cast aside for a little human sympathy and sentiment. I should like if the question could be tested, that in granting a divorce it is only granted to the party who suffers and not to the party who is guilty of a crime against society or against the law of the country, as in this case. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in granting a divorce under these circumstances, they are practically condoning a violation of our law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As a member of that committee, I cannot permit a reflection of the character which has just been uttered by the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) to be made with reference not only to the ability of that committee to judge upon the merits or demerits of such cases as may come before them, but what I might term the criminality which he has sought to attach to the committee. It is the first time that it has even been suggested in this House that the Select Committee on Divorce should set in motion the criminal law for which the Dominion government itself is responsible. There is a Crown prosecutor in each district of the Northwest Territories and where a case comes under his observation I apprehend it is his duty to set in motion the criminal law. But to say for one moment that such a responsibility as this attaches to the members of that committee is certainly unique, and something that has never been suggested before. I venture to say that no member of that committee for one moment would serve upon the committee if this chamber attached any such duty as that to the position. I am not surprised that a movement has been on foot for many years for the establishment of a court of divorce in Canada. It seems to me that justice cannot be done in the premises under the machinery which we have at this time. I can very well appreciate the convictions of many hon. gentlemen upon this question of divorce, but we must take into consideration that the constitution vests in the federal authority the subject of divorce, and it is our duty to deal with this particular question. If hon. gentlemen, either members of this chamber or members of the House of Commons, feel that they cannot conscientiously approach this subject, I apprehend that their duty is plain, to in no way take part in the proceedings. An oath of office is taken by hon. members who enter this chamber as well as those who enter the House of Commons to carry out the constitution as we find it embodied in the British North America Act, and if hon. gentlemen feel that they are not sufficiently free to undertake to carry out that constitution in its entirety, they should at least remain quiescent where a question of conviction or a question of conscientious scruple may intervene. Now, in sifting this evidence one is rather, I won't say surprised, almost amused when we take into consideration the contradictory views which are taken of the evidence in question. My hon. friend from Rothesay cannot see any evidence in the record why the report should have been made and why divorce should be granted. My hon. friend from Stadacona says quite clearly that adultery has been committed, but committed by a lunatic, while my hon. friend from Montreal West takes the extraordinary ground that not only was adultery committed, but that the woman was responsible, and that the criminal law should be set in motion by the committee. Consequently we have three absolutely diverse and contradictory opinions held by those three hon. gentlemen. Each member of this House is entitled to his opinion, but it must not be overlooked that those who venture to give an opinion upon a subject of this kind should look closely, not only at the constitution which governs us in matters of this description, but also should scrutinize somewhat closely the rules of this House dealing with such a subject as the one before us. The rules of the House are quite clear upon the subject that where the offence is established no alternative remains but for the committee to report that a Bill of divorce should be granted. The rules of the House of Lords and the rules of evidence which obtain in the courts in England are in full force, introduced by our own rules into the proceedings of this body, and where the evidence comes within the scope of either the rules of the House of Lords or of the law of evidence of England, as I say no alternative exists but for that committee to recommend that the divorce be granted. Though a member of that committee, I was not present when the report was made, or when the case was heard, yet from a perusal of the evidence I have no hesitation in saying that the committee could not have hesitated for one moment in reporting as it has done. If hon. gentlemen will look at page nine of the evidence they will there observe a certificate of marriage taken from the public documents of the province, the Department of Agriculture and Immigration of Manitoba, wherein all the particulars of her second marriage are to be found. Here is a marriage certificate, certified to by the Inspector of Vital Statistics in the province of Manitoba, as to the second marriage having been contracted, and in addition to that we have her own statement as to her identification with the party, as being the party referred to in exhibit No. 2 at page 9 of the evidence.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman state his opinion in regard to the fact that the committee legalizes that second marriage which is not legal now by granting a Bill of divorce ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not at all. We are not called upon to do that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—But you are doing that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend chooses to go through such a labyrinth of legal intricacy as he seems to have entered upon in trying to analyse this case and determine what he should do, I am not surprised at his being somewhat confused, but I might say that the Select Committee on Divorce is not called upon to determine anything more than the fact that the woman has committed adultery and, that being established, the duty of the committee and the duty of this House is perfectly clear. That duty has been carried out by the committee and embodied in the report.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—You are responsible not only for your act but for the result of that act.

The amendment was declared lost.

The motion was agreed to on a division, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

SPREAD OF TUBERCULOSIS IN CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS moved:

That in the opinion of the Senate the time has arrived when parliament should take some active steps to lessen the widespread suffering and the great mortality among the people of Canada, caused by the various forms of tuberculosis.

He said: This motion is one of perhaps more importance to Canada than any other that might be brought up in this House. I am sorry, indeed, that the duty of making the motion does not fall on more capable shoulders than mine. It would be more appropriate that it should be moved by some one of the members of the medical profession who grace seats in this House. But my apology for making the motion is that I happen for the time being to be the president of the Canadian Association for the Prevention of Tuberculosis. However, I earnestly hope that not only the hon. gentlemen of the medical profession, but many other hon. senators will express their views upon the subject more fully than I am capable of doing. Now, this is a question of importance not alone to Canada, but a question of importance to the whole world. In later years perhaps more interest has been aroused upon this subject than was formerly the case. In years gone by it was supposed that the disease of tuberculosis, or consumption, was hereditary and those who unfortunately suffered from it not being able to receive any great relief from medical treatment, in instances where people were of sufficient means were generally ordered to go to some sunny clime, there sooner or later to die from the effects of the disease. And those who were not able to do so, had their death come to them at a more rapid rate, living perhaps in the unfortunate condition in which many of them were compelled to live. But, hon. gentlemen, thanks to the scientific research of the great medical profession for several years back, it has become thoroughly understood that the disease is not hereditary, but one which is preventable and in very many instances curable. Dr. Koch, of Berlin, by his researches, has contributed very much to the information which the world possesses in this respect. He and many other scientific men the world over have done very much in so far as this great subject is concerned, and as a consequence the attention of people everywhere is more aroused to-day to the importance of this subject than was the case in former years.

To show the extent of the ravages of this terrible disease, I may say that the death rate in the entire world annually reaches the enormous number of 5,000,000 souls. In Great Britain and Ireland no less than 70,000 die annually from tuberculosis. In the United States of America it is said by some authorities that no less than 200,000 die annually from the disease, but it is perfectly safe and within the mark to place the mortality at 150,000. Coming to our own country, in which we are more directly interested, the number suffering annually from this disease is 40,000 and the deaths are variously estimated from seven to eight thousand. In the year 1891 the total number of deaths in Canada from the disease was 9,708. Estimating the value of each human life at $1,000, and taking 8,000 as the number of deaths annually in Canada from tuberculosis, the direct loss, to say nothing of contingent losses, to Canada from this cause reaches the enormous sum of $8,000,000. The total number of deaths from all causes in Canada amounts to 77,495, and one-tenth of the entire death rate is from tuberculosis. It may appear strange, yet it is nevertheless the fact, that from tuberculosis alone we have more deaths annually than from typhoid fever, scarlet fever, measles, diphtheria, croup and whooping-cough combined. Small-pox is regarded as a great scourge. It is a disease which visits us periodically and great efforts are made by the provincial and other authorities to suppress the disease when an outbreak occurs, but the annual death rate from small-pox in Canada is very small, not more than one or two hundred on an average. But tuberculosis is constantly with us. We have vaccination as a preventive of small-pox, and to-day the medical profession are engaged in seeking some similar means of preventing the spread of tuberculosis. We all sincerely hope that it will be successful. It will be another important step in advance for that great profession. I have said that tuberculosis is not hereditary but is communicable from man to man and a preventable and curable disease. To illustrate how preventive measures may check its ravages, I will give you comparisons as between two of the very greatest cities in the world. About fifty years ago London began the system of construction of sanitaria for the cure of those suffering from the disease. Paris, unfortunately, did not follow in the footsteps of London. During the course of the fifty years the death rate in London from tuberculosis decreased fifty per cent, while the death rate in the city of Paris has increased. As further evidence I may state that from the year 1851 to 1896 the death rate in England and Wales has been reduced from 28 to every 10,000 to 13 in every 10,000, and on the same basis, looking ahead to 1940, the disease will be wiped out in Great Britain. But this is not all; in Great Britain the disease has become less severe in its effect and more curable because of the changed conditions in that country.

I think I have said enough to show the importance to Canada of dealing, and dealing in the most thorough manner, with this dread disease. I shall not trouble you with remarks on the conditions in other parts of the world, but will refer briefly to some of the conditions in the United States. In that great republic all that might be done has not been done—in fact very little of what might be done has been attempted, but in the cities that have been foremost in dealing with this question, the death rate from tuberculosis has fallen and fallen far more rapidly than in cities that have not adopted preventive measures.

New York has been the foremost city in the United States of America in dealing with tuberculosis, and the death rate to-day in that city is smaller than in any of the cities of the great American union. Now, the question arises: what can be done to check the spread of the disease? The gentleman in the United States who stands foremost as to what may be done is Dr. Trudeau, of Saranac Lake, who, I understand, is a French Canadian by birth. He himself, suffering from this disease in the year 1874, was induced to spend the winter in the Adirondack Mountains. He had a great deal to endure in staying there for the winter, but the beneficial results caused him to think of what might be done to help others, and as a consequence of his efforts, in the year 1884 he in his small way put up the first sanitarium that was built in the United States, a small cottage which would accommodate only two patients. He had very great difficulty indeed in securing the two patients to enter his small sanitarium and go through the course which he approved of as being the best treatment for the disease. It was what is called the open air, or out of door treatment. That institution, unaided in any other way than through friends who had observed his efforts, has attained the position to-day of owning an establishment worth $355,000. There is a central building with many small cottages surrounding it, and enormous good has been done the people of the United States as a result of his efforts. The example which he has shown is extending to every state in the union, and while there are not many state sanitaria in the United States, yet there are many as a result of the efforts and the liberality of the people who are philanthropically inclined and who are aiding in this respect. I will not enumerate the various states of the union in which either as state institutions or as private institutions, these sanitaria exist, but they are to be found in many of the states. Massachusetts was the first to establish a state sanitarium. It was erected, I think about 1898. New York erected a state sanitarium last year, 1904. In Canada a little has been done in these respects. There are two establishments in Gravenhurst. I do not know exactly the terms on which patients are taken there, but one of them is to some extent a free institution, and in one of them a charge is made for entering. There is an institution for incurables at Weston, Ont. There is also an institution at Ste. Agathe in Quebec, and one at Kentville, N.S., which is a provincial institution. Nova Scotia has led in so far as this is concerned, establishing the first provincial sanitarium in Canada. It is a small one, not at all adequate to the necessities of that province. There is also a small private one at Wolfville, N.S., and a small private one at Calgary in the Northwest Territories. But if there is one question on which the people of Canada should be aroused it is the matter of dealing with this dread disease. To-day the people of Canada are unfortunately excited over a matter not one-hundredth part, not one-thousandth part of the interest to the people of Canada that this great and important question is. I would be glad if I could arouse the people of Canada on this subject, which is so highly important to them in the same way that they are aroused over a question which, as I said before, is of very small importance as compared with this vital matter, and I should like to keep them roused. Now the question is, what is to be done in Canada in this highly important matter ? In Canada and the United States, in so far as aid to hospitals is concerned, we have many general hospitals and we have many philanthropists aiding in their construction and maintenance. In so far as libraries are concerned, we have the philanthropy, of which I personally do not approve, of Mr. Carnegie. In so far as our educational institutions are concerned, above all in Canada, we have the examples shown us by Lord Strathcona, Lord Mount Stephen, and last, but not least, the great efforts which are now being put forward by Sir William Macdonald, who has already done so much for Canada in this respect. On this important matter, which is so vital to Canada, are we to wait until some such gentleman as these comes to the rescue and provides the means for checking the spread of tuberculosis ? No, hon. gentlemen, I think we cannot afford to do so. The question is one for the Canadian people through the government, and it is a question which should not be delayed any longer. I am one of those who believe that in this country, or in any other country, those who are unable to support themselves from infirmity or otherwise, should be supported by the entire community. In so far as this question of tuberculosis is concerned, the wealthy of the community can always take care of themselves. But we have a large class of poor people and it is among them the greatest suffering exists. They cannot to-day, and never will be able to take care of themselves. I hold, and hold strongly, that the care of these poor people should be a direct charge upon the entire community. The charge it is held, however, should be a charge on the provincial institutions and on municipal institutions. I hold the view, and hold it strongly, that this question should not be an individual, a municipal, or a provincial question alone, but should be a national question. As I said before, if we wait till private enterprise will deal with this question or private philanthropy will deal with it, we will wait until many and very many of the flower of Canada will die with the dread disease, where lives might be saved. The various provinces cannot afford the means to check the scourge. Then, hon. gentlemen, there is but one source and that is to appeal to the government of Canada. There are hon. gentlemen who say 'oh, yes, it is a matter of public health and, like education, should be dealt with alone by the provinces.' If I understand the question aright in so far as the British North America Act is concerned, there is divided jurisdiction in the matter of the public health. It is not necessarily a question entirely with the provinces, nor entirely for the Dominion. With our animals, when any serious disease breaks out the Dominion authorities at once take action. How much more necessary, how much more proper would it be that the Dominion authorities should attend to the public health of Canada. In the importation of animals into the country, care is taken to guard against the introduction of tuberculosis, but in the importation of human beings there is no restriction. If there is a country in the world which has a climate favourable to the cure of tuberculosis, it is the climate of Canada. In years gone by it was supposed that sufferers from tuberculosis had to be sent to some warm climate. To-day that idea is entirely exploded, and it is believed that a colder climate is more favourable for the treatment of tuberculosis than a warm climate. In the erection of sanatoria it has always been supposed that high altitudes were necessary, but any one who will take the trouble to read the history of the various sanatoria in the United States and other countries will find that in many instances they are built on low lands, and in one case in England one of the most successful is built in a place where fog very frequently and almost continuously exists to a greater or less extent. There is another point I desire to make. We have the possibilities, and is it not highly desirable that we should place Canada in the foremost rank in this respect, and make it a country desirable for every people of the world to come to because of its freedom from the disease. It is in the highest interests of Canada that our government should lose no time in doing what may be done, and certainly a very great deal can be done in dealing with this question. It is not too much to say that it is possible to stamp the disease out entirely, but this we cannot expect. However, we can expect to reduce it very materially, and practically stamp it out. Now, hon. gentlemen, what has been done in Canada up to the present time? I have enumerated the few sanatoria that have been constructed. Some four or five years ago, aided by His Excellency the Governor General and my hon. friend behind me (Sir William Hingston), Sir James Grant and several other gentlemen throughout Canada, a society was formed having for its object the prevention of tuberculosis. That society has not received much aid from contributions. The Dominion government has helped it annually to the extent of $2,000. In this matter there is not only the question of building sanatoria, but there is the question of educating the people—and it is a great point—spreading information as to the nature of the disease, as to its origin and as to its preventability. I am glad and proud to say that the association which I have named has done very much in this respect. No less than 1,400,000 tracts have been disseminated among the people of Canada, describing the character of the disease, how it may be prevented, and, to some extent at least, how it may be cured, and over eighty lectures have been delivered by the secretary in the last two years. The educational phase of this subject is a highly important one. The association that I have named cannot go beyond education; it is not one that can deal with the construction of sanatoria. It has not the means of doing so. That is not its sphere, but it is desirable that this educational scheme should be accompanied by a movement for the construction of sanatoria. As I have said, if we wait until private enterprise takes up the matter or until the provincial governments do so, very many thousands of the very best people of Canada will have lost their lives, as a result of the delay, which might otherwise be saved. I want to say here and emphasize it—every Canadian knows right well the value of the native Canadian over the immigrant, no matter from what source he may come. Is it not desirable, then, to spend money upon saving the people we have as well as in bringing people to our shores. Considering all the circumstances, there is but one means of preventing the spread of tuberculosis, and that is at the command of the government. I sincerely hope that as a consequence of the resolution carried unanimously in the House of Commons, and the resolution which I have submitted to this House, and which I hope will be unanimously adopted here, the Dominion government will lose no time in taking action to prevent the spread of this terrible disease.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—The hon. gentlemen from Ottawa who has just taken his seat has very modestly expressed his regret that this motion had not been confided to the tender mercies of some member of the medical profession. It occurred to me, while he was speaking, that he must, at some period of his life, have become familiar with the science and art of medicine, and I only regret that he had not continued and become, perhaps a professor of clinical medicine or of clinical surgery in some of our institutions. No medical man could have put the subject more clearly, more forcibly or more convincingly before us than has been done by the hon. gentleman.

The question to my mind is one of the most important with which we could have to deal. It presents many aspects. I intended to say a word on the disease and what it means, but as the economic aspect has been gone into so very fully, I shall say a few words in reference to that. It is estimated that 2,000,000 lives are lost annually to the world by tuberculosis. The disease is under certain conditions as widely disseminated as the house fly—but not with like uniformity. Climate has something to do with its causation and cure—but ignorance or disregard of hygienic laws is its chief cause. The aggregate so to speak, of all the antecedents which suffice to bring about in connection with man and his environment the condition we are deploring. Of those 2,000,000, Canada has her fair share. The hon. gentleman has said, and said truly, that the mortality in this country from tuberculosis is over 8,000 annually. He does not exaggerate. The most competent authorities mention that figure ; but, in addition to the 8,000 or 9,000 who die annually, there is something equally if not more important. It is not those who are sick to-day and who die to-morrow that we have alone to deal with. There is in addition a much larger number, estimated at 40,000, rendered, at an early period of the disease, unfit to earn their own livelihood or support their families, making, in round figures, 48,000 invalidated by a preventable disease.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—Viewed economically, taking a man at twenty-five to thirty-five, when his life is supposed to be most valuable, he is worth, in round figures, $1,000 to the Dominion government. But he is worth, it is supposed, about half that amount to the provincial government, or $500. Then he is of about the same value to the municipality, or something like $500 ; but to his family his value is double what it is to the Dominion government, the local government and the municipality combined. The amount is put down by competent authority, and I take the figures as furnished by Dr. Richer,—and I mention him with great pleasure as that of one thoroughly familiar with the subject. These combined would make the value of a man between twenty-five and thirty-five to be in the neighbourhood of $8,000. English authorities estimate the value of a man of between twenty-five and thirty-five at $8,000. In this country we take a more moderate view, and estimate the value of life at $6,000, although life is as valuable here as it is anywhere. The annual loss to the federal government, therefore, is something in the neighbourhood of $8,000,000 ; to the provincial government, $4,000,000 ; to the municipality, $4,000,000 ; while the loss to the family and community by death or prolonged sickness is beyond computation, and all from what ? From a disease admittedly preventable. But this is only from the death rate. When we come to add the loss in productive power of those who are not in health, and who are rendered partially, or wholly unfit for work, it is almost impossible to estimate the loss. When they are no longer able to earn their own livelihood, they must live at the expense of their families and very, very often, supported by public charity. Our hospitals all over the country were once filled with them. This loss again is estimated at $24,000,000, making the huge loss amount to $72,000,000. Discount these figures as we may, the death of 8,000, and the sickness and enforced incapacity of 40,000 must be appalling in magnitude, and what has the government done to meet it ? I do not know what it has done for man, but let me show what it has done for cattle. On a couple of occasions tuberculosis showed itself among our cattle, and a sum of $19,500 was forthcoming to stamp it out, and again $16,500, together $36,000, given to stamp out the disease. But for human beings I have yet to learn that anything like a respectable sum has been given. I was not aware, until my hon. friend mentioned it, that anything had been given ; he says something in the neighbourhood of one or two thousand dollars has been given annually. Now, in animadverting on the action of governments I do not allude especially to the government of to-day, all governments in the past have done the same thing—they have not helped in any way to check the spread of the disease. There was an excuse for inaction formerly; there is none to-day. The disease was not understood until recently. Now that it is thoroughly comprehended, the most elementary charity should compel us to come to the aid of the sufferers.

But what is the disease which so concerns us and with reason? It was partially understood long before the time of our Saviour. It was written upon by Hippocrates and others, and the Greeks even at that early period thought it was a curable and preventable disease. They did not, they could not, know precisely its nature, for it is only in the past few years the microscope has detected the minute creature which is always present in tuberculosis. They taught, that not medicine, but hygiene and diet, aided by judicious medical treatment, are the means of preventing the disease and of curing it when it occurs. Acting upon that belief, Cruveilhier, of Paris, when I began the study of medicine, was conducting experiments which interested the whole medical world. He induced tuberculosis, at pleasure, in rabbits and caused its disappearance at pleasure. He sacrificed for that purpose, a large number of rabbits. He deprived them of pure air and sunshine and good diet and succeeded in inducing tuberculosis at pleasure. In this way he would cause the symptoms to appear one after another, when he would again restore them to health. He killed a sufficient number to show the presence of tuberculosis at every stage. These were the experiments of Cruveilhier at the middle of the century. That was before bacteriology became the science which it is now. We have made telescopes greater and larger from time to time and we see heavenly bodies we could not see before; but with the aid of the microscope explorations have gone on much further in the opposite disection. Take the bacillus which is present in tuberculosis: upon the nail of my little finger half a million of these bacilli could find a resting place. It is estimated that ten millions of theme would occupy a cubic centimetre. It takes about two and one-half centimetres to make an inch; that is to say: in an English cubic inch twenty-five millions of these bacilli can find a resting place. I do not stop to say whether these bacilli are the cause or the effect of tuberculosis, but the bacilli are always present when tuberculosis exists, if they are met with, tuberculosis exists; if they are not, there is reason to believe there is no tuberculosis. It is by means of the microscope one can tell whether a person is the subject of tuberculosis or not. When one does not find the bacilli, one can reasonably conclude that the disease is not tuberculosis. Some have gone so far as to say that tuberculosis is a filth disease. This was the opinion of Sir John Simon, and I do not think he was very far astray. The fact, however, is established that tuberculosis is a parasitic disease, as easily prevented as the itch, and as easily cured in the very early stages. For fifty years the Germans have taught—and the Germans do not jump at conclusions—they are most cautious and prudent in all scientific matters —that tuberculosis is curable. Braemer, speaking for the whole German profession once said, and lest his words might not have the general diffusion and be as widely reaching as he desired, he was not content to put them in German, but in Latin—Tuberculosis primis in stadiis semper curabilis—Phthisis or tuberculosis in its early stage is always curable, and that was the opinion of the profession in Germany as long as fifty years ago.

The disease is rare above certain altitudes, and it was at one time thought to be because the atmosphere there is rare, but no, it is because the air is colder and perhaps drier. We all know that as we ascend, the air gets colder until we reach the line of perpetual congelation. When we reach 16,000 to 17,000 feet we reach the line of perpetual frost. That line runs from the equator, where it is highest, to the Arctic, where it is several feet under the ground. If that line were a tangible one, and if we could put our tuberculosis patients on it from the equator to the Arctic circle, tuberculosis would disappear and at no place, even in the coldest regions, is cold ever too intense for a consumptive patient, but we cannot hope for anything of that kind. Yet it has been found that even at high altitudes in the Alps, tuberculosis in certain limited districts is rife. Why ? Some handicrafts as that of watch making, established themselves there, and men congregated in small places, with insufficient air, artificially heated, and there tuberculosis was met with, showing that even at a high altitude men could not escape disease under such conditions.

The difficulty we have in dealing with the question in this country, perhaps more than in most, is the ignorance, the impenetrable ignorance prevailing among the masses. Could the people be taught the chances of recovering under proper care ; could they learn that it is in the power of man aided by his fellow-man to cause all parasitic diseases, and this may fairly be considered a parasitic disease, to disappear from the world—and here I quote the words of Pasteur—'how prone they would be to aid their fellow man to get rid if this disease.' But we are selfish and when we are not suffering from the disease curselves we are apt not to think much of those who are less fortunate. I hope the motion introduced by my hon. friend will be productive of some good. At any rate it will go some way to enlighten public opinion on a question which should be à la portée of every one, not only in this chamber, but throughout the Dominion, and will lead, as I fervently hope it may, to intelligent and concerted action of federal, provincial and municipal governments. Consumption, says a writer, is a social disease, and being a social disease, says Knopf, society must also do its part and help the medical profession to stamp it out.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I wish to add a few words in support of the able speeches delivered by the hon. president of this association, who introduced the subject here, and my hon. friend from Montreal. The hon. mover and his society are deserving of a great deal of credit for the interest they have taken and the efforts they have put forth to enlighten the people of Canada on this important subject. This disease has been styled the great white plague, and it is certainly deserving of that appellation. It is not my intention to go into the pathology of this disease, nor to detain you by any remarks in reference to the analysis of it, because the hon. senator from Montreal has gone into that very extensively and I can add nothing to what he has said. He has stated it much better than I could have done. Probably he is as good an authority on the subject as any man in Canada. I want to impress on the government and parliament of Canada the importance of taking hold of this question. It has been before parliament some little time. I remember having brought it up in the House of Commons some years ago. It has been brought to the notice of the local legislatures on several occasions, but nothing seems to have been done to stop this great plague. The mover of the resolution told you that 8,000 people die every year in this country from tuberculosis. When we come to consider that two-thirds of that number are in the prime of life, between the ages of 18 and 30, many of them the very best and brightest of our people just after they have received their education and when the Dominion expects to get some good from their lives, the importance of the subject can be appreciated. Scientists throughout the world agree that tuberculosis is a preventable disease. It certainly is a disease which is difficult to cure once it becomes established, but by prevention I think I am safe in saying we could at least save six out of the eight thousand who die every year. I believe I am within the mark when I say that. If you do that, you accomplish a great thing. How can we teach our people to use preventive measures ? The disease is spread throughout the length and breadth of this country by carelessness and ignorance, and the only way we can diminish its ravages is by education. I notice that at the Tuberculosis Congress at St. Louis last summer the whole gist of the speeches made by all the noted gentlemen from all over the world was education, education, education. Educate the people how to avoid infection, because the disease passes from one individual to another. As the mover of the resolution has said, it is not hereditary. When a member of a family becomes infected, the other members of the family are subject to infection, but by education on this subject they can be saved, even if the one suffering from the disease cannot be cured. What I want to do is to impress on the government to take steps to stamp this disease out of the country, and the only way it can be done is this: Let them establish a Department of Health. We have Departments of Agriculture, Customs, Inland Revenue, Labour, &c. None of them would be more important than a Department of Health. At the head of this department should be placed a thoroughly educated scientific man, able to make analyses of this and all other infectious diseases, and to issue bulletins and circulars and distribute those to the teachers of schools throughout the length and breadth of the country, also to clergymen and presidents of all societies and see that the people are provided with this information and that it is instilled into their minds. I would go still further; I would enact laws on the subject. The head of this department should consult with the government and prepare legislation to compel careless people who are in the habit of expectorating around the house, in the street cars, in school rooms, churches, &c., to stop the abominable habit and thus do a great deal to prevent the spread of this disease. If the government is not prepared to give us a Department of Health, let us have a deputy head under some other department.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It could be attached to the quarantine.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Yes, a thoroughly able man. Let us have any amount of literature and also instruct the people and help them to stamp out this disease. We have on the floor of this House three important members of the present government. I hope they will not fail to bring this matter before their colleagues at the earliest possible moment and urge that something be done to prevent the spread of the scourge. While we are paying large sums of money to bring immigrants, many of whom are found to be infected with diseases when they arrive, we are not spending a dollar to save our own people from destruction by this terrible disease. I hope the government will not fail to do something in the shape of building sanitaria in conjunction with the local governments and the municipalities throughout the Dominion and take every step within their power to put a stop to the ravages of tuberculosis.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The important subject which the honourable gentleman from Ottawa has brought under the attention of the Senate, is worthy of our serious consideration, and I feel the discussion on the question will be profitable and interesting to this House as well as to the country.

Since the days when the hereditary transmission of consumption, as the source of the disease, had been doubted, and the infection was discovered by the celebrated Dr. Koch, over 20 years ago, to be communicable by a germ peculiar to tuberculosis, and now known as 'Tuberculi Bacilli,' the attention of scientific men, and leading men in the medical profession has been given to the question of isolation of tuberculous patients, in order to remove from society the cause from which perhaps nearly all the cases of pulmonary tuberculosis get the infection. The question of hereditary transmission of tuberculosis, few will deny, but the idea that was formerly held of this transmission has, since the discovery of the inoculability of tuberculosis, I think been largely abandoned. The fact that it is possible, I may almost say certain, that the transmission of the tuberculous germ from the father or the mother, or that the germ can find its way from a tuberculous mother to the child in the uterus, as easily as it can find its way to any portion of the mother's own body render the heredity cause of consumption explainable, the only real inheritance being due to the physical conformation of the body, with a predisposition and susceptibility of a soil preeminently in a condition to cultivate the seed. Age even does much to prove this fact, the youth from infancy to the near approach to manhood are more disposed to have tuberculosis in the glands, bones and joints at a higher percentage than the adult: this also holds true in intestinal tuberculosis. In the adult, when attacked, the germ generally elects the lungs, as the seat where to set up the disease, while the aged rarely fall a victim to it.

I do not wish to be understood as meaning mere contact with a tuberculous patient is dangerous. The disease is not contagious in this way, as would be the exposure of a susceptible person to small-pox, scarlet fever and diseases of that class. The germ of tuberculosis has to be taken into the body by the lungs or stomach, by inoculation or otherwise, and as this germ has to be dry there is very little danger in a recently expectorated sputum.

Let me state here that I think there is much in what Dr. Sheard, of Toronto, said at the Tuberculosis Association meeting here last week, that 'the literature sent out by the association had the effect of making matters uncomfortable for consumptives,' and that they feel they are being shunned. To my mind, literature has done its work, and the time for the practical carrying out of the lessons taught by such means has arrived.

The two terms contagion and infection I know are synonymous, but the sense in which I wish to use them here is that contagion means the carrying of the disease from exhalations of effluvia invisible as to its poisonous contents, while infection means the carrying of infectious matter or poison, and known to contain that which produces a like disease in another person—after it enters the system.

Now that it is generally accepted that pulmonary consumption is an infectious disease, and the source of the infection is known and understood, the question of taking preventive measures ought, in the interest of humanity and for other reasons which I need not mention here, to engage our earnest attention.

In diphtheria antitoxin has proved a great success as the destroyer of the germ peculiar to it, not only successfully in the treatment of the disease, but as a preventive, when injected into the system of a healthy child. But in cases of tuberculosis, 'tuberculin,' or the antitoxin of tuberculosis, has not yet proved to be a safe remedy. This being the case, our efforts should be given to the removal of the patients from communicable relationship with people generally, and even from their own houses, to a sanitarium. This should be done to prevent the spread of the disease, and it will also increase the chances of improvement and ultimate recovery of the patient.

The provincial boards of health, as well as the local municipal boards, have by provincial legislation the power to isolate persons affected with small-pox, diphtheria and scarlet fever, while legislation authorizing isolation in the case of tuberculosis has hitherto been overlooked, though more deaths are caused by it than all these put together. Why is this? Is it because consumption had been, before the discovery of Dr. Koch, looked upon as not infectious, but due to the visitation of Providence or to the fate that he or she was born of consumptive parent or parents, and that the removal of such patients would not do anything to ameliorate the evil or lessen the disease? This is not correct, and cannot be acknowledged any longer; on the contrary, tuberculosis is known to be very infectious, and the removal of a patient so afflicted is the proper safeguard and security from the spread of the disease.

The principal source from which the baccilli of tuberculosis is known to come is from the sputa of consumptive people, and only then after the sputa dry and float with the dust in the air. It is calculated indeed that seven million bacilli are contained in the sputa of an advanced consumptive patient in twenty-four hours. The virulent bacilli may live a long time in the absence of strong light and proper temperature. A portion of a lung affected with tuberculosis, buried in the ground, when exhumed after two and a half months, and even longer, has been according to good authorities, found to retain its infectious power, but a living organism is required for its proper multiplication. Another source is from houses where persons have had this pulmonary affection for perhaps a long time, and not cleaned and purified by such means as will destroy the bacilli.

The imperative duty, therefore, is clearly manifest that the only means by which the disease can be successfully eradicated is by isolation, and abundant proof has been given from extended experience that the proper place for the removal of such patients is to a sanitarium. This not only increases the immunity from the infection, but the chances, as I have already stated, for great improvement in the condition of the patient and his ultimate recovery. Now as such institutions can only be built and maintained from public sources, the parliament of the Dominion as well as the legislatures of the provinces should grapple with the question and grant sufficient aid to establish sanatoria in Canada in suitable places and within easy reach of large centres of population. Statistics have already been furnished which show that pulmonary tuberculosis has decreased nearly one-third in 15 years where isolation was resorted to, and that we can safely predict that 25 years more will practically exterminate the malady if the means referred to are undertaken.

An anti-tuberculosis association is in existence in Ottawa of which the hon. gentleman who introduced this subject is president. It has done admirable work. 'Local' associations of a similar character, though under different names, but for the same object, are in Montreal and Toronto and, I presume, in other cities in Canada, all of which, I am sure, are also doing good work, but these associations should be encouraged and substantially recognized by the Dominion and local governments. The Dominion government could establish a sanitary bureau in connection with the Department of Agriculture. The object would be the further prosecution of the present quarantine law so as to prevent immigrants landing without a certificate from a proper authority that he or she is free from pulmonary tuberculosis. The department already spends, and we think properly, a large amount of money for the prevention of and eradication of bovine tuberculosis. It gives monetary aid to farmers among whose cattle that fatal disease known as anthrax may make its appearance. Compensation is given the farmer for the loss he suffers from the slaughter of his herd, and from the slaughter of his swine if diseased by a contagious infection. These facts make me think and feel that a proper presentation of the question of tuberculosis to the government will establish a claim for a serious and favourable consideration of the question, and the taking of proper steps for the eradication of the disease in the human family.

The provincial governments, we are aware, are by our constitution the guardians of our internal sanitary conditions, but they need the gentle hint of a more active move—to improve the sanitary laws so as to take advantage of recent discoveries as to the source of tuberculosis, and the causes of such mortality among our people, and how to prevent it.

It ought also to be the duty of the Department of Education under the provincial governments to have a few sections in their readers for use in schools, devoted to the question of tuberculosis, and how to prevent it, small-pox and how to prevent it by vaccination, and also something instructive as to other kindred diseases.

The provincial governments have of late years created by an Act of parliament known as the Succession Duty Act, a large income from wealthy estates which took away from many wealthy people the disposition to aid charitable institutions of their own free will. This fund I would suggest should be used exclusively for the purpose of sanatoria, hospitals and such public institutions.

With regard to the duties of boards of health in municipalities, they should be empowered—as they are in direct touch with the people—to enforce a medical examination of persons known or suspected to be affected with pulmonary tuberculosis, and cause his or her removal to a sanitarium. This body should also have power to establish local dispensaries in charge of a medical man for the purpose of dispensing medical aid to those who cannot be removed, and directing other sanitary means in the interest of those who are obliged to nurse and care for them.

With sanatoria once established, properly erected, located and equipped with medical experts on tuberculosis, and specialists on lung diseases, nurses and all the other proper help, there need not be any fear or anxiety as to the result. The cured patients, returning home from the sanitarium, will be a living evidence and a walking advertisement as to the benefits received there, and it would not be a surprise if the time will come, from such results, that the sanatoria in many places will be self-sustaining, as the charges the rich will be willing to bear, will more than counterbalance the cost to the institutions for the care of the poorer classes.

The average death rate to the thousand yearly in all countries is about twenty-two; of this it is calculated one-seventh is due to pulmonary tuberculosis. It exceeds the combined mortality from war—I do not include the present Japanese and Russian war—famine, plague, cholera, yellow fever and small-pox.

France has taken the lead of other countries on the question of sanatoria for tuberculosis with the result, it is stated, that 75 per cent of the younger patients are cured. Germany shows two-fifths in some of its sanatoria. The statistics in England are not so good though 'Victoria Hospital' for consumptives, near Edinburgh, shows good results. In the United States good results have also been had from the sanatoria near Boston and Philadelphia and in the Adirondacks.

England's death rate from pulmonary consumption has been given as seventy thousand each year, and Canada's death rate about seven thousand, and it is stated 70 to 80 per cent of these can be saved by isolation. Ransome in his Milroy lectures on the etiology and preventive of phthisis declared before the Royal College of Physicians in London, in 1890, that tuberculosis in its various forms causes the death of seventy thousand yearly in England, and that one-third of all who die from fifteen to forty-five years—the most useful period of life according to Dr. Osler—die from tuberculosis. We are informed 33 per cent is given in Germany, about 30 per cent in France, the United States being about double what it is in England. These figures are appalling and make us almost feel we are guilty of a criminal wrong when we hesitate to act determinedly in order to stamp out this plague.

General hospitals are not the proper places to treat pulmonary tuberculosis patients. The reasons are apparent, the presence of a tuberculosis patient there would from the infectious nature of the disease, be dangerous to the other patients. The proper construction for a tuberculosis sanitarium should be different. The building should be high and built on high ground with a good drainage from it, and it should have, if possible, pine trees around it, as well as other healthy trees and all the sunlight and fresh air possible, with easily ventilated rooms without draughts, plain furniture that can be easily dusted daily, proper verandas, gardens and walks for the patients to pass the time in and take exercise, and seats here and there in the open air to rest on. The food must be good and wholesome, with a proper dietetic bill of fare under the supervision of the medical superintendent.

The average homes in towns and cities and in the country are not proper places for phthisical patients, apart from the danger to other members of the family. The ventilation and general surroundings are bad. Inattentive medical attendance without the proper nursing and care insisted upon at a sanitarium will be a serious drawback. This will account for the large death rate in private practice; but let me add to all this another fruitful cause, that is, the insidious and treacherous character of the attack. It disarms the patient and makes him think he has only a 'bad cold.' Patent medicines and quack nostrums are used; when these fail, and the appetite continues bad with an appreciable emaciation and general debility, noticeable by himself as well as his friends, he is awakened to the seriousness of his condition. It is then he goes to consult a doctor, but, unfortunately, it is too late.

This, hon. gentlemen, brings me to the conclusion of what I have to say now on the important subject of tuberculosis. I know it will not meet the views of many in my own profession. I am conscious also of my want of opportunities to give this question the great and industrious study that it should have, and venture with diffidence to offer the opinions I have here advanced, as they are largely the result of my own personal attention to the study of this disease which came almost daily under my observation in an active practice of 40 years. I have also learned much from men of ability in the profession with whom I have taken pleasure to exchange opinions on this question, and finally I have to credit such literature as I have been able to consult on the subject.

Sir Hyman Weber, an eminent physician in Germany, said that 'the crusade against tuberculosis is a powerful factor in the fight against infective disease' also that tuberculosis 'is a potent cause of the physical degeneration of a people.' If we do not awaken to this fact, we will be allowing the foundation to be laid in Canada for the physical degeneration of one of the healthiest and hardiest people perhaps on the face of the globe.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I apologize to the House for making any observations upon this subject at this hour of the evening, not being a medical man, but my excuse for doing so is that I probably come in contact with a phase of this dread disease in the section of country from which I come, of a more practical character than possibly might obtrude itself upon many eastern medical men. The country is undoubtedly indebted very largely to the medical fraternity for the publicity and the very widespread notice which they have given to this subject. But the difficulty is that the movement up to the present time in the direction of dealing with the ravages of consumption has been largely of an academic or scientific character, and has not assumed that practical shape which unfortunately is so necessary at this critical time to meet so dread a disease. The section of country from which I come, owing to its climatic conditions, altitude, dryness and other characteristics has been recommended very largely by medical men throughout the whole Dominion as a field of relief for those suffering from pulmonary troubles. The consequence is, and I think I am not making an exaggerated statement when I say, that along the foot hills of the Rocky Mountains within a range say of 150 miles, as well as within the interior of British Columbia, there are many thousands to-day seeking restoration of health from the ravages of tuberculosis, yet notwithstanding the presence of that very great number of people nothing has been done of any importance by either the federal government, or the provincial governments to assist in dealing with this question. It therefore seems to me that no subject of so great importance has received such little attention at the hands of governing bodies as the question we are discussing to-day. The most distressing phase of this difficulty which obtrudes itself upon one's attention in the district from which I come is that no accommodation has been provided of any consequence whatsoever with reference to this disease. In fact, what does force itself upon one's attention is the utter absence of accommodation within the cities and towns and centres of population in that western country. Patients seeking a recovery of health from consumption, except they have very large means, cannot possibly gain admittance into the hotels or private houses or secure any accommodation whatsoever. I think I am not making a statement outside the bounds of truth when I say that there are hundreds in that western country living in tents to-day seeking health, owing to the beneficial nature of the climate. With this condition of facts before us, it seems to me that the government certainly should make some official investigation into the conditions to which I allude and which are more or less familiar to every public man. Medical gentlemen who may assemble in congress here and prepare papers and deal with the scientific or the academic aspect of these matters really are not in a position to get to the root of the matter for solving the difficulty. An educative campaign or crusade of course is desirable. And the knowledge which the public has to-day is very largely due to the fact that medical men have evinced such a deep interest in the scientific aspect of the question, but there is a practical shape to it and while the medical fraternity has done its duty in this particular regard, I say that the public men of Canada have neglected a very important duty and now is the time to give some attention to it. I should like to see the medical fraternity of this Dominion drop for the moment the academic phase of this question and take up the practical one, and insist upon, not only the federal government, but the provincial governments thoughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, taking hold of the subject and putting it in practical shape. Another phase of the difficulty with which we have to grapple in that western country lies in the fact that a large immigration is coming annually into that district. It is estimated that at least one hundred thousand people annually are going into that country, many from different parts of the continent. on which we live, thus preventing medical examination being made and quarantine regulations being enforced with reference to those coming from the interior of the continent. The consequence is that immigrants coming from the interior and from foreign countries must necessarily have a large percentage of consumptives amongst them. Therefore, we will in the near future have upon these grounds a very much larger proportion of those suffering from tuberculosis and pulmonary diseases than in other sections of the Dominion. Happily nature has provided, to some extent, a counterpoise by which, living under the very salubrious climatic conditions of that western country, the disease is somewhat mitigated. But that does not relieve the government of the country from assuming that responsibility which must necessarily devolve upon them in dealing with conditions of this character. It was only a few months ago since the question of mange was taken up by the government and dealt with in the most heroic manner. The same applies, as my hon. friends from Montreal and from Ottawa said, with reference to tuberculosis amongst cattle. We find the greatest degree of activity displayed by the Department of Agriculture when there is even a suspicion that something has happened our cattle, our horses or other live stock, and, as I have said, the most heroic measures are at once taken to stamp out any disease of that kind. When we take into consideration that from 1½ to 2 per cent of our population is dying annually from tuberculosis, and when we consider the passive or the quiescent state of the different governments of the Dominion upon this question, one is really surprised at not only the indifference of the government, but the indifference of the public. Now, I might say that it is impossible to-day for a consumptive patient to have access to any of the general hospitals which are to be found throughout the North-west Territories ; and for the reason suggested by my hon. friend from Alexandria, it is quite obvious that it would not be desirable that patients suffering from pulmonary troubles should have general access to these institutions. What I have said with reference to the hospitals applies to the hotels and private houses and other channels of accommodation, which one would naturally expect to be open to people seeking to recover health. Therefore, it seems to me that in view of the facts which I have pointed out, it would not be unreasonable that the representatives of the government in this Chamber should take this subject up seriously and, possibly, in connection with the subject of immigration. We are, from time to time, making very large grants for that particular purpose. I suppose the grants for immigration for some years past have averaged half a million per year, and it therefore seems to me that it would not be unreasonable that this grant should be either supplemented by a reasonable amount, or that there should be taken from this sum a substantial sum in aid of the establishment of sanatoria in the Northwest and in the interior of British Columbia. It seems to me that if one hundred thousand dollars were expended annually in assisting sanatoria in the western part of Canada at least five hundred patients could be treated with the greatest benefit with very little cost to themselves, and it certainly would be an incentive to capitalists, philanthropists or others who would be willing to establish institutions of that kind and supplement the difference between the amount granted by the government and the amount necessary to make successful the conduct of those institutions. When my hon. friend from Russell brought up this matter I had not intended speaking on the question, but owing to the fact that I am more or less familiar with the conditions which I have mentioned, I am deeply impressed with the serious nature of the question and cannot too deeply impress upon this House the necessity of giving their best consideration to the subject now before us.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN. I intend to take the opportunity of addressing the House upon this question also, although not a physician. It is a question which every member of this House should express his opinion upon. It is very desirable, however, that we should advance the Bills on our order paper a stage to-day and for that purpose I move that the debate be adjourned until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (O) An Act to incorporate the Owen Sound and Meaford Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen).

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have received a telegram from one of our co-senators here, the Hon. Mr. Choquette, asking if we could postpone that privilege question until he can be here. Therefore, with the permission of the House, I will proceed with the motion now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What is the motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A question of privilege I think is supposed to be something urgent, something which has arisen since the last meeting of the House ; and this idea of keeping a question of privilege in cold storage is objectionable.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman's point is not well taken. A question of privilege is not always urgent, but something urgent may be a question of privilege, and I may do it at the request of the interested parties. There are two parties interested here, the Hon. Mr. Legris and the Hon. Mr. Choquette, and one party is absent and asks us to postpone the matter until his arrival here. Therefore, out of courtesy I make the request.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (14) An Act respecting the Molsons Bank.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (26) An Act to incorporate the Sovereign Fire Assurance Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

LEBONK AND THUNDER BAY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG in the absence of the Hon. Mr. Frost, moved the second reading of Bill (61) An Act to incorporate the Lebonk and Thunder Bay Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All these Bills except Bill (50) are not printed. I make an objection. I do not think the Bureau should be so occupied at this time, when the discussion in the House of Commons on the Autonomy Bills is proceeding, and not much work going on, that they cannot print our Bills. These Bills should be distributed and in the hands of every member in this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite sure the fault does not lie with the Bureau. It lies with the translation office.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that made in the House of Commons ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so, if the Bills are from the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the Bills have been passed in the Commons and brought here, they must have been translated before.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Does the hon. gentleman press his objection ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not to-day, but I want to give notice that in future I will.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (68) An Act respecting a Patent of the Paper Goods Company, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (78) An Act respecting the Macleod, Cardston and Montana Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (85) An Act respecting the Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

Bill (89) An Act respecting Monterey Electric and Gas Company, Limited, and to change its name to 'Monterey Railway, Light and Power Company.'—(Hon. Mr. McMillan.)

Bill (94) An Act respecting the Brockville, Westport and Northwestern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

Bill (50) An Act to incorporate the Calgary and Battleford Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

CALGARY, RED DEER AND BATTLEFORD RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (19) An Act to incorporate the Calgary, Red Deer and Battleford Railway Company, without amendment.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved that the Bill be read the third time on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. This is a private Bill. One of our rules states that a Bill should be in conformity with the notice of motion and the petition that was presented asking for the Bill. The petition and the notice of motion do not agree with the Bill as it comes from the committee. The petition asks for a Bill for a railway starting from Calgary and running to Battleford; so does the notice, and the Bill which was presented and which is now before the House grants more than the petition asks for. It is enacted that the railway will run from a point near or in Calgary to a point at or near Battleford. The private interests are not secured by the notice or the petition that was brought to this House asking for the Bill. Therefore, I ask the ruling of the chair on this Bill, because it is not in conformity with the notice and the petition.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This matter to which my hon. friend refers was brought up in the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to another point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to what took place in the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend is anticipating too much. He should wait patiently.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want the ruling of the chair on the point.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am not referring to anything further than I have a right to do on this occasion. Inasmuch as a matter is brought up which concerns the action of the committee, I am protected by the rules and practice in the House in going as far as I intend going, so that my hon. friend should not anticipate too much. For the information of the Hon. Speaker I desire to point out that the point raised by my hon. friend was brought up in the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to what took place in the committee. He has no right to say that a vote has been taken or a question raised in the committee. The report of the committee is here, and he cannot go beyond it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I submit the points of order, No. 1 and No. 2, are not well taken, because that matter was decided by the committee, which is the competent authority

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to what took place in the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not going to question the correctness of the point just now taken by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, but if your honour will consult the rules of our House it is stated that it is one of the duties of a committee to which a private Bill is referred to consider whether or not the Bill is in conformity with the notice. It is to be assumed that the committee did its duty, and this House is not the place to consider that question; and, further, the difference between the notice and the Bill is so trifling—infinitesimal in fact, almost—that it is not a matter which this House should take cognizance of. It was the duty of the committee to deal with the matter and I assume they have dealt with it; and this is really not a question of order at all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It will be necessary for the Speaker to look at the petition and then at the notice in the 'Gazette' of the application for an Act of incorporation and compare these with the Bill. He will find, according to my idea, that the Bill does not conform to the petition or the advertisement asking for the Bill. It adds words which were not contained in the petition, or in the application for the Bill itself as published in the papers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It possibly may facilitate the solution of this difficulty if I should say that I intend giving notice to amend the Bill when it comes up for the third reading to conform to the notices, so if the hon. gentleman from Stadacona will conclude that that will satisfy the point which he has raised, as well as the more substantial point of the amendment that we really wish to effect in the Bill, we may possibly be able to dispense with this discussion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—At all events, I want the ruling of the chair upon the second point of order; the hon. gentleman had no right to refer to what took place in the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is not the point of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the last point of order I took.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman from Killarney persist in discussing what took place in the committee?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Not at all. I refrained from doing that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before this is decided I should like to say that I differ, as I very often do differ, in toto from the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. If I understood him correctly when I walked into the senate, he said that the presumption was that the Committee on Standing Orders had done their duty and it was no part of the duty of the Senate to question that. If I am mistaken in that, I hope the hon. gentleman will set me right. If we are to adopt that doctrine, we are abnegating the functions of this House. The appointment of a committee is to perform certain duties and that committee has to report to the House. No committee is paramount. If it were so, we had better tell the committee that when they report we have nothing further to say. I do not question the honesty of the committee in the report they have made in this matter. They may have considered the notice quite sufficient. They may have come to the conclusion that, being a public matter, it was not necessary for them to adhere strictly either to the wording of the petition or to the notices published in the papers notifying the public that they intended to ask for a charter to construct certain works. I am not questioning their decision at all. They may have done what they believe to be correct and in the interest of that section of the country, but when you lay down the doctrine that because they have come to that conclusion, we must of necessity accept it without question, that is a point on which I desire to differ from him in toto. It is not the first time I have done that. When I was on the other side of the House, occupying a position similar to that of the Secretary of State, I remember taking that ground on a report made by the Divorce Committee, and so offended were the committee that they all resigned. However, that does not change the position I take on this matter. The duty of the committee is to do what I have no doubt the Standing Committee did—report in accordance with what they thought was correct, but it rests with the Senate when the report is made, to accept or reject it if they think proper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. senator from Belleville somewhat misapprehended the ground which I took. The hon. gentleman from Calgary has given notice of a motion which will carry out his views, because if the motion which the senator from Calgary proposes to move is adopted, then the House will have shown that it dissents from the Railway Committee, and that is the point. I made no reference to the Committee on Standing Orders; I referred to one of our rules which says it is the duty of the committee—in this instance the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours—to which a Bill is referred to consider the question as to whether the Bill complies with the notice or not, and that we would not be justified in assuming that the committee had not discharged their duty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman must remember that his speech was made before the hon. gentleman from Calgary gave notice that he intended to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER—Although I have not had very much time to examine the point of order raised by the hon. senator from Stadacona, my feeling was that at this stage of the proceedings no such point of order could be taken, that on the report of a committee either a motion had to be made to reject, or to modify the report, or to return it to the committee, or a notice of motion should be given to take action at the third reading. For this reason I decide the point of order was badly taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not taken in time? Is that what the Speaker decides?

The SPEAKER—Because I consider it is not the duty of the Speaker, but the duty of the Senate to decide that point.

AN ERROR IN MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the House to a somewhat serious error in the minutes. If hon. gentlemen will turn to the minutes for the 22nd March, page 227, they will find that a number of private Bills from the House of Commons were read the first time, and it was ordered that these Bills be read a second time on Friday next. That was to-day. Owing to some mistake, made either at the table or by the subordinate clerks, these Bills have been put down for a second reading on Friday, 31st March. Perhaps it would not be proper to ask that they be read to-day. I move that these Bills which on Wednesday last were ordered to be read a second time to-day be set down for second reading on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER—Will the hon. gentleman mention the titles of the Bills?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are several of them. I think they are items 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 on the notice paper for Friday next. The only one which should have been put down for the 31st March was the second reading of the Bill for the relief of Philip Vibert.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF IMPERIAL NAVAL FORCES FROM CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all despatches, letters or other communications received by any department or officer of the government of Canada from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, the Colonial Office or any other department of the Imperial government, or from any officer of the Admiralty, of the Department of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, or of any other department of the Imperial Government, with respect to the withdrawal of the imperial naval forces and the civil officers connected therewith from Halifax, Nova Scotia, and Esquimalt, British Columbia, with the answers to such despatches, letters or other communications.

He said : I am sorry that this resolution has not fallen into better hands ; but I I think it is the duty of some member of the House to call attention to the matter, and I have ventured to do so as no other member has proposed to take up the question. The dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt have been closed. Those two places cease to be imperial naval stations. The Pacific squadron and the West India and North American squadron have ceased to exist ; and, while no specific provision appears to have been made for anything to take the place of the Pacific squadron, a particular service squadron with headquarters at Devonport, which will pay occasional visits to North American waters, has been substituted for the permanent force heretofore maintained in the West Indies and on the Atlantic coast of North America. One striking circumstance in connection with this very important change is that it seems to have been made precipitately ; because, as far as I have ascertained, Admiral Bosanquet who took command of the West Indian and North American Squadron at the beginning of last October and who left Halifax in the beginning of November, was not aware when he left Halifax of the change which took place a few weeks afterwards—about the beginning of December. Now, considering the radical nature of the change in imperial policy which is involved in the closing of the dockyards and the withdrawal of the fleet, and considering the relations which have existed and which now exist between the mother country and Canada, it would strike one that some consultation should have taken place between the imperial authorities and the Canadian government, or at the very least that some notice should have been given to the Canadian government of the proposed change. When Canada was a much less important colony than she is to-day—if we can call her a colony to-day—action of a similar nature was not taken without notice. When the imperial military force in Canada and the lower provinces was reduced in 1854 notice was given to Canada and the other colonies, and in the same way previous to 1870, notice was given, so that Canada had a chance to prepare for the change; but as far as I am aware no public notice at any rate has been given in connection with the present change. It is partly for the purpose of finding out whether any consultation has taken place between the imperial authorities and our own government, or whether any notice has been given to our government by the imperial authorities, that I have put this motion on the paper. That a change calculated to affect in so serious a way the relations between Canada and the other British colonies in America, and the mother country should take place without any discussion in our parliament does not seem to me fitting. I feel, and every one recognizes the fact, that as citizens of Canada it is the right, and in a sense the duty of members of this parliament to discuss a matter so important in itself, that is, looking at it from a Canadian standpoint; but I feel further that, as we are all citizens of the empire, we have a right to express our opinions on this question looked upon as an imperial matter. I do not think it necessary to add that in what I am about to say I speak solely for myself. I do not speak for either party.

Let us look at the question from an imperial standpoint. Under the present system there will be no Pacific squadron and no permanent West Indian and North American squadron. The new naval policy being to concentrate bodies of powerful modern ships in such positions as to be able to strike overwhelming blows at any enemy of England at the outbreak of war; and it may be remarked that the concentration is to be such that the bulk of British's naval strength will be available for the defence of the United Kingdom.

Now, as to the merits of this scheme, I may say that it is well known that there are marked differences of opinion amongst naval officers who are qualified to judge. I think it is generally understood that this change is due largely to the influence of the first naval Lord of Admiralty, Admiral Fisher; and I think it is equally well known that other admirals hold views which differ from those of Admiral Fisher. This change revolutionizes, if it does not reverse the policy which has prevailed for more than one hundred and fifty years, as to the Atlantic, and for some sixty years as to the Pacific. The policy is based upon the theory that the whole business of the navy is to crush in time of war the navy of a hostile power. There seems to be a good deal to be said in favour of that view; but, as a matter of fact, the battle of Trafalgar, the hundredth anniversary of which it is proposed to celebrate next October, was the last great sea fight in which the British navy was engaged. We would not say for that reason, because there have been no great sea fights during one hundred years, that the British navy has been useless; that it has not performed valuable services. On the contrary, very few years have passed since the battle of Trafalgar during which the navy has not rendered valuable service to the cause of order and civilization, and particularly valuable service to British trade. If the slave trade with all its accompanying horrors has been abolished; if piracy no longer flourishes in the eastern seas, if mariners may safely land now on almost any of the south sea islands, it is chiefly due to the British navy. If the lives, liberty and property of British subjects are respected in South and Central America this condition is due to the presence in the waters adjoining those countries of armed ships flying the British flag. Perhaps the most important service of the British navy during these one hundred years is that it has been the permanent protector of England's commerce; and, after all, England's commerce is looked upon as the most vital interest of England. Under the system heretofore in operation, if an English merchant ship was seized by Venezuela or if a British subject was improperly imprisoned by Honduras or some other state in Central America, within a few hours a British cruiser appeared on the scene and the property or the man, as the case might be, was released. We had an instance of that only two years ago, when a British ship was seized by Venezuela, and the cruiser 'Charybdis', under Commodore Montgomery, appeared on the scene within a few hours, and the ship was released. Under the conditions which have existed in the past no evildoer was too far away to be made aware of the length and the strength of Britain's arm. As, at an earlier day, the right to claim that one was a Roman citizen was a guarantee against unjust treatment by any tribunal or power in the world as it was then known, so in our times a British subject felt secure from wrong by any foreign potentate or people however formidable or however remote. While this condition of things has been due largely to the presence near at hand of British war ships, it is questionable whether squadrons stationed at Hong Kong and Devonport will be as effective in preventing misdeeds as the West Indian and North American squadrons of the past, whose ships patrolled the whole region. There is no doubt that the sailing of a squadron from Devonport to South America would involve, in addition to the delay and expense, a good deal of publicity and attract an amount of attention from other European nations which would not be desirable.

Then the old system had other advantages. In the first place, it afforded an admirable training for officers. It developed initiative in the commanders of individual ships ; and this initiative in the officers is one of the points as to which in the past the navy has been advantageously distinguished from the army. Serving in various parts of the world, the officers of those English warships got to be familiar with the harbours, coasts and climates and characteristics of countries in various parts of the world. There is a story told which illustrates that fact very well. Some years ago the English admiral commanding on the China station took it into his head that he would like to go into Vladivostock harbour —a harbour of which we hear something now. He took his fleet into that harbour in a thick fog. Nothing could be seen, yet the fleet went into that harbour without any mishap or accident ; and, when the fog lifted in the harbour the Russian garrison were surprised to find the whole of the British-China squadron lying before them. I may say representations were made by the Russian authorities to the imperial government and the admiral was requested not to repeat the performance. It shows how thoroughly the English sailors knew their business.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—British sailors.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not mean to limit the term to the inhabitants of England but apply it to the United Kingdom. Then there was another thing ; going about the world in this way and continually on the move the English navy were up in their work, familiar with their work. At the time of the Columbian celebration in 1894, there was a gathering of the fleets of various nations at New York, and I remember that the United States papers in describing the arrival of the various fleets spoke of the British fleet as being remarkable for its workmanlike appearance. The British ships came in without any fuss or display. They came in evidently doing what they had been in the habit of doing every day, and that characteristic impressed the people of New York. Is it certain that the new system will do the same ? While a resolute, energetic and forcible man like Admiral Fisher is in command, I have no doubt that it will—that he will keep the ships going and the officers and men at work probably just as actively as they are at work now ; but, when Sir John Fisher retires, suppose he is succeeded by an officer of a different character ; suppose that those who undertake to speak for the British taxpayer think that there is really too much good English money wasted in manœuvres which are practically useless, will the thing continue then as it does now ? It is not at all unlikely that we shall have the British fleets spending most of their time in the home ports and ships and crews getting rusty. There is a possible danger that the British navy may get into somewhat the same condition in which the Russian navy was found at the outbreak of the present war, quite unready for any serious work. Speaking of the British taxpayer, one of the grounds taken is that to maintain anything like an effective patrol in addition to the large squadrons would cost too much money. As a matter of fact, it is proposed, as I understand, to get rid of a number of ships, some of them built only in the last two or three years, which are not supposed to be as effective as they should be. The aggregate value of these ships I believe is over $80,000,000. A few of those ships, which are about being condemned as worthless, and their crews would maintain all the patrol that was necessary.

I have spoken of the matter and expressed my humble opinion of the matter from an imperial standpoint ; but, coming a little nearer to our own local interests it must be borne in mind that in addition to spreading the idea of Britain's greatness beyond her own dominions, the navy in the past has formed a strong link in the chain which binds the various parts of the empire together. Take for instance Canada and Newfoundland; the visits of the squadrons on this station or of single ships to Halifax, Charlottetown, St. John, Sydney, and St. John's, Newfoundland, and to Quebec and Montreal and other places, involving as they did, friendly social relations with all classes of the population on shore, tended much to strengthen the sentiments of loyalty to the Crown and affection to the mother country. The recent change involves the removal of this link; and I think myself that the chain can really ill afford to lose that link. Sentiment is a very good thing, an admirable thing; but sentiment must have something substantial to build upon; and about the things which we do not see and the things which do not exist we are likely after a little while to feel much the same; and I am afraid that one effect of this change will be to weaken very considerably the feeling of friendship and unity so to say, on the part of Canada towards the empire. Then, looking at the thing from a more practical and material point of view, the loss to Canada will be rather serious. The pecuniary loss is very considerable. I do not propose to dwell on that point; but, the pecuniary loss to Canada from the withdrawal of these fleets is very considerable; and the protection to our commerce which has been afforded will probably not exist to the same extent in the future; and that is a serious matter, because our Canadian shipping has found its way to very great extent to the waters adjoining the coasts of Central and South America. Within the last few days a Nova Scotia vessel was seized at Montevideo, and unjustly seized, it is claimed; and I believe that if Commodore Montgomery had been in the neighbourhood with the 'Charybdis,' the ship would have been delivered up and the men who were in prison would have been handed over also. I understand that the captain of the vessel is still a prisoner at Montevideo. That is a small case, but it is an illustration of what we are likely to lose under the existing condition of things. Now, hon. gentlemen, having said so much about what has taken place, the question is what action is called for on the part of Canada. Considering that one of the reasons given for the withdrawal of the English fleet is that the relations between the empire and the United States are of so permanently friendly a character that the presence of any British warships in Canadian waters is unnecessary, it would strike one that for Canada to undertake to establish a fleet of her own would be a work of the merest supererogation. Even if the imperial government are mistaken in their views as to the sentiments of our republican neighbours, any fleet that Canada could acquire and equip would be of no appreciable value, as the United States fleet to-day is one of the strongest in the world and is becoming each year more formidable. That country is spending enormous sums on her navy, and Canada cannot enter into any such competition as that. There is a further circumstance which strengthens that view. Naval construction just now is in a condition of unstable equilibrium. A ship of the 'Lord Nelson' type costs seven and a half millions and is I venture to say of doubtful value. I think hon. gentlemen must feel that one of the main lessons taught by the present war is that marine mines are the cheapest and best means of defence against hostile ships. The value of a battleship has not been settled by this war at all. Some doubt has been thrown upon the value of torpedo boats, but nothing has been proved as to battleships. It has been shown that marine mines are very formidable implements of warfare. Consequently, hon. gentlemen, it does not seem to me that the withdrawal of the imperial war vessels from the West India and North American station calls for any action on the part of Canada; unless it might be a protest from our government against the haste and apparent want of deliberation which have characterized the course of the imperial administration, and a request for its reconsideration. It is sometimes said that Canada has done nothing for the empire, that she has not borne her share of the imperial burdens, and that she has done nothing to deserve the protection of the British navy. Canada has built the Canadian Pacific Railway, a highway which has proved already to be of great value to the empire.

She is about building another Transcontinental Railway which cannot fail to be of value also. She has assumed a liability out of all proportion to her interest in the undertaking, in connection with the Pacific cable ; and she has given the British manufacturers a preference in her markets by admitting their products at a rate of duty one-third less than that imposed upon the goods of their competitors ; and this is a very important good turn done by Canada to England. The first recognition which Canada apparently gets for what she has done is the withdrawal without public notice of the British fleet and the sudden abandonment of a policy which has worked well for 150 years. When we consider what has happened in the cases of the Maine boundary, the Oregon boundary and the Alaskan boundary ; and when we look at the present action of the home government, the contemplation of these things tends in a greater or less degree to weaken the tie of affection on the part of Canada which binds her to the mother country ; and, taken with the conduct of the imperial government as to the embargo on Canadian cattle, goes to show that the sentiment is on the side of the offspring and not of the parent. It is a case of 'l'un qui aime et l'autre qui se laisse aimer,' where Canada is the active party, and the mother country is not only passive but apparently objects.

Since I put this notice on the paper, what I look upon as another important step in the disintegration of the empire has taken place. The imperial government have decided to withdraw their garrisons from Halifax and Esquimalt ; and apparently their places are to be taken by Canadian troops. Under the policy which was initiated about 1854 and was put into almost complete practical operation in 1870, while British garrisons were withdrawn from all other points they were to be maintained at Halifax and Bermuda just as at Malta and Gibraltar. These places were, as Mr. Cardwell said in 1869 : 'Maritime ports which are occupied for imperial objects as stations for our fleet.' Perhaps the House will permit me to stop here to call attention to expressions of opinion upon this point which have been given utterance to by prominent imperial authorities. A committee was appointed in 1859 which reported in 1860, a departmental committee, and I find at page 581 of the volume in which that report is contained the following :

> We propose to divide the colonies (so-called) into two classes. The first class would consist of military posts, in which, for objects altogether independent of and distinct from the defence of the particular countries in which they are situated, the imperial government thinks it necessary to maintain garrisons—such as Malta, Gibraltar, Corfu, Bermuda, and a few more of similar character. So long as these posts are held at all, they should be adequately fortified and garrisoned, but we are of opinion that as the garrisons of them are maintained without reference to the wants and wishes of the inhabitants, they should be dealt with exceptionally, and not included in any general scheme of colonial contribution.

That is from the report of the majority of that committee ; and in the report of the minority, I find at page 587 the following :

> The harbour of Halifax is as much a station important to the general power of the nation as any of the places which have been enumerated in the list of military posts. It is only just that its garrison should be provided for out of imperial funds ; nor could the province of Nova Scotia, which is far from wealthy, be expected to tax itself for such a purpose, merely because this valuable imperial post happens to be situated within its limits.

Now with regard to the policy which is apparently being adopted at present I find at page 591 this language of Mr. Elliott :

> I cannot agree that the defences ought to be placed generally, and as a system under local management. In the first place, the subject does not admit of being conveniently treated in detached portions ; military and naval operations and the preparations to be made for them, require an extended survey. In the next place, the welfare of the Queen's troops in time of peace, and the provision to be made for the success of the national arms in time of war appear to me precisely examples of the subjects for which the imperial government must remain responsible, and which ought to be dealt with by the authority of the Governor, as Her Majesty's representative, and of the officer commanding the forces.

So far for 1860. There was a parliamentary committee which reported in 1861, and there are some noteworthy expressions of opinion in that report. It is the report of the select committee appointed on colonial military expenditure. Mr. Elliott was assistant under Secretary of State for the Colonies. He was under examination, and at page 5 of the report I find the following, answer 72 :

> Q. I think you say that previous to the reductions in Canada, the colonial ministers had consulted the government of Canada in regard to those reductions, and stated their intention of making reductions ; has any similar correspondence taken place between the Colonial Office and the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland ? The governments of those lower provinces, as we call them, were informed in 1854, that owing to the exigencies of the imperial service elsewhere, the forces must be reduced, and that if they thought what remained, insufficient, they must depend upon themselves.

Then he says in answer to question 74 :

The lower provinces include the great harbour of Halifax, one of the most important positions in a strategical point of view in North America. Great Britain with a view to national objects, thinks proper to keep a large garrison in the poor province of Nova Scotia.

I could quote a great many other answers which go to show that Halifax was regarded as an imperial fortress, but I shall pass over a number of these and quote only a few ; and I quote them largely on account of the gentlemen whose opinions they express. I turn to page 151 of this report. The witness under examination was the Right Hon. Henry George, Earl Grey, who had been colonial secretary, and who was the uncle of His Excellency the present Governor General of Canada. At page 151 Earl Grey was asked a question as to the lower provinces being in a different position from Canada, and he said :

I think the fortress of Halifax stands upon different grounds from most other North American colonies. It is rather to be looked at as a place of the same character as Malta or Gibraltar, of which the possession is of importance, with a view to our general naval power, in order to have stations where our fleet, in case of emergency, can refit or obtain supplies.

At page 155, question 2566, he is asked by Mr. Roebuck :

Would you include Quebec amongst that number ?—No, I should not ; I think Quebec is a useful fortress, and also Halifax.

At page 160 answer 2611 :

When you say that Halifax is of the same character as Malta and Gibraltar, do you mean, that, supposing Bermuda was rendered as nearly as possible impregnable that Bermuda, so fortified, would render unnecessary the maintenance of Halifax ? I think, considering what a fine harbour Halifax is, it would be extremely impolitic not to have that so well defended as to be an available refuge for a fleet in time of danger.

At page 161, answer 2617 reads as follows :

If you have fortifications at Kingston, Quebec, and Halifax, there must be garrisons to take care of them, and the troops cost very little more than they would at home.

And he further says :

The imperial government must, I conceive, keep up a certain amount of regular army, and I think that a portion of that army is better quartered in the fortifications than at home.

There was another nobleman who had a great deal to do with the colonies and he also testified before the same committee, and that is the Duke of Newcastle. He was colonial secretary. At page 188 talking about making Nova Scotia pay for the garrison at Halifax, he says :

I look upon it much as if you were to say that because Portsmouth is in the county of Hampshire, Hampshire should be called upon to pay for the expense of the garrison at Portsmouth. Halifax is not kept up for the benefit of Nova Scotia, but, rightly or wrongly, according to the particular views which men may entertain it is kept up for imperial purposes. It is an important military post ; it is still more important as a naval station, inasmuch as by its natural capabilities it is certainly one of the finest, and in all probability the finest harbour in the world.

At page 194 the Duke is asked, question 3020.

You think that Nova Scotia is unable or unwilling either in men or money to furnish the garrison for the protection of Halifax ? If you are speaking of time of peace I should say so decidedly ; if you are speaking of time of war, I have already said they would be ready to afford men, and the money would be a matter for arrangement between the mother country and the colony. In time of peace they would be unwilling to supply volunteers for the maintenance of the garrison, because they would cease to be volunteers, and must be converted into regular soldiers, instead of living by the large wages which they earn by their industrial pursuits at this moment.

And in the next answer he says :

I look upon Halifax as an imperial post, quite as much as I do upon Malta or Gibraltar. Supposing Halifax, instead of being in a colony, was a rock in the sea, I think that England would consider worth its while to maintain it as an imperial post.

Then Mr. Marsh asks : 'Just as we do at Bermuda' ? and he answers 'precisely.'

Then, in question 3023 Mr. Ellice asks :

Is your grace of opinion that possessing Bermuda and going to great expense, as we are now, in making it impregnable, it is necessary to have another fortress in that part of the world ?—I consider the two to be so dissimilar that I cannot look upon the one as an equivalent for the other in any respect whatever. Halifax is a great naval station, but Bermuda is a very bad naval station ; it is a military post which you keep up for military purposes, but the ships which can go into the harbour of Bermuda are only small ones ; a first rate ship of the line can hardly get into Bermuda ; even such a vessel as the 'Nile' was obliged to lie off Bermuda last year for several days waiting for a quiet sea before it could get into the harbour. In Halifax all the navies in the world can be sheltered. In that magnificent harbour called the Bedford Basin you might fight a naval engagement, and in the other two harbours any number of vessels might ride in safety.

In answer to the next question the duke says :

I think that Halifax is maintained for imperial purposes, and I think that the troops which appear in the return under the head of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. almost, if not quite (I believe quite), confined to Halifax, and never go beyond the bounds of the garrison.

I am sorry to have detained the House reading these extracts, but they go to show that Halifax has been maintained as an imperial station, and that there is no reason why Canada should be made to pay for the maintenance of a garrison at Halifax. Logically enough, when Halifax and Esquimalt cease to be stations for the British fleet, as they do by the present British policy, the British garrisons are withdrawn. As far as we can gather from the vague statements which appear in the press, it seems to be assumed that when the imperial garrisons are withdrawn they will be replaced by Canadian troops. The question is whether this necessarily follows. It does not seem so to me. The British navy and the British garrisons having been withdrawn, and there being no longer any ports occupied as stations for the British fleet, the logical and businesslike conclusion is that Canada shall take such steps for her own defence as are called for by her own conditions and interests. Leaving Halifax aside, it is perfectly clear that Canada would not for her own purposes pay five or six hundred thousand dollars a year, for the upkeep of the forts at Esquimalt. Looking at the matter of the defence of the Pacific coast from a Canadian point of view, it is of much greater consequence that Vancouver, the western terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, should be protected than that there should be costly fortifications at Esquimalt. At the present time there is nothing to hinder a solitary hostile cruiser from passing either through the Straits of Fuca, or down through the Seymour Narrows between Vancouver Island and the mainland, seizing the coal mines at Nanaimo and entering Burrard Inlet and taking possession of Vancouver and controlling the western end of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If Canada is going to undertake her own defence, I submit that Vancouver rather than Esquimalt is the point to be defended. From a Canadian point of view I really do not see that Esquimalt is of any special value at all. In my humble opinion—I say that sincerely, because a great many gentlemen whose opinions are probably worth more than mine think differently on the subject—in my humble judgment, the government of Canada acting in the interests of the people of Canada should decline to keep up the garrisons and fortifications of Halifax and Esquimalt on their present footing ; but I think they should express their willingness to largely increase the defence force of the country which is now too small to offer serious resistance to attack. If the government adopted this policy I am satisfied that the home authorities would not persist in their present course, which I look upon as being as injurious to imperial interests as to Canadian interests. It may be said that Canada is bound by the action of her representatives at the colonial conference of 1892, and that they agreed to garrison the two places named. I do not think that there was any express undertaking of that kind ; but no doubt the language used in the memorandum of the Canadian ministers is open to that construction. But hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that, when the Canadian ministers at that conference expressed themselves in language which would indicate that they were willing to garrison Halifax and Esquimalt, it was naturally under the then existing conditions. At that time and under the imperial policy then in force, Halifax and Esquimalt were to be imperial naval stations ; and when they ceased to be imperial naval stations the undertaking of the colonial ministers ceased to operate. It strikes me, looking at the way in which this matter has drifted along, that neither the government nor the people of this country realize the importance of the proposed change in our relations with the mother country. I am informed on very good authority that England has spent upon Halifax and Esquimalt something between two and three milions of dollars a year, rather nearer to three millions than to two. Looking at the question from the lowest standpoint, the importation of this large sum of money into Canada is in itself a great advantage to this country, more especially to Nova Scotia and British Columbia. When this importation of capital into Canada ceases and Canada has to supply the amount out of her own revenue, while Halifax and Esquimalt will not suffer in a pecuniary sense, the loss to the Dominion and the increase in the national burden will be very great indeed. We shall be called upon to expend something like $3,000,000 a year; and we shall not be any better off in the matter of security from attack than we are now, if as well off; because no matter how good the Canadian troops may be, I do not think that for garrison purposes they are any better than the imperial troops. Prosperous as Canada is just at the present time, and even assuming that that prosperity is to continue at its present level, which is assuming a good deal, she cannot undertake permanently such a charge as this, as a mere matter of sentiment towards a country which shows so little sentiment in her dealings with Canada. I do not wish to be understood as contending, that if Canada were to spend this sum of money in establishing and maintaining a large and effective militia for purposes of self defence she would act unwisely. My point is that Canada should not spend any such sum in doing what would be of no appreciable value to her, whatever it might be worth to the mother country. It is a rather surprising circumstance that this proposition to withdraw from the colonies—which reminds one somewhat of what took place at a certain stage in the history of the Roman empire when the garrisons were withdrawn from Britain and other outlying regions—should have been made under a government in England which claims to be above all an imperial one, a government whose supporters have taunted their opponents with being little Englanders. It is difficult to imagine anything more characteristic of the little Englander than the course of the present government with respect to this matter.

As a Canadian and as a citizen of the empire, I regret the course proposed to be adopted by the imperial government—influenced I believe by short-sighted economy; because this change severs one of the few links which now bind Canada to the mother country, because it tends to destroy the feeling of unity and kinship between the mother country and Canada, which every lover of the empire should try to promote and strengthen, and because I fear—probably it is not the case, but it seems to me—it may pave the way for the sundering of the only tie which remains, that is the presence here of an imperial officer as Governor General. I am not in the habit of making professions of faith, but I am a strong believer in British connection, not merely because of the material advantage to Canada, nor for purely sentimental reasons either, but largely because the tendency of the connection with the mother country and of association with the people and officers of the United Kingdom is to elevate our political and social standards. Whatever the faults of the old country may be, there is no doubt that truth and honesty and freedom flourish in public and social life in that country as they do in no other country; and my desire is that Canada shall remain under the British flag, so that those blessings may increase rather than diminish in the life of this nation during the 20th century.

I may say in conclusion that I hope the government will carefully consider the matter to which I have called attention and act as the interests of Canada dictate. As I have already said, I am satisfied that if Canada declines to garrison Halifax and Esquimalt, England will hesitate about abandoning those two ports—in fact will not abandon them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—The House ought to feel exceedingly indebted to the non. gentleman from Halifax for having brought this very important matter before it and before the country. I doubt if many in this House and in this country appreciate the vastness and importance of this question. It is important, this cutting off at a single blow a connection between this part of the empire and the mother country which has lasted for so many years. It may be a delicate matter for this House, or for any member of it, to attack the policy of the imperial government and more especially so as we do not contribute anything towards the maintenance of the navy or of the army, but as free citizens in a free country we have a right to speak. This is part of the empire or it is not, and as citizens of the empire we have a right to express our opinions. I believe I am correct in saying that the imperial government have never asked the Canadian government for a contribution to the navy. It was not considered necessary. No ship was ever sent to Halifax or Esquimalt because they were British possessions; they were sent as part of the program of the British navy to show the British flag in all parts of the world. Esquimalt is a new creation compared with Halifax. It came first of all into notice during the Crimean war, in 1855 and 1856. At that time British ships were sent to Petropavlovsk, on the Russian coast to capture some Russian ships there. Hospitals and stores were built at Esquimalt and from that day to this it has been a naval station and the imperial government have spent hundreds of thousands of pounds in buildings year after year to meet the requirements of the service. Now all those buildings are to be demolished, and the stores accumulated at Esquimalt removed to Hong Kong or England. It is an extraordinary policy and I am surprised that the British nation should have, at the dictate of three men, so radically changed their policy. As far as the army is concerned, I believe they are working in the dark and scarcely know what they are doing. They are actually reducing the battalions of the army by thousands of men, and at the same time are establishing schools to train young men for the army. I do not object to the change of policy on the sordid basis of what we will lose, though there will be a great loss to this country; I base it on this, that we are part of the empire and entitled to protection so long as we form part to it. My hon. friend from Halifax spoke about the links which bind us to the empire. There are three which strengthen and stimulate our loyalty. One is the imperial troops in different parts of the country, another the navy and the third the Governor General. Two of these links have been snapped. Whether they can ever be welded together again I do not know, but it must cause an alienation of the feelings of the people. Those two links having been severed, no one will venture to predict what will happen should the third be broken. It is not at all impossible that the question may arise, if all protection is taken from us and we are left entirely to our own resources and have to take the whole burden of our defence on our own shoulders. I feel very strongly on this matter because I have seen the benefit of the British navy on the Pacific coast. It did not come to our shores simply because British Columbia was a British possession, but wherever British commerce and British merchants went, there the flag followed, and British ships periodically visited all the ports along the coast from Chili to Alaska, giving encouragement and inspiring confidence to British merchants doing business in the various countries bordering on the Pacific. Not only that, but frequently they quelled riots and rows in the Latin American republics. All that is done away with; those merchants will have to look after themselves; there is no protection for them, no flag. We are told that periodically British ships will visit the different seas showing the flag. That will be a waste of money and cost much more for the coaling of the ships than to keep a certain number always on the coast. A ship may come in to-day to Esquimalt, take coal, water, and supplies on board and sail the next day, and within a week a rising of Indians may take place or a strike of working men, and where is the ship to protect us? Perhaps a thousand miles away. A squadron sailing about in that way is of no use to anybody. It will afford no protection to anybody merely to have some warships go around the world showing the flag. Whether the present policy of the British government, and admiralty is a necessity to the integrity of the British Isles—I will not call it the British empire of which we form a part, but not now within the sphere of the scheme of defence—may be premature in us to judge, although we may hold our own opinions and be allowed to express them.

Towards the end of the eighteenth century and in the early days of the nineteenth century, when wars and commotions were rife over the most civilized portions of the world, the British navy, which had won for itself great renown, was not found gathered round the shores of Great Britain, but was found on every ocean and on every foreign coast. Especially round colonial dependencies ships of war were to be found. For one hundred years that system has worked well and greatly strengthened the bond of loyalty, as evidence was given of a paternal interest and protection. Halifax has always been considered as a military and naval base necessary to the strength of the empire. I do not question for a moment the wisdom of placing the British navy periodically on a war footing—ready to strike at any moment in the vicinity of Great Britain. It is certain, however, that the tension of such a war footing cannot be maintained for any length of time. The strain on men, ships and the nation would be too great. The mobilization of the navy periodically need not have so completely annihilated the old system as has been done. Naval stores of all kinds need not have been removed from former naval bases to distant parts where they were not required. After all the ships have undergone a period of drill, tactics and evolution, they could easily and economically come back periodically to former colonial stations and maintain the bond of mutual trust, confidence and loyalty.

It is quite possible hon. members of this House who live in the inland parts of the country, and the people as a whole who live inland, do not realize the far-reaching consequences of the abandoning of the naval stations at Halifax and Esquimalt. Those who have not been in contact with the tramp of armed men and the booming of heavy artillery, who have not witnessed the pride of the empire and the terror of the foe, cannot so well understand the sense of pride and security felt at being part of a mighty power whose protection and care reached to all parts of the empire—commerce guarded, Britishers protected as well in foreign countries as at home. Wherever British enterprise and commerce went, there the British flag followed. Such solicitous care has been very conspicuous on the Pacific for nearly a hundred years, our ships taking an active part in bringing harmony and peace to some of the South American republics, and more recently having close connection and a naval base at Esquimalt. On several occasions ships of war have done good service in British Columbia in keeping Indian tribes in order and making a display of British power. All this is to be changed now as by a magic wand. What for? If to save the taxpayer, it will not keep one penny in his pocket. If the present mobilization is a menace to Germany, it is decidedly wrong. We have never trod on the corns of the Germans, nor have they on ours. Jealousies there may be, but nothing to lead to war.

It may not be uninteresting to glance at the relative expenditure on naval power by the great nations of the world, and to demonstrate how capable Great Britain is to continue what she has been doing. The British naval estimate for 1905 is $177,628,660.

The Russian estimate	$61,727,835
The German estimate	51,260,060
The French estimate	62,694,305
	$175,682,200

This shows that the British estimate is in round numbers about $2.000,000 more than that of the combined appropriations of Russia, Germany and France. The United States estimate is $84,120,290. The Japanese estimate, that wonderful country which has done so much with so little, is $11,774,520.

If we consider the mercantile marine, or ships of commerce, pouring food and other commodities into Great Britain, we can realize how her navy must be found on every sea, and not alone round the shores of Great Britain in the event of war, to give protection to 10,263,604 tons of commerce. To show the enormous tonnage of British commerce, we will compare it with that of other nations.

The mercantile marine of—

	Tons.
Russia	678,594
Germany	2,203,804
France	1,217,614
United States	888,776
Japan	979,423
Total of the five nations.	5,968.211

This shows that the mercantile tonnage of Great Britain is 4,295,393 tons more than that of the five largest commercial nations of the world, which necessitates, in case of war, British ships of war being on every sea and ocean.

I will conclude by reading a letter which lately appeared in a British Columbia newspaper :

The Naval Programme.

Sir,—The intrepid old navigators, Vancouver and Cook, sailing along the great Pacific, adding knowledge and discovery to the geography of the world and extending the possessions of Great Britain, would stand aghast if they knew of the changed, un-British policy about to be carried out with respect to the vast imperial possessions in North America, with which I more particularly deal now, choosing to allow Australia and other colonies to present their own ideas. Blood and money poured out to explore, acquire and conquer, great care taken in affording protection, and a friendly interest kept alive, which created and stimulated a grateful, loyal sentiment between the mother country and her colonial subjects. At one fell swoop all this previous policy of building up an empire over-sea, is to be forsaken for a parsimonious and contracted one, smacking of retaliation, as the Dominion does not contribute directly to the naval expenditure of the empire. Admiral Colomb, Lord Brassey and other prominent men, have spoken strongly as to the duty of Canada to contribute to imperial defence. The evil effect of such a policy—if instigated only partly on retaliatory, parsimonious grounds—will be much more far-reaching than the British government seem to foresee ; and like many other acts of our administrators, the mistake will be realized when too late. Alienate the feelings of the people, deprive them of the sense of British interests in their affairs, and feelings other than respectful loyalty will spring up.

If obsolete ships are recalled from distant stations to be replaced by modern ships, very good. If recalled for the more efficient drill of men and officers, such a reason will not stand the test of common sense. Officers and men fresh from the latest drills in England are being sent at short intervals to distant naval stations, and must be as expert in their various duties as officers and men in the English Channel.

If showing the flag periodically in different parts of the world is to be the new programme, it will be a waste of fuel with no good results. A squadron comes into Halifax or Esquimalt to-day, shows the flag, takes coal and water, sails to-morrow—soon afterwards an Indian rising, or an important labour trouble takes place—where are the ships of war which might be useful on such occasions ? One thousand miles or more away. This will apply equally to British commercial interests from Esquimalt to Chili.

Great Britain and her rulers must remember that Canada is part of the empire, by the will of Great Britain in her policy of conquest, and not by the will or policy of the colonists, and as far as I know, never asked for ships of war or troops ; although I fully and freely admit that such evidences of power have served a good purpose. Troops have been sent to Canada from time to time as a change from overcrowded baracks at home, and as a reserve for removal to other parts of the empire, and to take the place of troops who have been three years in hot and unhealthy countries. If we take the conditions in British Columbia we find that for sixty years ships of war visited and remained on our shores when the white population did not number 100 souls. Why was this? Because it was a British dependency and British interests were centred in the Hudson Bay Company. Not only in a British posession was this done, but wherever Britishers and British commerce were established from Cape Horn to Alaska periodical visits of ships of war were made. If this was done with good results in those early days, how much more necessary that such a binding and friendly policy should be continued without diminution for all time ?

JOHN BULL.

Now I may say this much : we know that England lavishes on India large sums of money. Troops go out continually, and India gives considerable trouble to the mother country and does not contribute one farthing towards the British navy. Our Dominion is worth to England five times as much as India is. In this country Britishers can form British homes. In India they cannot do that. This is an outlet for the surplus population of Great Britain and in that way it ought to be her duty to protect this country at any cost. As I say, Canada is an outlet for her people, and in India that is not the case. The hon. gentleman from Halifax speaks of the strategical importance of Vancouver and Nanaimo, and comparing them with Esquimalt made a great mistake. The entrance to Vancouver is at the back door, but the front entrance is Esquimalt, where the ships of other nations would come up. It forms a barrier not only in case of war, but in case of gales of winds it breaks the gale and keeps away the cold wind, and while Esquimalt is fortified, there is a place half way between Vancouver and the mainland, the Seymour Narrows, which ought to be fortified and that would close the back door.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Are not the Straits of Fuca so wide that cruisers could pass up ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I suppose they could pass up.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—I wish to make a few remarks in regard to this matter, inasmuch as I come from the same town that the hon. gentleman who introduced this subject represents, of which I have the honour of being a citizen, and also because it is a matter that sentimentally and perhaps financially interests nearly every citizen of that town. I say financially, because, as he has already told us, there is a great deal of money expended in Halifax, in the support of the sailors and soldiers who have frequented it for the last one hundred and fifty years. In fact, the navy has been considered an institution in Halifax that has taken part in its social life and in its financial nature too from time immemorial almost, as far as the town is concerned. Hence you can understand the dismay which this movement of the English government has caused. I do not think anything need be said as to the importance of Halifax as a naval station. We know that Halifax as a harbour is peerless. It is second to none in the world. I am supported in this statement and in these opinions by conversations I have had with admirals and navy men the last seven or eight years, whose opinions I suppose are reliable in every respect. Indeed, in this regard I might say that so conversant are the admiralty and the naval officers with Halifax as a naval station, with its merits and demerits, that we can hardly suppose, and it seems strange to us, that they should ever think of abandoning it as a station, but, on the other hand, I have no doubt that we are influenced in our opinions more or less by sentimental and personal feelings; that is, we have been benefited both socially and financially, as I have already remarked, by the navy frequenting the port of Halifax. In fact the navy there in many ways is an institution socially and a great many of our most desirable citizens regret intensely the withdrawal of the navy. But while we consider and feel in this way about it, we know at the same time—we cannot but admit—that probably the admiral who had charge of this innovation, if we may call it so, understood his business too, and I am not quite sure that maybe we may be assuming a little too much when we from our port in Halifax or even from Esquimalt undertake to dictate to the admiralty or to say to them that they have not done right or that they have been wrong, or to instruct them as to what they ought to do. I say this with all respect. It is not in a criticising way, but is it a matter that we have very much to do with in the Senate? I am afraid really we may be intruding upon ground we have no right to trespass upon. There is no doubt many others here have a great deal of nautical knowledge and are able seamen, so to speak, but have we a right to say to Admiral Fisher: 'You do not know your business. And in the interests of the empire you have been making a great mistake and we differ from you and we take the responsibility of telling you and the British government that you have not been doing what you should.' Mr. Fisher, is not very amenable to dictation from anybody and he might say: 'Well, is it your business?'

Hon. Mr. POWER—We give our opinion for what it is worth.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—I am quite with you. I would be quite willing to give my opinion, but I want to know how it is going to affect him or affect the government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It will not affect them at all.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—And he may say, naturally, 'Have you ever done anything to support the navy of England? What have you contributed towards the support of that navy?' We all know that it is a matter that has been agitated for several years past that Canada, receiving so much on account of the navy, having been beneficiary to such an enormous extent in protecting her commerce and in protecting her coasts and giving her prestige from one end of the world to the other, our government should have done something, be it ever so little, towards supporting the British navy, but the consensus of opinion in Canada was entirely opposed to any such idea. Is that not so? They scouted the idea of Canada supporting the British navy to the slightest extent. I say in the face of that fact it seems to me—although I do not want to criticise at all—that it is a matter in which we might legitimately put ourselves in the face of a very considerable snub from the British government. Had we done anything to support the fleet, had we any interest in it, the case might be different, but when this is a matter entirely and solely in the hands of the British government, to criticise or question their policy in this regard, I am afraid might expose us to a retort that we might not feel very flattered about. That is only my view, and I may be entirely astray. I know the hon. gentleman from Halifax has given this matter a good deal of thought, and I was very much interested in the remarks he made, but still it struck me—and I like to be cautious in these affairs—that we might run the risk of being told to just attend to our own business. That may be a rough way of expressing it. However, that is the way I would look at it. If the taking away of the fleet would do anything to interfere with the imperialism of which the hon. gentleman spoke, or tend to sever the relations between Canada and the empire, no one would regret that more than I would, and I believe that would be the feeling of the whole Senate. Any policy, or anything done to sever those relations, would be, to my mind, a calamity, but I do not think that that was in the mind of Admiral Fisher when he recommended these changes. Admiral Fisher was on the West India station for some years. I had the pleasure of meeting him—in fact on many occasions—and he struck me as one of the ablest men in the fleet. Of course, I could not say that myself, but he certainly was one of the ablest men that I have met, and he is a progressive man and doubtless he knows more about the changes that are necessary for the protection of the empire and for the proper disposition of the ships than we do. I think we will all concede that, and he is a man who is growing with the times. There is no question that the condition of matters is changing. The ships of to-day are immensely different in construction, in character and in speed to what they were even twenty years ago, and many people who have studied these matters think ships should be held in such a position that they will reach the furthest part of the empire in the shortest possible time. It was found, so I have understood, that holding a permanent squadron at Halifax did not meet that view. There is a sort of flying squadron that has to be stationed at certain places, and that squadron is, I believe, six weeks in Halifax during the summer. I regret exceedingly, I repeat, from sentimental and financial reasons, that the change has been made, but all the same I would not undertake to question the advisability of the policy of the British government, acting through its Admiralty. It seems to me that we are rather trenching on rights that are not exactly our own.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I do not intend to detain the House long upon this subject which has been threshed out pretty well, but in the face of the enormous tax to which England is subjected per capita for the support of the army and navy and the exceedingly light sum that is paid by Canada for that purpose, it is not much wonder that England concluded to withdraw her forces from the Atlantic and the Pacific and leave Canada to contribute out of her own overflowing treasury the sum necessary to equip those ports. It would have been preferable had England seen her way to maintain the forts where they were until such times as Canada had completed very desirable and important undertakings which are going to cost a very large amount of money, such as the Grand Trunk Pacific, which undoubtedly will be in the interests of the empire and will prove unquestionably a great advantage when it is completed. The Canadian Pacific Railway has rendered admirable service, but we hope in the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific that we will have a line removed from the source of danger that possibly may exist as far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned. The per capita tax of England is something in the neighbourhood of $8.70 for the army and navy. She only keeps some 275,000 of a standing army. France keeps a standing army of 600,000 and her tax is $7.80, Germany, 500,000 and her per capita tax is $6.50. The United States, a new country like Canada, is just beginning to lay the foundation of a navy and her per capita tax for army and navy was $2.35 a head, while the per capita tax in Canada about 60 cents a head. We can hardly expect that England from year to year will continue imposing upon her people taxation to the extent of $8.70 for army and navy and let Canada off with 60 cents a head. I regret very much that England has not seen her way clear to leave those forces in Canada until we had completed the undertakings which are under way. After that period I think England could have very well asked Canada to contribute in a very substantial way, either to the support of the navy of England, or else form the nucleus of a navy for ourselves. We do not run much risk of any nation attacking us, except perhaps our friends across the border, but there is a treaty in existence with them which provides that no ship carrying guns shall be allowed on any of the inland waters which separate us from the United States. The United States are making a move to build a ship canal through the State of New York which, when completed—but it will take many years to complete it—will carry to the lakes very formidably equipped vessels of war, but that is something in the future. In the meantime we are safe so far as that is concerned. I am not disposed to find fault with the course the government has taken. England decided we should be on our own resources in this matter, and that we should undertake the duty of equipping the ports on the Atlantic and Pacific. I have no doubt the government will exercise prudence in the undertaking and I hope it will not for a moment tend to weaken the tie of affection and relationship that exists between us and the mother country. We all appreciate British connection. I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman from Halifax speak so loyally in that way. I believe it is a feeling that exists from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We want to maintain that connection; we enjoy great benefits under it. We are not quite satisfied with the way England has treated us always. I may have to refer to that matter to-morrow, but will not to-day. On the whole, we should like to see the connection that now exists perpetuated. We want Canada to remain under the British flag, and true to British institutions and loyal to the Crown. I am sure we all appreciate the existing connection and want to perpetuate it. At the same time, we cannot find fault with England under the conditions that now exist with regard to taxation, either in asking Canada to do something for herself, or else withdrawing the equipment she has had in this country and saving the expense in view of the enormous taxation to which her people are subjected.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether there is any correspondence of the character indicated in this motion. If my recollection serves me right, a short time ago when the question was put to the Secretary of State as to the existence of such papers, and asking if he could give any information, he answered that they knew nothing about it, that they had no intimation from the Colonial Office or the War Department of England as to their intention in reference to the removal of the force from Halifax. Am I correct?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I could not define at the moment what papers there are. There has been some correspondence, of course, but whether in the direction indicated by some of the addresses, I am not able to say. Whatever papers there are will be brought down. The House has listened with great interest and some advantage to the able addresses of my hon. friend from Halifax and the hon. gentleman from Victoria, and at that stage of it I was disposed to say that I thought those addresses, if published in the right papers and sent to the British Admiralty and to representative men in the British House of Commons, might be of some value. But when the other hon. members addressed the House they rather became apologists for the imperial policy, so that I am inclined to think the value of the first addresses would be entirely lost, because I do not myself at all recognize that the motive in having a naval station at Halifax or at Esquimalt had any thing to do with the interests of Canada. Canada was not in view at all any more than in the establishment of a naval station at Bermuda. No one will contend that there was any object in spending a large amount of money at Bermuda other than as affording a valuable naval station. That was the idea with regard to Halifax and Esquimalt. It was not in the interest of Canada. There was no such British policy as that. The British troops were removed from Canada nearly forty years ago. Those that were left at Halifax were a sort of remnant, but the main expenditure was the naval expenditure and that was done in the general interests of the policy that prevailed in Great Britain of having valuable, important and impregnable stations in different parts of the world. So that I did not consider it called for any policy, because Canada had not contributed to the navy. Canada has done her share towards building up the British empire, and we are building it in the right direction, not by the payment of a million or two of money into the British Exchequer, but in building up on the northern half of the continent a population that will be in the future, when Great Britain requires it, a stay and support to the empire. When Canada will have the population, which she will have, certainly not in our time, but in the future—I am not exaggerating when I say Canada will have a population of 50,000,000—will she not then be a prop and support to the empire ? Will it not be important that Canada shall be a power on the northern part of the continent ? We will then have fleets on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. We are a growing people. This is not the time to subscribe. Great Britain does not require us to do it, but she will require it in the future. I did not propose to speak like this, but when I got on my feet I had to say something after the apologetic remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax and the hon. gentleman from Wellington, because I do not at all subscribe to what they say and do not share their views. I think the hon. gentleman from Halifax and the hon. gentleman from Victoria, echoed the views and opinions of a large majority of the people of this country, and that is the sentiment that prevails. They gave a true version of the feelings of the people of this country. Perhaps it is not exactly my place at the present moment to foreshadow what ought to be our policy. I am not in a position to do it. I am glad to say that we will be pleased to lay before the House whatever correspondence has passed between the imperial government and the Canadian government in reference to the motion moved by my hon. friend.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not my intention to pursue this debate further than to express my own view as to the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I think the Senate is indebted to him for the manner in which he has treated it, though probably there is scarcely any of us who would not differ from him on some important point. My own personal knowledge of the country leads me to think there is necessity for keeping up a naval force at Esquimalt and to differ entirely from the view expressed by the hon. gentleman. It is just as much in the interests of Canada that that station should be maintained as the station in Halifax. My principal object in rising was to say that I differ in toto from my hon. friend, the junior member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. MacKeen) as to the course which Canada and her public men should take upon questions of this kind. Being an integral part of the empire, I take it, that every British subject has not only the right, but it is his duty, to express his opinion upon Imperial policy, particularly when it affects the colonies. The sooner Canada speaks, and speaks out boldly, upon questions of this kind, the better for ourselves and for the empire. It is just as well that the statesmen in England should know what the opinion of the people in this portion of the empire is upon any policy which they may adopt, particularly when it affects the defences of the country. This is an important subject upon which every senator, I have no doubt, could speak for an hour at least. It is highly important to Canada that we should know precisely what the policy of England is, and it seems to me it is equally important for the people in England to know what our views are upon questions which affect either our defences or our commercial or political relations with the mother country. I do not think it would do any harm if we should express our opinions freely. It is true we may be wrong. My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax may be right in the view he has taken. I express no opinion upon the policy of England on that question, for the simple reason that I have not given the matter sufficient attention, and even if I had I have not that nautical knowledge or knowledge of warfare that one should have to discuss this question intelligently. Some of the remarks of the hon. senator for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) and the deductions he drew from the policy of England, I do not agree with, but taking it as a whole, I think the Senate and the country are indebted to the hon. gentleman for the study he has given this question and the manner in which he has placed it before the House. I echo the sentiments of the hon. gentleman from Wellington, though I take exception to one or two expressions that he used, but as we cannot all agree upon details, I think we can all agree upon one point, and that is that as an integral part of the empire we have a right, and it is our duty to express our opinions on all occasions upon the policy of England whenever it affects our interests.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has said to my junior colleague what I had proposed to say, and he has said it better than I should have done. So I shall not say anything directly to the hon. gentleman from Halifax, but I wish to say this: The hon. gentleman seemed to think that it was very presumptuous of us to undertake to express an opinion as to the action of the Lords of the Admiralty in England. Now, if the action of the Lords of the Admiralty had been a consistent action, if their recent action had been taken with due deliberation and after careful consideration, there would be a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman said; but, as a matter of fact, the Lords of the Admiralty for one hundred and fifty years persistently held to the policy which has just been altered. Were the Lords of the Admiralty for one hundred and fifty years right or were they wrong; and is the First Sea Lord of the Admiralty wiser, not only than all his predecessors as sea lords, but than other admirals of to-day, who do not look upon the question as he does? I think my hon. friend will find that his argument goes rather too far. I mentioned one circumstance which showed that this action had apparently been taken without due deliberation. That is that Admiral Bosanquet, when he left Halifax at the beginning of November, did not know that the dockyard was to be closed before his return; and it was stated in Halifax that when the furniture in Admiralty House was being auctioned the Admiral sent a cable to stop the sale, and the sale was continued under instructions which came directly from England. Perhaps my hon. friend thinks that that indicated a great deal of wisdom and savoir faire. I look at it differently. There is another circumstance. I saw in the newspapers a few days ago that the wires and other apparatus for setting submarine mines in Esquimalt harbour, which are absolutely necessary if the defences are to be kept up, had been removed and put on board a ship and sent to Hong Kong. I know that at St. Lucia the War Department have been carrying on extensive works in the way of fortification and have got large guns there; and, having the forts completed or nearly so, they have decided not to finish them, not to mount the guns. The War Department spent several thousand pounds on a new fort at the entrance of Halifax harbour and imported the heaviest kind of guns. They have brought the guns down from Halifax and put them close to where they were to be mounted, and then decided not to put the guns in the fort. If my hon. friend asks us to draw lessons of wisdom and prudence from men who do that sort of thing, I think he is sending us to a bad market for wisdom.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—My object was to inquire whether we had the right to interfere.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are not interfering, we are expressing our opinion.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—My hon. friend the leader of the opposition says we have a right to interfere, not only in the policy of Great Britain, its defences and all that, but also in the expenditure of money that is paid by the English taxpayer. It has been contended here that $3,000,000 has been spent annually to maintain naval stations in Canada at Esquimalt and Halifax, and an attempt has been made to show what an immense loss the stoppage of that expenditure will be to Canada, incidentally claiming that we were entitled to that money, and that the navy should not be removed on that account. That was what I gathered from the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I did not say a word about the money question at all.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—Then I am a little mixed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, decidedly mixed.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—The remark came from the hon. gentleman from Halifax. He said we were losing an annual expenditure of $3,000,000, and that was one of the reasons why we should take exception to the policy of the British admiralty, as though we were entitled to the money. Now I claim we have nothing to do with the English revenue and expenditure. I am free to say that I am in full sympathy with the hon. gentleman from Halifax that the removal of the naval station from Halifax will be a loss to us not only financially but also sentimentally and socially. We all regret it, but I fail to see how we can take the matter up and make such representations to the British government as will change the policy of the Lords of the Admiralty. In my opinion it would not do very much good.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE IN ENGLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved :

That the Senate of Canada deems it its duty to put on record its deep disappointment and regret at the course adopted by the British government in continuing the embargo on Canadian cattle, in face of the established fact that neither pleuro-pneumonia nor any other contagious disease exists in Canadian herds, and in view of the stringent regulations enforced by Canada, in regard to stock imported from other countries.

That the British government, by the course they are persisting in, are unjustly discrediting the standing of Canadian herds throughout the world ; and

That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the honourable the President of the Board of Agriculture and to the Right Honourable the premier of England.

He said : In rising to bring before the House the resolution of which I have given notice, I ask the indulgence of the House while I present some reasons why I think it should be adopted by this chamber. The embargo upon our cattle was first introduced in 1892. It was then imposed by the Board of Agriculture of England. After it had been imposed by them, a period of investigation was continued for some four years, and in 1896, by a statutory enactment, it was made permanent. The reason given for shutting out our cattle from the herds in England was that our stock was supposed to be diseased, or that contagious diseases existed amongst Canadian herds. That was the charge made. There were some animals that had been shipped home from Canada that were subjected to investigation, and in one or two instances they were supposed to have been afflicted with pleuro-pneumonia; but after a thorough and exhaustive investigation it was clearly shown that the animals were sound, and, in addition to that, it has been pretty well proven by veterinaries in this country, as well as veterinaries in England who visited Canada, that pleuro-pneumonia never did exist among our herds—at least not for fifty years.

It has existed in the United States, but they have got pretty well rid of it, no case of pleuro-pneumonia having been found there in the last twelve years. Very great care is taken, in the importation of cattle into Canada, to see that they are thoroughly disinfected before they are admitted. That regulation applies to cattle imported from England as well as to cattle imported from the United States. The object is to preserve the health of our herds. There has been a good deal of discussion in England with regard to this question, and I know that our Minister of Agriculture has made efforts to secure the removal of the stigma that has been fastened on Canadian cattle by the English law. That law is a slur upon us to which we should not be subjected. We should express in very strong terms our resentment. It is unjust to Canada to stigmatize our herds as being so diseased that they cannot be admitted into England and allowed to mix with the English herds. It has never been established that pleuro-pneumonia, or any other contagious disease, exists in Canada. If the imperial parliament wish to pass a law to protect the meat producers of their country, let them do so honestly and we have no objection, but what we do protest against is that our cattle should be stigmatized as unhealthy when it is not a fact. Many years ago John Bright said in one of his speeches that protection might be introduced into England in the future by using the plausible argument that protection should be afforded to the home producer of beef by preventing the admission of foreign cattle on the ground that they were subject to disease. This very thing has happened, and Canadian cattle are stigmatized as being diseased when there is no basis for the stigma. If the enactment was based on reasonable, honest grounds there could be no objection to it, but based as it is on the ground that contagious diseases exist in this country, it is a gross injustice to Canada, and not only the government but both Houses of this parliament by resolution should call upon England to repeal the Act. Every agricultural society from the Atlantic to the Pacific and all patriotic men should use every influence to bring England to understand that we feel the injustice that has been done us, and that the unjust law ought to be repealed. If the British parliament choose to pass another law for the purpose of protecting the British beef producers we have no objection.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But they should call it by the right name.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Yes, if they call it by the right name we can have no objection to any law that they consider necessary for the protection of their own trade.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Do the cattle of any other countries go into England ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Yes, there are some ; I am not exactly certain what countries they are ; but that is not the point I am making. My resolution is to the effect that England has enacted a law on the basis that Canadian herds are diseased, and on that assumption and that alone our cattle are shut out of the English market.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the Act mention Canada ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The Board of Agriculture frequently mentioned Canada between 1892 and 1896 and said that Canadian cattle should be excluded because they were subject to contagious diseases. Lord Onslow, president of the Board of Agriculture, admits that there has been no contagious diseases in the Canadian herds, but does he expect us to take the word of one man and remain content with that while a law remains on the statute-book of England stigmatizing Canadian cattle as subject to contagious diseases ? We cannot accept that as a sufficient reply—we decline to accept it. The Act on the statute-book of England has done and is doing us a gross injustice, and we ask for its repeal. Lord Onslow admits that the Act is retained because its repeal would dislocate trade in England. If so, why not repeal the Act and pass another law giving that as the reason—that it would so dislocate and disturb the meat trade in England that it would be injurious to English interests ? If they are willing to do that, Canada will accept willingly such legislation, but we object to having our cattle stigmatized as diseased when it is not the fact.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Let them call it protection if they like.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They can call it anything they please. In Scotland there is a strong feeling in favour of removing the embargo. The agriculturists of Scotland have held meeting after meeting and discussed this question, and admit that an injustice has been done to Canada. One of the best veterinaries in Scotland, who acted as veterinary for Perthshire for many years, has declared over his own signature, in a report that he has issued, that he has visited Canada frequently and found Canadian herds free from contagious diseases. He has declared over his own signature that he has closely scrutinized the cattle landed at the port of Glasgow for many years and that up to 1904 he had never discovered one single instance of a Canadian animal being diseased, that he had visited Canada on several occasions, went through our herds, travelled from one end of the country to the other and returned, and that it has been his privilege to closely criticise the arrivals of animals at Glasgow, and he had never discovered one single instance of an animal being afflicted with contagious disease. That is the certificate of that gentleman to the city board of Glasgow which controls and manages the imports and exports. There was one case in 1892 where a cow had been shipped from Canada to Scotland. She was landed at the port of Glasgow and that cow was declared by a veterinary there to be afflicted with pleuro-pneumonia, but after a close and careful investigation it was shown that the diagnosis was wrong, that it was a mistake on the part of the veterinary. We all know that animals crossing the Atlantic are subjected to such experiences that it can hardly be expected when they arrive at the other side they will be in the same condition as when taken out of the pastures or stalls in Canada to be shipped. The trip across the Atlantic unquestionably causes such a disturbance that they may show some little evidences of irritation which might cause some query on the part of an investigating veterinary, but after all, in this case it was proven on a thorough investigation that no grounds for the charge existed. Since that time over 1,500,000 cattle have been exported from this country and landed at the different ports in England, and there has not been one single instance proven that pleuro-pneumonia or any other contagious disease existed among those cattle. It is also admitted, I see by the records—because I have run over them and have closely investigated the reports issued by different veterinaries in the old country—that no other country shipping cattle to England has a record like that of Canada for the purity of its herds. Now, in the face of that condition, certified to by veterinaries of England, why is it that England will persist in keeping in operation an Act based upon falsehood, upon an erroneous basis, charging our herds with impurity when nothing of the kind exists ? If it has been imposed for the purpose of protecting their herds from contamination and from becoming diseased by coming in contact with Canadian herds, I should like to ask why England does not shut out of her country the hundreds of tons of hay and the millions of pounds of hides and wool and hair—all those things are just as liable to carry contagious diseases as the cattle themselves ? Why does she not exclude them as well as the cattle if she is so anxious to keep her stock pure ? When she shuts out the cattle, the raw material of the farmer, why not shut out wool also ? Why not shut out hair, hay and hides ? A report of a veterinary surgeon of the Glasgow corporation in 1901, in regard to tuberculosis in that year, shows that 46,784 head of home cattle were slaughtered in Glasgow, of which 6,332, or 13½ per cent, were affected with tuberculosis. They received from Canada and the United States during the same time 49,881 head. Of this number only 66 head, under 1 per cent, were affected with tuberculosis—in fact, one out of every seven hundred and fifty-six cattle, while there were 13⅓ out of every hundred of their own.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does it point out whether those cattle that had the one per cent were from the United States or Canada?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The document I am quoting from just give the figures I am stating. It does not separate those received from the United States and those received from Canada. It simply gave the total from Canada and the United States as 49,881 head.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is unfortunate it should be so, because if my recollection serves me right, those that were found to be at all tainted were from the United States.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This is a report by a veterinary surgeon in Glasgow. It is not one of our own men. This is a report that he has furnished to the city corporation of Glasgow of what he discovered in the inspection of animals landed at that port. The Liverpool Chamber of Commerce as late as 1904 declared that the embargo was unjust to Canada and tended to increase the cost of meat to the English consumer. As I stated before, the embargo was not permanent until 1896, and it was made so solely on the ground of disease existing in Canadian herds. Now, I admit, and I am proud to be able to state, that the government offered inducements to England to send their veterinaries out here to go through the herds of Canadian cattle and make a thorough inspection, that they were willing to pay the cost of all slaughtering and all travelling expenses if they would send out trusted, experienced veterinaries, and thoroughly examine our stock in order to prove that there was nothing wrong in our herds. But England declined to accept that offer. In 1893 there were over $200,000 lost in shipments of 30,000 head of cattle, and the loss was due to the cattle not being properly fatted. That was the year immediately after the embargo was imposed. The people in the west and the people in Canada had not become aware of the existence of the embargo. In the Northwest they had a very large number of cattle that they had to export that year. Many of them were thin, but they were forced to send them over. The result was that they lost enormously by doing so, because they had to be slaughtered at the port of entry. James Clarke, chief veterinary surgeon, inspector of Perthshire, Scotland, had an extensive experience, from the very commencement of the trade down to 1904. He certifies in his report issued on the subject in February, 1904, that he never met one case of contagious disease in Canadian cattle. The estimated loss in the export of Canadian cattle from 1897 to 1904, is over $12,000,000, owing to the existence of that embargo. I notice that Lord Onslow quoted a resolution of cattlemen in Winnipeg against the removal of the embargo. It appears that some fifteen or twenty ranchers met in Winnipeg some years ago and passed a resolution in favour of the embargo. We can easily understand that. Those people are anxious to get their raw material as cheap as they possibly can. They want to get young cows and steers from Ontario and the United States. I presume, at the lowest possible price, in order to fatten those cattle and send them home in a finished condition. The embargo happens to suit that section of the country, perhaps fully as well as in England. But while it might suit those particular ranchers in the west, it by no means suits the rest of Canada, although I admit, perhaps, on the whole, that it is much better for our farmers that they should finish their cattle and send them home in a finished condition; but what an advantage it would be if the farmers in England and Scotland were permitted to take these cattle and improve them, by resting and feeding them thoroughly, giving them a chance to recuperate after the hard experience they have in crossing the Atlantic. The cattle would very rapidly improve and become worth more money if they were only allowed to do that.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Was that a meeting of the ranchers or cattle dealers of Winnipeg to which the hon. gentleman has referred ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Cattle dealers of Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It might be so. I did not notice which it was, but I noticed there were about twenty that met.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They were all cattle dealers.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Yes, it was a resolution of cattlemen of Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Cattle buyers.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It certainly was not the ranchers.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Lord Onslow imposed an embargo on United States cattle coming into Great Britain owing to the existence of foot and mouth disease in New England, and when the United States showed that it was stamped out the embargo was removed. Now, in the case of Canada there has never been any just ground for the embargo. It was wrong. It was false. It was unjust at the start. We have proved that the alleged cause does not exist. Why not treat us as well as they treat Uncle Sam across the border ? When they took the embargo off the cattle from the United States, on proof that foot and mouth disease was stamped out there, why did they not do the same with Canada ? Why don't they permit Canada, when she has such a thoroughly clean bill of health, to ship her cattle home ? I do not know exactly what the Minister of Agriculture has done. I believe he has been endeavouring to get this Act repealed, or amended in some way, but I do say this, we have not heard enough of it in Canada. There should have been a resolution before this House and before the Commons years ago expressing in the most pointed terms their views of the action of England in regard to the matter. There should have been resolutions by every local legislature in this Dominion calling upon England in the loudest and most pointed terms to rescind that Act, and every agricultural society throughout the country should also have been asked to pass resolutions to the same effect. Let those resolutions appear in the papers and show that Canada is in earnest and determined not to live under an unjust stigma, and I believe that England would wake up. It is hard to wake her, I admit, and I do not believe it is in the power of any one man, Minister of Agriculture, or any one else to do so in a matter of this kind. It requires united action on the part of the people of this country and their different organizations both in parliament and the local houses and all gatherings of agriculturalists. Had such action been taken, I believe it would have succeeded before this. I am not blaming the Minister of Agriculture. He may think differently from me. He may fancy that is the wrong way. I think it would be the right way and the sooner we let England understand that we feel the injustice, the better for both England and Canada. We have patiently borne many things at the hands of England which absolutely and unquestionably test our loyalty. I was glad to hear my hon. friend speak so loudly and loyally yesterday with regard to the protection of our shores on the Atlantic and the Pacific. We have borne patiently and loyally many things that have taken place. We see evidences from the Atlantic to the Pacific that injustice has been done in giving away territory which should by right belong to Canada. The state of Maine and the state of Michigan should belong to Canada. We have borne many such injustices and the last, not the least, from Lord Alverston, and still you find in Canada an expression of loyalty to England, and an appreciation of the empire to which we belong, but allow me to say this: that the name of Lord Alverston, for the course he took with reference to the Alaska boundary, will be as offensive in the memory of Canada for years to come as the name of Monteith was offensive in the memory of the people of Scotland after his dastardly betrayal and the murder of Sir Wm. Wallace. Monteith's conduct was no more unjust and unfair to Scotland than Alverston's to Canada in connection with that boundary award.

I feel a little warm on this question, not altogether because I am personally interested, but on account of the agriculturists of our country. I feel that they have been unjustly treated and that no stone should be left unturned to remedy that injustice. Get that Act repealed and let it be no longer said to the world that our Canadian herds are diseased. The idea of the head of the empire publishing to the world that they are obliged to shut out our cattle on account of disease, when we have the purest herds known in any country. No effort should be spared to secure the repeal of that Act. The Minister of Agriculture should give the imperial authorities no peace; and parliament should assist in securing the repeal of that Act, and the removal of a stigma upon our herds to which they should never have been subjected.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I hope in rising to make a few remarks on the question now before the House that I shall not be regarded as antagonistic in any way to the great agricultural interests of Canada. I am myself a farmer and stock grower. Not only is that the case, but I am one of those who sympathize very strongly with everything which pertains to the benefit and advancement of the agricultural interests of Canada. Further, I will say that in offering some remarks in a measure against the resolution, I want it thoroughly understood that I am not opposed, but that, on the contrary, I am favourable to doing everything which can be legitimately done in the direction my hon. friend has suggested. But in presenting any case it should be presented fairly, and while I do not say for a moment that my hon. friend has suggested anything unfair from his standpoint, yet I am sorry to say that in some respects at least his premises are wrong. Now what are the conditions? In England for many years animals have not been admitted from foreign countries otherwise than to be slaughtered within a few hours after their arrival in a British port. Canada for several years enjoyed the advantage of being exempt from that regulation and was the only country thus exempted. The cattle of the United States and of all other countries, except Canada, were slaughtered in a short time after being landed. A shipment of United States cattle passing through Canada some years ago were found to have among their number a case of pleuro-pneumonia and the result of that discovery was that Canada was placed in exactly the same position as other countries. Ever since that time an effort has been made to regain for Canada its former position in this respect. The Ministers of Agriculture have done everything in their power with that object in view. The Canadian people certainly desire, and I for one would be very glad to see it brought about, and thus be enabled to sell my cattle in England. I admit my hon. friend's argument that the agriculturists of England and chiefly the growers of stockers in Ireland, are opposing the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle from purely protective motives. The Scotch farmers, who formerly enjoyed the privilege of importing stockers from Canada and are now debarred from that right, are pressing very strongly for the free importation of Canadian cattle. I have read a good many of the arguments which have taken place with regard to this matter in Great Britain, and the premises taken by England are as follow: England claims that she is now and must always continue to be dependent on other countries for her food supply, that it would be dangerous to vacillate in her policy and change it from time to time, and that she must, for her own safety, confine herself to the rigid policy of requiring all cattle imported from foreign countries to be slaughtered within a short time after they are landed. The argument used by my hon. friend with regard to the importation of hair, wool and hides is perfectly correct. There is danger of introducing disease with these articles, but while I am not apologizing for one moment for Great Britain, I cannot see how she can do otherwise than import these articles and she must take some means of disinfecting them. A further argument used by Great Britain with regard to the importation of Canadian cattle is this, that Canada is contiguous to the United States for some 4,000 miles, and that there is a free interchange of cattle between the two countries, and there again England claims there is a source of danger. My hon. friend makes a mistake in this respect when he said that a year or two ago foot and mouth disease broke out in the eastern States, and that England discriminated in favour of the United States, because that embargo was removed. England absolutely will not import animals from any country where foot and mouth disease prevails, and if Canadian cattle were suffering from foot and mouth disease to-day, their importation would be prohibited even under the regulation requiring that they be slaughtered a few hours after they are landed; but if the disease became extinct the cattle would again be admitted. So there is no discrimination against Canada, no declaration against Canada, no stigma suggested, insinuated or stated in any way as against Canada. It is simply this, that Canada is to-day in the position of other countries and not enjoying the latitude allowed her some years ago. While I myself am favourable to doing everything we can legitimately to restore Canada to its former position, I think the resolution in its present form would not be exactly a desirable one to send to Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the English Act of parliament refer to Canada specially ?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—No, it is simply a law which has existed for many years. For a time Canada was exempted specially from its operation, and then afterwards was simply brought under the operation of the Act as other countries were.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Did not the Board of Agriculture, between 1892 and 1896, report from time to time that contagious diseases were discovered in Candian herds ?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—What the hon. gentleman says is perfectly true, and on thorough investigation it was found that it was that one single animal to which I have referred. Now, I do not take another position from my hon. friend's as to the condition of Canadian herds. They are undoubtedly among the healthiest in the world.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They are the purest.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—No, my hon. friend is wrong. The healthiest animals in the world are in the Channel Islands. Even tuberculosis has never been discovered in the herds of the Channel Islands. Tuberculosis does exist among the English herds to a far greater extent than it does in Canada, but that is not the disease that is being dealt with under the English Act. It applies to such diseases as pleuro-pneumonia and foot and mouth disease, which are very contagious and infectious. Tuberculosis is undoubtedly communicated from animal to animal, but that is not the disease that is being dealt with. I am not opposing my hon. friend's motives, which no doubt are good; he desires simply that which will be beneficial to Canada and especially to Canadian farmers. I am with him so far as that is concerned, but I should be glad to see his resolution amended to conform correctly to the conditions that exist.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was very well pleased when a few days ago I observed that the hon. gentleman from Wellington had placed this notice on the order paper. I confess, however, that it escaped my observation that it was coming up to-day. Otherwise I would have felt myself in a better position to discuss it. I may say in the outset that I am entirely in accord with the resolution. I may not altogether agree with some of the observations of my hon. friend. To some extent I agree with the hon. gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) that it is not reasonable or right for us to charge England with having singled out the herds of Canada, as my hon. friend from Wellington left the impression on this House, was the action of the British government. I was tolerably familiar with the history of this question many years ago, but I confess I have not kept myself as much in touch with it now as I did in those years, but I remember when Sir Charles Tupper was High Commissioner he had to put forward very strenuous efforts day in and day out, year in and year out, to prevent the rescinding of the regulation by the Board of Trade of England which gave free admission to Canadian cattle, a free admission which was not given to other countries at that time. That favour—for that is what we had to call it—we enjoyed on the ground that our cattle were free from infectious diseases. That was admitted. The English farmer and stock-raiser was not satisfied on account of the competition that our cattle were creating in England, and they set about to find some pretext by which this regulation of the Board of Trade should be set aside and the exemption to Canadian cattle done away with. I remember in these years Sir Charles Tupper had to put forth very strenuous efforts to fight down the efforts of the English stock-raisers and veterinaries in the direction that our cattle were not free from infectious diseases.

My hon. friend from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) reminds me that Sir Charles Tupper went personally on these occasions to Glasgow once and Liverpool on another occasion, and succeeded in defeating the efforts put forward to schedule our cattle. The British stock-raisers, and through them the Board of Trade of England, took the ground later that although our own cattle were tolerably free from disease, yet we were allowing too free admission of United States cattle into our country, and that our quarantine regulations were lax and that in consequence our cattle were liable to be mixed with United States cattle and that disease might be introduced into England in this way. The result was that the late government, before I had the honour of becoming a member of it, made very stringent quarantine regulations against the United States, sufficiently stringent to convince any person that was not prejudiced or interested in forming an opinion in another way that every effort that could possibly be made was made on the part of the Canadian government to prevent the introduction of pleuro-pneumonia or other infectious diseases into Canada from the United States. I remember that during these years we were attacked, and very persistently attacked, on the ground that we had not done enough, that notwithstanding the stringency of those regulations, we had not put forward as strenuous exertions as we should in the direction of enforcing those regulations and convincing the English government that we were living up to what we had done. However, all the efforts that I have mentioned were put forth, I contend that every possible effort was put forth in these years, and that the quarantine regulations against the importation of cattle from the United States were made more rigorous than otherwise would have been desirable, and at the time we made those regulations it was plain that the herds of the United States were almost as free from infection if not as free as our own were. I remember in 1895 that some difficulty was encountered in getting cargoes for steamers departing from the port of St. John, and some relaxation of our regulations with regard to the admission of United States cattle was made in that year in order to obtain cargoes from the United States to supplement those obtainable in Canada and to keep up the trade at our own winter port, and I remember when that was done a very strong attack was made on the government because of their action. I had the honour to represent the Minister of Agriculture that session, and had to defend the action of the government in taking that course, and I remember very well I took the ground that the cause stated by the British public and British government for enforcing that regulation against Canada was not the real ground on which they were acting, and that the herds of the United States were tolerably free, or as free almost as our own were from disease, and that we could not possibly have pleuro-pneumonia or contagious disease in Canada, for it was as impossible to have foot and mouth disease or pleuro-pneumonia and not know it, as it was to have cholera or small-pox prevailing in Canada and be unaware of the existence of those diseases. I remember in 1895 a case occurred where the England veterinaries found that some Canadian cattle landed in England from Canadian ports, and which were traced to Canadian herds, had pleuro-pneumonia. The Department of Agriculture in that year made the most strenuous efforts to investigate that matter. These animals were traced back to the herds from which they were taken, and it was found that neither before the shipment nor after they had been shipped, nor at any other time had there been any appearance of pleuro-pneumonia among the herds from which they came. They had been taken from a herd near Kingston, and the animals of that herd and of other herds in that vicinity were found to be in the most perfect condition of health. That was the state of things up to 1896. Since that time the government of this country have relaxed to a large extent its quarantine regulations against the United States and we obtained in consequence of that relaxation freer admission into the United States of our cattle, which has been beneficial to this country. I never criticised the conduct of the government at that time. I might have retaliated and said, 'you are acting very differently from your professions when you were attacking us because we had not made the very stringent regulations of those days still more stringent; now you are relaxing them,' but I found no fault and hon. gentlemen on this side have found no fault with regard to that, because our belief is that the herds of the United States are fairly free from infectious diseases and it will be time enough to impose very embarrassing quarantine regulations between the two countries when any practical difficulty arises to require it. I am ready and willing with the hon. gentleman from Russell, to exonerate the British government from the charge of having singled us out in any respect. If the hon. gentleman from Wellington was understood in that way, I do not agree with him. We were really treated for many years in a favourable way, and finally, when the interest of the English stock-raisers prevailed and the British government were forced to schedule our cattle as well as those of other countries, I believe to a great extent English public opinion regretted that any such thing as that had to be done; but nevertheless it was done, and the ground which was taken for scheduling our cattle by law was not the honest ground. That far I fully agree with my hon. friend. It was taken on the ground that our cattle were not free from infectious disease, that we had infection in our herds and having being put on that ground it was not put on an honest ground nor one which should commend itself to reasonable men. I looked over the resolution again after my hon. friend from Russell, for whose view I have very great respect, had expressed his dissent. I know he is not only interested in this question, but is one of the best informed agriculturalists in the country, but still after hearing his remarks and looking over the resolution, I find no great fault with it as it is framed. I am in entire sympathy with the object of the motion.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I am not interested in the cattle trade in any way, but it does strike me, nevertheless, after the observations of my hon. friend that the resolution is couched in very strong language. We propose to pass condemnation on the British government for a policy which has been sustained through several parliaments. The whole history of this legislation is full of interest. It goes back over twenty years, and there has been a growth of public opinion with regard to the question which no government in England could very well ignore. The policy which the government has pursued was adopted in the interest of the cattle-raisers of England. It has been sustained by the public opinion of England. The hon. gentleman was wrong, I think, in his statement that it is aimed specially against Canada. As I understand the matter, it is legislation passed against the whole world. It is against all imported cattle. There has been a great deal of correspondence on the subject and the government of Canada has undoubtedly held up the Canadian side of the discussion with vigour, constantly pressing what might be called the Canadian view of the question and remonstrating with the imperial government on this matter. But it must be remembered that it is the operation of a law made by the imperial parliament and enforced by the Board of Agriculture. When Sir William Mulock was home in 1902 some correspondence passed between him and Mr. Hanbury, who was at the head of the Board of Agriculture, or one of the principal officers. Mr. Hanbury says :

There is no question whatever between us about the existence of disease in Canada. I have more than once publicly stated we believe Canada to be free from disease among both herds and flocks. The exclusion of your store cattle is due not to any suspicion of disease, but to the fact that the Act of 1896 forbids the entry into this country (except for immediate slaughter at the wharfs) of all live sheep and cattle from all countries. There is therefore no reflection upon Canada as a cattle-producing country in the circumstance that the operation of the Act is general and indeed universal. But there is on the other hand a distinct recognition of the immunity of Canada from disease in the fact that Canada and the United States are the only two countries from which fat cattle can be landed for slaughter at the wharfs, and their exceptional position is due to the admitted freedom of both from disease. The Act of 1896 does not therefore imply that Canada is not free from disease, while the existing regulations as to fat cattle distinctly declare our belief that disease does not exist there.

The Act of 1896 was certainly not passed with any special reference to Canadian store cattle. For several years the feeling had been growing that in the interest of the consumer no less than in justice to the farmer every reasonable precaution must be taken to prevent the spread of disease among the flocks and herds of this country. The danger of the importation of disease is very great when store cattle are allowed to be shipped to this country and travel to every corner of it. The examination at the port of entry must necessarily afford a very inadequate security, partly on account of the large numbers to be examined, but mainly because the disease often remains latent for a period much longer than that of the voyage, and at the time of entry there are no external symptoms indicating its presence to the veterinary surgeon. So long as the importation of store cattle from other countries was freely permitted cases of this kind were by no means infrequent.

So long, too, as the importation of store cattle from any particular country depended not upon an Act of parliament making the prohibition universal, but upon regulations of the Board of Agriculture, admitting or prohibiting the entry of such cattle from a country on the ground that the country was for the time free or not free from disease, questions repeatedly arose between us and the country affected by our regulations as to whether our veterinary advisers were right or wrong in declaring the existence of disease. Although this alone would not have been a sufficient reason for passing the Act of 1896, that Act has had the further advantage of removing the possibility which had hitherto existed of friction occurring whenever such questions unfortunately arose upon the actual facts of particular cases.

I need not, perhaps, deal with the other causes which led to the alteration of the law in 1896, because they were all due to the dangers at all times attending the importation of store cattle and their general dispersal all over this country. No special country, I repeat, was in view when general legislation of this nature was introduced.

It is satisfactory to find that the importation of fat cattle from Canada has largely increased —and it is, I am sure, unnecessary for me to add that anything which can reasonably be done to increase such a trade between Canada and the mother country ought to be done.

I ask hon. gentlemen to remember that this legislation is entirely of a general character and not directed against Canada, and I think the most the government is able to do under the circumstances, according to the law on the statute-book, is to afford facilities for Canadian cattle to be slaughtered within reasonable time after arrival in England. My hon. friend from Wellington makes a considerable point on the fact that there is injustice in some way to us in allowing the idea to exist that disease prevails amongst Canadian cattle. Well, there may be something in that, but it is not a material matter, in view of the fact that it does not affect to any great extent the general trade itself. The Canadian trade in cattle has steadily grown. It is a business that is of great value to this country, and the figures year by year show that the export from Canada of live cattle steadily grows, that it is a remunerative business, and that we are benefiting by the business that is carried on. I would just call attention for a moment to the fact that in the year 1897—I do not go back of that, although I have the figures—we sent into England cattle to the value of $6,454,000, and in 1900 we sent to the value of $7,576,000. In 1903 we sent cattle to the value of $10,842,438. In that year it reached its highest point. We sent forward 161,000 head of cattle. So that while we are not able to send our cattle in the condition in which we would like to send them, while perhaps we might be able to use some of the raw material in the other form, yet the presumption is that the cattle sell well in England and are worth something. On February 8, Lord Onslow made a speech at Yeovil and referred to this matter. He spoke as follows :

He was afraid, said Lord Onslow, that he was going to get into much trouble in the House of Commons next session, because in his desire to protect animals in England from disease he had intimated to the Irish Department of Agriculture that, as the local authorities in Ireland would not impose regulations for the extirpation of swine fever, he had no alternative but to prohibit the importation into England of all store pigs from Ireland. However, he must be prepared to face these difficulties in the certain hope that swine fever would before long be no longer known in the land. Then there was another trouble which came upon his shoulders from their brethren across the seas in Canada. In 1896 the government found it absolutely necessary to pass an Act prohibiting the importation into this country of any animals from abroad—from British colonies as well as from foreign countries—except for immediate slaughter at the ports of debarkation. The leader of the opposition in the House of Commons only a few days ago announced that he was in favour of reopening the British ports to cattle coming from Canada.

Such a step would be most impolitic and dangerous. First, there were large numbers of farmers in England and Scotland who had invested a considerable sum of money in the breeding of cattle, and they told the government of the day, who passed the Act, that when everything was looking most satisfactory, and when they believed they were perfectly immune from animal disease, the importation into this country of a few diseased animals brought sudden ruin upon them, and they could not be expected to invest their skill and capital in the enterprise if they were to run so fearful a risk. In 1892 there was an embargo placed upon cattle coming from various countries. One animal suffering from pleuro-pneumonia passed the examination, and to trace that single case cost the country no less than £15,000. Did they think that any government was likely to introduce legislation that would reopen such a risk as that ?

Then he goes on to call attention to the growth of Canadian trade in cattle. The hon. gentleman from Wellington also seemed to make a point that in some way or another Great Britain was favouring the United States at the expense of Canada, inasmuch as when the foot and mouth disease was stamped out their cattle were allowed to enter. By special legislation or by particular legislation the foot and mouth disease was included in the Act under which the expenditure of money was allowed for the immediate killing of animals infected with that disease, but when it disappeared, of course the law was no longer operative against animals coming from the country which had freed itself from that particular disease. I think there is probably no prohibition of any kind against foot and mouth disease as regards Canada, because it does not exist. We can easily set up a claim, and probably a just claim, for the immunity of our cattle from disease, but I observe the learned gentleman who lectured here the other night before the association for the suppression of tuberculosis, before my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards') society, did not declare that Canadian cattle were absolutely free from disease ; but he did say that we had less than any other country, and in a comparison which he made with Germany, I think he said we had only two per cent—he was probably referring to tuberculosis—while Germany had something like sixty per cent. I think we might fairly pause before we pass what seems to me to be such an extreme resolution, first, in view of the fact that the existing condition is in accordance with public opinion in England, and therefore the government of England is not to be condemned in this matter, that it has been a growth of some years of legislation, and in view of the fact that the Canadian government is constantly bringing this matter forward and constantly representing it to the imperial authorities. I have the paper, but do not intend to read it, which was submitted to one of the Houses the other day, showing that as late as January 14th of this year the Minister of Agriculture called attention to some statements made in England with regard to the prevalence of this disease and denying that the people of Canada were satisfied. So that I think in view of all the circumstances of the case if it is necessary to do anything, we should first remember the position in which the British government is, and be moderate at least in the way we state our views to-day, under a resolution of this parliament.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—For quite a number of years I have studied with interest matters pretaining to our Canadian development, and particularly the fact that the imperial government, or the British Board of Agriculture, kept our cattle out of the British Isles. I have always asked myself why this action was taken, and always came to the conclusion, a simple one, that the British farmer wanted to protect himself against the cattle of Canada, and the legislation was passed for no other reason.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And I always asked myself, why does the British Board of Agriculture resort to false pretenses to protect the British farmer ? Why should they publish to the world that Canadian cattle are diseased in order to keep them out of the British market? I do not propose to tolerate that. If they want to protect the English, Scotch and Irish farmers against foreign competition, whether it be from the colonies, from the Argentine or other places, let them do so, but let them not brand our cattle as diseased when they are not. Under the circumstances, I am fully in accord with the hon. senator who asks us to declare:

That the Senate of Canada deems it its duty to put on record its deep disappointment and regret at the course adopted by the British government in continuing the embargo on Canadian cattle, in face of the established fact that neither pleuro-pneumonia nor any other contagious disease exists in Canadian herds, and in view of the stringent regulations enforced by Canada, in regard to stock imported from other coutnries.

That the British government, by the course they are persisting in, are unjustly discrediting the standing of Canadian herds throughout the world; and

That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the honourable the President of the Board of Agriculture and to the right honourable the premier of England.

In my estimation the hon. senator has done a service, not only to his own province and the class he represents, the farmers of this country, but to the entire community. If the government of England, through its Board of Agriculture, wish to keep our cattle out, let them say so, but do not let it go abroad that the cattle of this country are kept out because they are diseased. I consider that the only point that the hon. senator wishes to accomplish. As a man interested in the agricultural interests of this country, as a man interested in the fame of our herds, which have taken first prizes in all the exhibitions on this continent, and probably would have taken them elsewhere if we had been able to send them, I heartily and cordially agree with the hon. gentleman in asking this House to say to England: 'Brand our cattle as foreign, but do not brand them as diseased.' I am fully in accord with him that our cattle, having no disease, as our veterinary surgeons can prove, should not be branded before the world as actually unfit for food, and I hope that the Senate, notwithstanding the learned opinions on the contrary—and I have no learned opinions to offer, I have simply a bald opinion based on facts to offer, and I have had a little to do with cattle myself—will endorse this resolution and declare that we have no disease, neither pleuro-pneumonia nor any other contagious disease, to prevent our cattle going into any market of the world, and especially the market of England. While on that point let me say that England wishes to develop preferential trade; Mr. Chamberlain is signalling for it. Mr. Balfour will not vote for or against it, but if they want preferential trade, on what line can it be more profitably developed than in connection with the cattle trade. If they are going to keep our cattle out they will keep the best part of their preferential trade out, and under the circumstances I hope the resolution will pass.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I feel very strongly in sympathy with the agriculturists of this country who desire to have the embargo against the admission of their cattle into the British market removed. I am fully satisfied that the desire of the hon. member who moved this resolution is along the same line. I think he is a little unhappy in the form in which he has framed it. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman who takes the stand that an injustice has been done to Canada and that we have been treated in a disrespectful way. The British government have a right to frame their legislation to suit themselves. They did not make any special legislation against Canadian herds, but included them with all other herds in the world. For many years they gave us a privilege that foreign countries did not enjoy. If the resolution was put in that way, asking them to restore to the Canadian people that special favour, I could support it with all my heart, but in the way it appears, reflecting upon the British government because they have withdrawn what was a special favour they had given to Canada, I do not think I could give it my support. In the legislation passed by the British government, I do not think that they are in any way discriminating against Canadian cattle or saying that the Canadian herds are more unhealthy than the herds of any other country in the world. I do not believe that the Canadian people can complain except that they are not receiving some of the advantages from Great Britain which they think they are entitled to as a colony of the British empire.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think that everybody in the House is aware that the Canadian governments—I speak not merely of the present government, but of their predecessors—have lost no opportunity of presenting the case of Canada, and the desirability of admitting Canadian cattle into the British markets, before the British government on every possible occasion, and I think also there is very little doubt that although the terms of the Act to which my hon. friend alluded are general, the measure was more designed for the purpose of protecting certain British agriculturists than it was for excluding diseased cattle. Everybody who has paid much attention to the debates in the British parliament, is aware that that was the underlying motive. Under those circumstances, this House and the other branch of the legislature would be well advised to bring the matter to the attention of the British parliament in the most forcible manner possible. At the same time, I am bound to say that I think our hands would be strengthened by motions of this kind being made unanimously, and I would suggest to my hon. friend the mover of the resolution that it might be expedient for him to permit this debate to be adjourned in order that some form of motion could be arrived at in which we could all concur. If, therefore, my hon. friend desires, I should be disposed to move that this debate be adjourned for a week, or whatever time might suit, at which time we could consider what form of resolution we could adopt in order to bring the matter to the attention of the British parliament. Nobody could underrate the vast importance to Canada of obtaining free admission for our cattle to other markets, and particularly to the English markets, and I believe that there are special reasons why it would be to our mutual advantage that we should obtain admission to the British markets. It is a tolerably well established fact that the breed, both in men and cattle, is often improved by transportation to this side of the Atlantic, and if my memory serves me, there are some very notable instances given in former years. A member of this body, the late Senator Cochrane, who is well known to have done a great deal in the way of improving the breed of cattle in Canada, established beyond question that he succeeded in producing a stock superior to the original British cattle which he imported into this country. The same thing I believe has been found to be the case in the herds of the United States. As for the human animal, it is not for me to say whether similar results have occurred. But I may say that there is very good ground for believing—and I think the record of North America shows—that both for men and animals the country in which we have the privilege of residing has shown itself capable of producing a very superior article indeed. I move, therefore, that this debate be adjourned until this day week, if it meets with my hon. friend's wishes.

The motion was agreed to.

CIRCULATION OF MUTILATED COINAGE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER rose to Call the attention of the government to the defaced and mutilated silver coin in circulation in Canada which is refused by the banks and others, and to ask if it is the intention of the government to call it in and have a new issue minted ?

He said: This motion speaks for itself and it is not necessary for me to add any words. I desire to call the attention of the government to the defaced and mutilated coin of which there is a large circulation in this country, and which has become a great nuisance to trade. I do not refer to silver coins that are used for ornaments, but I am speaking of 25 and 50-cents pieces which have been plugged. A great many coins are circulated sometimes by people who receive them in good faith, not noticing the defects in them, often by dishonest people who collect and make a business of circulating them. I desire to ask whether it would not be possible to recall those coins, allowing a certain value of them, or whether the government could not adopt some means to withdraw them from circulation.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I quite agree with my hon. friend. It is a great nuisance to have these coins circulated. There is no power that I know of, except the government, which can prevent people punching holes in silver coins and plugging them with lead. These coins pass at night. They may be taken in grocery stores, and when people get them in change they cannot use them. In our part of the country it is found to be a very great nuisance. Of course, up to a certain time it was all right among a certain class of gentlemen who happen to frequent bar-rooms. They could always pass a defaced coin for a drink, but to-day the public has got so particular that these coins will not be accepted even in a bar-room. I really think that something might be done in this matter. It is a difficult matter to approach, because the government might put out silver and people would be defacing it all the time. In olden days when silver was worth a dollar or a dollar and ten cents to the ounce, there was something made by it, but to-day, when it is worth only 61 or 62 cents to the ounce, there is not so much in it except perhaps for people who do it out of villany or wickedness, or whatever you may choose to call it. My hon. friend the leader of the House, could probably tell whether anything can be done. There is a very handsome profit in the coinage of silver. We are going to have a mint, and where they mint silver costing sixty-one or sixty-two cents to the dollar, putting it out at one hundred cents to the dollar, it affords a big profit, and possibly the hon. Secretary of State might think, with my hon. friend who has moved the resolution and others, that it might be a very good thing when this new mint is established, to adopt some means which would be well thought out to relieve the community of all defaced silver, and substitute for it the King Edward shilling from our own mint. It is a growing evil, and I think the whole country will thank our hon. friend for having brought this matter in a kindly and friendly spirit to the notice of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The attention of the government had not been drawn to the fact that mutilated and defaced silver was in circulation. I do not think it has existed in and around Ottawa. Of course, wherever it does prevail, the mutilated currency ought at once to be removed, and I shall be very glad to call the attention of the Finance Minister to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has spoken on the subject, and I am sure he will be quite prepared at an early day to take any action that might be necessary to remove the nuisance.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of this House to an article published in the 'Mail and Empire' of Toronto, which reads as follows :—

A Stain upon the Senate.

A special committee of the legislature of Quebec has found Premier Parent guiltless of the wrong-doing of which he was charged by Hon. J. H. Legris and Hon. P. A. Choquette. These two honourable gentlemen are members of the Senate of Canada. Their accusations were of a kind which no public man should lie under unless he cannot possibly clear himself of them. If he does establish his innocence, the charges recoil with double disgrace upon the men who made them. Consequently, if the finding of the committee of the Quebec House is a full vindication of Mr. Parent, it is no less a staining reflection upon the conduct of the two senators. In the good name of these two politicians the grave and venerable body to which is concerned its honour is affected by anything that should bring the blush to their cheeks. There is a popular notion that the Senate is somewhat particular about its dignity, and that it is trying hard to deserve the epithet 'august.' If that notion is not to vanish like a dissolving view the Senate must at once take cognizance of the Quebec committee's rejection of Messrs. Legris and Choquette's charges as false. If the charges had been proved true, they would have ruined Mr. Parent. Mr. Legris is reported to have said among other things :

I do not hesitate to say that brigandage is openly practised in the Crown Lands Department with Mr. Parent's sanction. Our system of forest sales is abominable. Every year hundreds of thousands of dollars which belong to the Crown fall into the pockets of Mr. Parent's favourites. Charity prevents me from going further. Our timber limits are sold in a way which forces me to believe that Mr. Parent desires to depreciate their price instead of enhancing it. Mr. Parent has bound himself by simple Order in Council without consulting the House to no increase of stumpage or the ground rents for ten years, although timber is daily increasing in value, as well as the facilities for working it. I do not hesitate to say that this engagement is the act of a fool—and Mr. Parent is not a fool—or of a criminal. I state that in the immediate surroundings of the Prime Minister there are people who profit by this criminal policy. I assert without fear of contradiction that we lose annually in the neighbourhood of $500,000 of stumpage ; that annually hundreds of thousand of dollars are diverted in a wrong direction, always to Mr. Parent's knowledge.

Senator Choquette is accused of repeating these charges. It is expected that the Quebec legislature will adopt the report of the committee exonerating Mr. Parent. What will the Senate do ? As for Mr. Parent, he is expected to push with renewed vigour the actions he has initiated against the two senators in the courts.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I wish to ask the hon. gentleman who has just read the article from the 'Mail and Empire,' if he is aware that there is another notice of motion on the paper which has not been dealt with, and I would ask the honourable House if this question of privilege is to be taken into consideration before the notice of motion on the order paper.

The SPEAKER—I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that I had called the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In deference to the decision of the Speaker, I state to the honourable House that a gentleman who is very much interested in the notice of motion on page 264 of the minutes, is very anxious that it should be called.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It could not be called until the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is a notice of motion. I do not wish to interfere with the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, but the gentleman is here and wishes to have this other matter settled.

The SPEAKER—The notice given by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed is that he will move an amendment when the third reading of the Bill to which it relates is called.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hope the hon. gentleman has no anxiety with reference to my motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, but another gentleman has.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. Speaker decides that the point of order is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Since the article has been published, the Quebec legislature has come to a decision. A special committee has been named to investigate the charges made by two hon. senators, whose names have been mentioned in the article. The committee subpœnaed those two hon. gentlemen to come before them as witnesses, to give their evidence and to sustain their charges. The hon. gentlemen have refused on the ground that they had actions pending against them in court. Two actions brought against them by the Prime Minister of Quebec, were then pending in court, and they refused to attend. The Prime Minister offered to withdraw the actions if they would come before the committee and sustain the charges. They were called but they did not appear. I merely brought this to the notice of the House to afford these gentlemen an opportunity to make an explanation to the Senate, because the charges against them reflect on this honourable body as well as on themselves, and I hope the explanations will be such as will clear the sky altogether.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not consider that the gentlemen referred to are in duty bound to pay the slightest attention to the observations made by the hon. senator from Stadacona. It is a matter personal to themselves and to the ex-premier of the province of Quebec, and not a matter which this House has any jurisdiction over or which it has any duty to interfere in.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I did not say that they are in duty bound to make any explanation; I merely give them an opportunity.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—I am glad the hon. senator from Stadacona has brought up this question in the Senate. It affords me an opportunity to make an explanation and to state the facts. I may say, in the first place, that this publication in the 'Mail and Empire' is exceedingly regrettable. It is unjust, unfair and injurious not only to Senator Choquette and myself, but, according to the principle laid down in it, also to the Senate, in throwing mud in the faces of two of its members. What are the facts? The last general election for the local house of the province of Quebec occurred immediately after the general election for the Dominion. The house was dissolved on the 4th November last, the day immediately following the federal election, which resulted in the complete defeat of the Conservative party throughout the province of Quebec. The polling day was fixed on the 25th of the month—eighteen days elapsed between the dissolution of the house and the polling day for the general election in the province of Quebec. The position of the Conservative party was such that it withdrew from the contest, and the electors of the province had no opportunity to pronounce upon the policy submitted to them by the then Prime Minister. I was of opinion at that time, as I am to-day, that Mr. Parent's course was exceedingly wrong. During the campaign I made strong accusations, I admit, against Mr. Parent and the administration of his Department of Crown Lands, Mines and Fisheries. Those accusations were repeated a few days after by my colleague, Senator Choquette, only he went further and made other charges on his own account in the same line. A few days after we were both sued by Premier Parent for the sum of $25,000 damages each. We met the action with pleadings which are now before the courts. On the second of March the local house was summoned to meet. Mr. LeBlanc, one of the members of the local house, moved for the appointment of a committee to investigate the charges formulated by myself, Senator Choquette and others, for we were not alone in accusing Mr. Parent. The motion of Mr. LeBlanc reads as follows:

Hon. Mr. LeBlanc moved that the declaration read by the member for Laval at the sitting of the 3rd March, instant, be referred to a select committee consisting of Messrs. Carter, Decaire, Delage, Girard, Kelly, Roy (St. John) and Tellier, with power to inquire into the facts therein mentioned, the said committee being vested with all the powers this House has the right to confer upon it, and that are possessed by standing committees of the legislative assembly, and with power to send for persons, papers and records.

This motion was struck out, no doubt at the suggestion of the Prime Minister, and replaced by another. The following day Mr. Girard made the following motion:

That all the words after 'Tellier' be struck out and replaced by the following: 'Girard, Dupuis, Lafontaine (Maskinonge), Mackenzie, Allard, Roy (Kamouraska), Tessier (Three Rivers) and Marchildon, with power to inquire only into the accusations which the said Messrs. Legris and Choquette may themselves bring before the said committee in an express and specific manner against the Prime Minister of this province, Honourable S. N. Parent, or against the administration of the Department of Lands, Mines and Fisheries, immediately after the said Messrs. Legris and Choquette shall have been summoned to appear before the said committee; the said committee to be vested with all the powers which this House has the right to confer upon it, to hear witnesses and to send for persons, papers and records, in order to inquire into the facts mentioned in the said accusations, which may be made by the said Messrs. Legris and Choquette before the said committee as aforesaid, the said committee to report to this House as soon as possible during the present session, after the inquiry shall be concluded into the facts mentioned in the express and specific accusations that the said Messrs. Legris and Choquette may make, or immediately, if no express and specific accusations be made before the said committee by the said Messrs. Legris and Choquette on the day fixed for their appearance before the said committee.

So you see we were not being summoned to appear before the committee, as stated by the hon. senator from Stadacona. We were invited to appear before that committee to make specific accusations against Mr. Parent.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Why did you not do it?

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—We declined to appear; we refused to appear before that committee to make accusations. As I said a moment ago, we were sued, and we prefer to appear before the courts rather than go before that committee formed by Mr. Parent himself or at his suggestion, and selected by him, when he was Prime Minister and the leader of the house. We were not summoned to appear before that committee; we were at liberty to appear or not, and we decided not to go. We were perfectly free to choose the position we preferred. Accordingly the committee had but one thing to do according to the instructions given it by the house, make a report according to the facts. Instead of doing so, the committee heard the Prime Minister himself, not under oath, and received a few declarations from members of his department, declarations taken ex-parte, and on that the committee made a report which reads as follows:

Your committee, after deliberating upon the declaration referred to it by the house, as well as upon those submitted to it during the course of its sittings, is of the opinion——

I must say right here that this declaration is absolutely untrue. No declaration was submitted to the committee by the House. The House empowered it to investigate the accusations which Mr. Choquette and myself might be pleased to bring before them, and I have already said we declined to bring any, so that the first allegation of the committee is absolutely untrue. Then the first paragraph is as follows:—

That the accusations of Senator Legris and Senator Choquette, as contained in the declaration of Mr. Pierre Evariste LeBlanc, as amended, dated 3rd March, 1905, are false.

Well, hon. gentlemen, the committee made no investigation at all; no one appeared before the committee to make accusations; no witness has been heard; yet under those circumstances they made a report to the House. What are we to think of that? It proves that we had good grounds for not appearing before the committee. For my part, I was sure that the committee had been formed at the suggestion of Premier Parent, and had but one purpose in view, to whitewash Mr. Parent. It is not possible to arrive at any other conclusion. The committee was appointed and acted with but one object in view, to whitewash Mr. Parent, probably in order to allow him to get out of the government and perhaps come to Ottwa, or elsewhere, to have another position for himself. I do not know about that; it is what we can suppose under such circumstances. The committee say furthermore:

That in the Department of Lands, Mines and Fisheries, the administration of affairs has been always carried on by Hon. S. N. Parent and by his officers with integrity and honesty, and that no act of favour or partiality, as alleged, has been committed.

What more is necessary to say? I repeat, the committee made no investigation; it went beyond its instructions. It was appointed for the purpose of investigating charges that Senator Legris and Senator Choquette might be pleased to bring before them. I do not see that it is necessary to say more. I regret exceedingly that such an incident has occurred in my own province, but the facts are there and I cannot permit suspicion to attach to myself or to the Senate without stating the facts as they are. I hope, hon. gentlemen, you will agree with me that this article is unfair, unjust and injurious, as I have already said, and I think it would be much better for the publishers of leading papers to be sure of what they say before printing such articles.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have just one word to say, and it is this: When invited by the Quebec committee to go before them, I respectfully declined to do so. I think I did right, and so do my friends. Now, with due respect to this House, and without blaming the Hon. Mr. Legris for putting his case before the House, I declined to bring my case there. I have been brought before the Quebec courts, I have pleaded to the action against me, and I am in a position to defend myself. I do not fear the result and I will go there to plead my case.

CALGARY, RED DEER AND BATTLEFORD RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the third reading of Bill (19) An Act to incorporate the Calgary, Red Deer and Battleford Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When this Bill came up from the Railway Committee I gave notice of the following amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended to conform to the notices and petition in that behalf, by striking out all the words 'a point at or near the town of' in the third line of paragraph 7 thereof.

Now I desire to say that when this Bill was in committee, I made the same motion, but the committee did not consider it wise to adopt the amendment. I am therefore exercising my right to move the amendment in the House. Permit me to say in the first place that I have no desire to in any way defeat or interfere with the general terms of the Bill. I am desirous that it shall pass as it is with this exception: Attention has been directed to the fact that the notices and the petition called for this road to run from the town of Calgary to Battleford.

Hon. Mr. POWER—From Calgary to Battleford. Not from the town.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Hon. gentlemen who have not followed the Bill will observe that the language now employed will permit it to run 'from a point at or near.' Clause seven reads as follows:

7. The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches from a point at or near the town of Calgary, in the district of Alberta, thence in a north-easterly direction to Battleford, in the district of Saskatchewan, in the Northwest Territories.

I have no desire to take advantage of any technicality which may have arisen that might be considered a discrepancy between the Bill as framed and the notices and the petition. While I might with some degree of force urge upon the House that the Bill in no case should be a departure from the notice or the petition, yet I consider that the committee and this chamber should be at liberty from time to time to depart from the exact letter of the notice or the petition as the case may be, in the event of a case being made out, but in this particular instance I submit with deference to the House that, notwithstanding the action of the Railway Committee, everything is in favour of a close adherence to the notice and the petition. I need not point out to the House that the object of inserting notice not only in the 'Gazette' but in the public newspapers is for the purpose of apprising the public of the powers which are sought by the proposed company, so as to give the public an opportunity, if there is any objection to the Bill, of being heard before this chamber or before the committee, as the case may be. If this case had stood alone I doubt if I should have directed the attention of the House, to the fact, but I might say that this expression of running from a point 'at or near Calgary' to some other point has been long debated not only in this chamber, but before the Railway Committee. Three Bills have already been passed in which this expression appears. A Bill which was passed yesterday, (No. 76), known as the Red Deer Valley Railway Bill, when originally passed gave latitude to the company permitting it to run from a point 'at or near the town of Calgary' or in language equivalent to that. Upon an amendment having been sought by the company from this parliament, the council of the city of Calgary took the matter up and by memorial approached parliament and asked that it be amended so as to require the company to run the line from a point within the city of Calgary. The committee took the memorial into consideration and granted the prayer of the petition, compelling the company to adopt as its starting point a point within the city of Calgary. If hon. gentlemen will refer to chapter 181 of the statutes of 1903, they will find that an Act respecting the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company was amended by this parliament to conform to the demand now made, namely, that the point of beginning should be in the city of Calgary; and with greater exactitude than I have now urged, parliament then insisted on this being done, namely, the adoption of a point of commencement within the city of Calgary south of the Bow and west of the Elbow river.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Is the expression in that Act 'at or near?'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, south of the Bow and west of the Elbow river. The point at issue is its starting from Calgary. Now, in 1890, when the Calgary and Edmonton road was incorporated—which is a road running practically from Macleod to Edmonton—the question again came up as to its running within the city of Calgary and in that Bill parliament exacted from the company the requirement of running within the city. It was provided in that Bill, chapter 84 of 53 Victoria, that the company may lay out and construct and operate a railway from a point 'within the town of Calgary' to a point at or near Edmonton. When the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill was passed by this parliament in 1903, parliament exacted from that company an obligation that their branch should be built to Calgary, not 'at or near,' but 'to Calgary.' Hon. gentlemen will observe the difference; in obtaining their charter parliament did not exact that they should go to Edmonton, but near Edmonton, but when they got permission to build a branch it was provided that they should go to Calgary with the branch, not to a point 'at or near Calgary.'

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Calgary has been singled out for a special favour.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may possibly be owing to the eternal vigilance of the people of Calgary, that this has been exacted from time to time. We therefore have three railways in which parliament has required that those lines shall run into the city of Calgary. I will direct the attention of the House to another Bill which has passed the House of Commons, and I fancy will have been already sent to the Senate Railway Committee, namely, Bill No. 50, and which will be found on the files of hon. gentlemen, 'An Act to incorporate the Calgary and Battleford Railway Company,' which is almost precisely similar to the Bill we are now considering, namely, Bill No. 19. And the same latitude is sought in this Bill as is sought in the Bill now under consideration. Therefore, the same action will naturally arise when Bill No. 50 comes before the Railway Committee. That Bill provides that the road shall commence from a point 'in or near Calgary.' It may be said that these companies not having received up to the present time any subsidy therefor should be permitted to build from any point they see fit. I may say that no railway has yet been built within the Northwest Territories without government aid, and the mischief which invariably flows from this latitude of expression is such as to permit companies to hold up municipalities and to exact from them large subsidies or bonuses in consideration of their going into such municipalities as they may negotiate with. I might instance the case of the Calgary and Edmonton road, when incorporated in 1890. Instead of going into the town of Macleod as it was anticipated they would, and also into the town of Edmonton, as it was anticipated they would, they stopped short of both towns, stopped on the other side of the river, thus demoralizing, I might say, the progress and the business interests of those different places. The city of Edmonton, for the purpose of obtaining railway communication from Strathcona, which is across the river, to a point within the town of Edmonton, had not only to contribute to the building of a very expensive bridge, but also had to secure the building of the branch road running from Strathcona to Edmonton. Owing to the latitude of expression in the Grand Trunk Pacific Act, I observed lately from the public press that the city of Edmonton have had to enter into negotiations with the Grand Trunk Pacific and have offered them no less than $100,000 to enter the city of Edmonton. This I submit to hon. gentlemen would not happen if the interests of the city had been safeguarded in the passage of that Bill, and the company had been compelled in the construction of the road to come within the boundaries of the city. These roads will undoubtedly approach the Dominion government immediately they become organized, for the purpose of securing subsidies, and it is therefore for that reason, in anticipation of these being exacted, not only from the Dominion government, but also from the local governments and municipalities, that I urge upon this House the necessity of safeguarding the interests of those municipalities by amending the Bill so as not to permit of the wideness of language which we find introduced into this Bill, but rather that the company should be compelled to start from a definite point, and that such point should be within the city of Calgary. Therefore, I move that the Bill be amended accordingly.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

ABSENCE OF SENATOR RUFUS CURRY.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

The SPEAKER presented the report of the Committee on Orders and Customs in the Senate and Privileges of Parliament, re the absence of Senator Rufus Curry.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the report be adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that much more light can be thrown upon this subject than that which has already been given in a former debate, but as the reasons that were given were stated in committee, and are not upon record, I intimated yesterday that before the report should be adopted I desired to put myself upon record in this matter. The report declares that Mr. Curry not having complied with the conditions of the Act under which he was appointed, the seat has become vacant. It is somewhat difficult to understand how a seat can become vacant which was never filled, the party who had been summoned never having complied with the law. That is the point I desire to bring under the notice of the Senate. In looking at the law we find that the Governor in Council has, under the 24th section of the Confederation Act, the power and authority to summon any gentleman to the Senate. Mark the wording. If you look at the clauses referring to the appointment of judges, and of the Speaker of this House, you will find that the language is 'appoint,' not 'summon.' And when an Order in Council is passed appointing such an officer, I take it for granted he would become a judge or become a speaker, as the case might be, unless he were to resign. In the other case the language is different. The 24th clause says that the Governor General may summon a man. Now draw the distinction between the meaning of the word 'summon' and the word 'appoint,' and you will find there is a marked and great difference.

Turning as I did a moment ago to the National Dictionary of English Literature, I find that the word 'summon' means 'order or authoritative invitation.' Now, the law under which the gentleman was summoned gives authority to the Governor General to summon him. Turn to the word 'appoint' and you will observe that it has a vastly different meaning—to designate or appoint a person to some position, as in the case of a judge, or to nominate or constitute an executor or guardian. It does not follow because a man is appointed to a position, he is obliged to accept it. But I want to draw the attention of the Senate to the wording of the different clauses which apply to the summoning or the appointing, if you like, which subsequently takes place, of a senator, and the appointment of a judge or any one else to an office under an Order in Council. If a man be summoned and he declines, as in the case of Mr. Curry, to accept the invitation to become a senator—for such is the interpretation given to the word 'summoned'—is he a senator until he has taken the oath? That is the point I wish to put to my hon. friend. If we refer to the appointment of senators who had been legislative councillors at the time of the union, we find that the law provides that these legislative councillors may be appointed or summoned to the Senate, but there is a further provision in the law that if a legislative councillor so appointed declines or does not pay any attention to the summons within thirty days it is to be accepted as a resignation, and the summons or appointment, or whatever you may term it, ceases to have any force or effect. Arguing from that standpoint, it seems to me that this gentleman having failed to fulfil a single condition of the Confederation Act in order to make him a senator, the Governor in Council would have the right to rescind the Order in Council summoning him to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When could they have rescinded it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Now if you like. There is no limit to time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They could not within the two years, I maintain. That is the point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you could not do it within the two years, you could not even at the expiration of the two years, because you are undertaking to set aside what never took place, according to the report that is now before us. A case analogous to this occurred in Nova Scotia. The late Mr. Campbell was summoned to the legislative council of that province. He never accepted the summons, as he desired to run for one of the counties in Cape Breton,—Victoria I think,—against Mr. Ross. Having been notified of his summons to the legislative council, the question suggested itself to him, 'Am I qualified, or will it be legal for me to contest that constituency. If elected could I hold my seat, having been summoned or appointed to the legislative council, though never having accepted the seat?' He consulted the Minister of Justice of Nova Scotia at that time, who gave it as his opinion that he was not a legislative councillor, and that he had all the rights and privileges of an ordinary subject. He entered the contest, was elected and sat in parliament the whole of that term. That is a somewhat analogous case to the one I am now discussing. If you turn to another clause of the Confederation Act you will find that it declares that a senator shall not be capable of being elected to or of sitting or voting as a member of the House of Commons. Now, if the mere summoning of a gentleman to the Senate makes him a senator, it might at a very critical moment deprive him of the right of running for any constituency. A government 'in extremis' to whose existence one or two members were necessary, might, knowing that a candidate opposed to them was likely to be elected, pass an Order in Council summoning him to the Senate. By that means he would at once be disqualified from running for any constituency thereby securing the return of one of the government's supporters and thus retaining them in power. I know it might be said that no government would do that, but should the law be so interpreted as to permit a government to do a thing of that kind? I think I could illustrate my meaning by citing a case where it might be possible. We know that a very short time ago, one of the local governments called parliament together in order to prevent—at least they were accused of it, and it did prevent, whether they acted intentionally or not—the investigation of certain contested elections which were subsequently set aside. Had the members been unseated before the House assembled, they could not have been re-elected until after the time had expired for the calling of parliament together, and if this had occurred the government would have been defeated. Then we know another case in which a certain government, when one of its own ministers was being tried before the court, and the probabilities were that he might be disqualified (certainly the election would have been annulled), parliament was dissolved and the investigation was thereby prevented. So that under this clause one can easily see what bad results might follow, if the interpretation which has been given to this Act be correct.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That same government might appoint him a judge, but in one case as in the other he could resign.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They might appoint him a judge, provided he happened, like my hon. friend, to be a lawyer, but supposing they wanted to get rid of a layman who, like myself, never studied law.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The layman could resign.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So could a nominated senator.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He might die. You can suppose a number of things. I am treating of a reality and not a theoretical case.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The hon. member probably remembers the case of Sir Stafford Northcote, who was a member of the British House of Commons and who, unknown to himself, was appointed a peer, which had the effect of vacating the seat. The hon. gentleman will remember the consternation that existed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I fully recognize that, but I do not see that it is at all analogous, or meets the point I have taken. If Mr. Curry had been a member of the legislature, and had been notified of his being summoned—because I want you to draw the distinction between being summoned and being appointed to any office—and had risen in the legislature of Nova Scotia and said: 'I have been summoned to the Senate and have sent in my resignation,' that would have been quite proper. But I am assuming a case in which a man who is not a member of the House would be disqualified from running under the process which I have pointed out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He can resign at any moment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know that. We are not discussing that point. We are not dealing with a man who has resigned. We are dealing with a man who has neither accepted nor resigned. There is a gentleman now sitting in this House who was asked to come to Ottawa. He did not know what he was coming for; he was asked as a friend to come, and when he came he was notified that he had been summoned to the Senate. In this case he very sensibly accepted it; but supposing he had taken the other ground, does any one mean to tell me that that action on the part of the government would have constituted him a senator and deprived him of the right which he possessed to sit in the legislature of Nova Scotia, of which he was a member.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, because he could resign instantly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not talking about resigning. The hon. gentleman seems to misunderstand, or I am unable to make the point sufficiently clear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot see the point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I admit he could have resigned. But he came here without knowing the object of his being summoned. If he were a member of the legislature and a member of the Nova Scotia government, would his action in coming to Ottawa have jeopardized his position in any way? He could not well resign his appointment as a senator, for he did not know the government's intention in summoning him to Ottawa. Supposing he had not resigned, does the hon. Secretary of State pretend to say that that would have disqualified him from sitting in his seat in the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia, and have deprived him of the office which he held as a minister of the Crown? I think the thing is too ridiculously absurd to discuss for a moment. That is the position in which we find ourselves at the present moment. Now the case as we have it before us, is simply this: the Governor in Council summoned Mr. Curry to the Senate. The government did not appoint him. Mr. Curry, if he desired to be a senator, should have complied with the provisions of the 23rd section of the Confederation Act, and taken the oath of qualification, and then he should have complied with clause 128. The 128th clause provides that he shall do certain things, among others that he shall take the oath of qualification and the oath of allegiance, and perform certain other acts before he becomes a senator and can take his seat. Now, having declined to obey the summons, what I contend is that he is not a senator, and never was a senator, and that in taking the action which we are contemplating, we are declaring a seat vacant which the man never held, and never was entitled to hold, from the fact that he never fulfilled any of the conditions of the Confederation Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Could the government have appointed anybody else in the interval? For a period of two years after, could they have appointed any one else? It was open to Mr. Curry to come forward at any time within two years and take his seat.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not prepared to answer that question. Perhaps some of the lawyers can do it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could have come at any time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But can you take the action now and declare his seat vacant?

Hon. Mr. BLACK—For two years this subject has interested me more or less, because it was supposed to be an appointment made in Nova Scotia, and some Nova Scotians have held the opinion that on account of this notice having been sent to Mr. Curry, the province of Nova Scotia has been deprived of its legitimate representation in the Senate for two years. I have somewhere noticed a quotation to the following effect, 'Speak for yourself John; why don't you speak for yourself.' The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat referred to me when he said a gentleman had received notice to come to Ottawa but did not know for what purpose. I have listened with great care and attention to this discussion, and it seems to me that if the proper course had been pursued two years ago there would have been no necessity whatever for this discussion, and furthermore that the province of Nova Scotia for the past two years could have had the representation in the Senate to which they were legally entitled. I should like to know, in the first place, before making up my mind in regard to this question, what does a summons mean. If a summons to the Senate involves no more than what I received, I would say that until I stood at the table and subscribed to that commission and took the oath, I had no more right to be called a senator than a man in the street. That is the position I would take on that point, because I was simply telegraphed to come to Ottawa. That was the extent of the notice or summons I received. When I came to Ottawa I was told that I was offered a seat in the Senate, and if I had then done just what I understood that Mr. Curry did, and had said, 'I will not accept a seat in the Senate,' it seems to me that nothing further would have been necessary but for the Governor in Council to rescind the summons which had the effect of bringing me to Ottawa. I have not yet heard any person say what legal difficulty there was in the way, when Mr. Curry wrote immediately that he would not accept the appointment, of rescinding the action taken and giving Nova Scotia her due representation in this chamber. Now, I think that if there had been some very important question before this House and it was found necessary to have Mr. Curry here or a man that would act as Mr. Curry might be supposed to act here, there would have been some means adopted to get Mr. Curry here, or to get somebody from Nova Scotia in his place. I have listened to much technical legal argument on this case, and it seems to me, as far as I can grasp the question involved, that it is a very simple matter to deal with ; and if it had been dealt with in the first place there would have been no difficulty whatever when Mr. Curry refused to take his seat. I cannot see, notwithstanding all that I have heard, any difficulty in the way. I am not speaking for the purpose of retarding the passage of this resolution, for I should like to have seen this resolution passed two years ago. I shall vote for it of course, but I must say that I cannot see why the case should have been dealt with in this way, and now technically objected to, because I think we have a great deal more difficulty in passing it consistently at the present time than we would have had two years ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As far as my recollection goes, Mr. Curry was appointed without any previous consultation. I understand he wrote to say he would not accept the position. He declined to be recognized as a senator. Now that could not vacate his commission. He had a warrant under the great seal of Canada from His Excellency the Governor General, which practically appointed him a senator. It was quite within his power at any time within two years to come here and take his seat; or he could have addressed a letter to His Excellency the Governor General,—not to Mr. Fielding, or Sir Wilfrid Laurier, or the clerk of the House or anybody else, but to His Excellency the Governor General, stating that he declined to accept the position of senator. That would have vacated his seat. Mr. Curry maintained : 'I am not a senator. I did not accept the position, and I am not in the position of a man who could send in a resignation to the Governor General.' That is the difficulty that arose in the first place.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—But was he advised by the government to take that course ? Being a layman perhaps he did not know.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not going to make any comments on it, because I do not think it is a proper thing to discuss, as he is not here to-day ; but I understand Mr. Curry rather resented his appointment and said he had never accepted the position, and therefore there was nothing to rescind.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—There was an easy way of getting out of it, and he probably would have followed that course if he had been advised to do it. But being a layman and not knowing the legal procedure to be followed, he did not know how to act. The reason I make those remarks is that I understand it suited the government pretty well to leave the situation in abeyance, on account of the difficulties concerning the party to be appointed. As far as I am concerned, I have no fault to find with the manner in which the question is brought up. I will of course vote in favour of the motion, but like my hon. friend from Amherst (Hon. Mr. Black) I am perfectly convinced that had there been any wish or any desire to have the situation cleared up, it could have been done immediately without waiting two years.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Like my hon. friend from Amherst, I will vote for the report, because it seems to me that that is the best way out of it at this stage of the proceedings, but I think it is nevertheless very desirable and important that the question should be ventilated here to prevent a similar course being pursued in the future by the government of the day to bring about a vacancy, or to cause a vacancy to exist in the Senate for a period of two years. There was no necessity for it existing even for two months. To prevent a repetition of these things it is well that senators should put their views on record fully and clearly. I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman from Amherst, and after hearing my hon. friend the Secretary of State in rejoinder admit that Mr. Curry immediately forwarded to the Governor in Council, a letter to say that he would not accept the position, that letter was to all intents and purposes a resignation of whatever right he had to a senatorship, and should have been immediately regarded as such and a new summons issued.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend does not agree with me, nevertheless I intend to use the privilege and right which I have of giving my opinion on the subject, and must say I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. I turn to the British North America Act and I find that several sections of it deal with the Senate. The sections leading up to 23 provide for the number of senators and all such matters. We come to section 23, which describes what shall be the qualification of a senator. There are six clauses giving the qualifications in detail. They are for the guidance of the Governor General in summoning members to the Senate; it is plain that they are put there for that purpose. Then we come to section 24, which says:

> The Governor General shall from time to time in the Queen's name, by instrument under the great seal of Canada, summon qualified persons to the Senate.

Qualified as under the preceding subsections. The section proceeds:

> And subject to the provisions of this Act every person so summoned shall become and be a member of the Senate and a senator.

'Subject to the provisions of this Act.' Will any hon. gentleman say that does not include section 128 of this Act, saying that a man summoned shall come and take the oath? That is one of the provisions of this Act, as it is very plain that whether or not the qualifications enumerated in the preceding section are included in that phrase, 'the provisions of this Act,' the 128th section is certainly so included. That being so, it is only when he has done what section 128 prescribes that he becomes a senator. He is not a senator under the words of the British North America Act until he has complied with the provisions of the Act, That being so, I have no difficulty in my own mind, in coming to the conclusion arrived at by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and my hon. friend from Amherst, that this was a very simple matter to deal with at the time the summons was issued. There is a distinction, as my hon. friend has pointed out, between a summons and an appointment. You summon a juryman. He does not become a juryman until he is empanelled and has taken the oath. A judge becomes a judge from the time he receives the appointment. But the term 'summon' certainly implies something different. Having been summoned, but not having become a senator, in the words of section 24 by complying with the other provisions, and having written a letter to the Governor in Council intimating that he would not accept the seat, he by that letter resigned anything which had been conferred upon him. It was a resignation in every sense of the word.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He did not write such a letter that I am aware of. I never heard of such a letter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend informed the House that he had.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I said all he had to do was to write a letter to the Governor General resigning his seat, which I believe he has not done.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understood my hon. friend to state that Mr. Curry had written a letter saying he would not accept the position.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understood he had written to individual ministers that he would not accept the position.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I contend that was ample.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have never seen such a letter. I understood from what I heard in the House here, that he had written such a letter. I understood he was rather annoyed at having been appointed without first being consulted, and he wrote to some individual minister to say that he was not a senator and that he could not resign.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—On receiving this summons Mr. Curry wrote a letter. I understood my hon. friend to say it was addressed to the Governor General in Council; he now says it was to individual ministers, but whether to individual ministers or to the Governor in Council, the admission my hon. friend makes is that he wrote such a letter, and it was equivalent to the resignation of any right he had to be regarded as a senator. The Governor General in Council, in my opinion, should have acted immediately on that letter. I agree fully with the hon. senator from Amherst that the government should have acted on that letter and summoned another gentleman to the Senate to fill the vacancy. No harm could have arisen out of doing so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has no right to twist my words. I merely said it runs in my mind that I heard Mr. Curry had written to individuals.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman said the letter was written to members of the government. He has no right to accuse me of misrepresenting him in the matter; I am not misrepresenting him. He has admitted in this House that Mr. Curry wrote a letter to individual members of the government and that was to all intents and purposes a resignation of any rights he had acquired under that summons. Any other view would lead to a perfect absurdity, in my opinion. Supposing a man is called to the Senate and does not comply with the provisions of the Act, and does not take the oath, according to the doctrine laid down here, he is still a member of the House, though he has not complied with the provisions of the British North America Act. If one man can do that, another can do it. A large number of persons might be put in that position and two years might intervene before they could be got rid of. We know how members drop off in this House. The Governor in Council might call men to the Senate and they might not accept, and it might go on until the Senate became decimated and we would have no power to deal with it. Suppose it were carried to an extreme length—I admit an unreasonable length—and so many were appointed in that way that there would not be enough left to form a quorum, if no step could be taken to declare the seats vacant, where would we be? The absurdity of the position is shown when we push it to an extreme. A man is called to the Senate by summons; he writes a letter to a member of the cabinet—that is the way we have it now from the Secretary of State—stating that he would not accept the position. I say it was the duty of any member of the government who received that letter to lay it before his colleagues so that action might be taken, and not allow a seat in the Senate to remain vacant for two years—it may be for other than public objects. There may have been political exigencies.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I understood there were in this case.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is clear that prompt action should have been taken by the government, instead of allowing it to drag over two years and then forcing the House to declare vacant a seat which was never filled.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not share the fears of the hon. senator from Marshfield that the Senate is likely to be depleted because of a number of gentlemen following the example of Mr. Curry. We are all agreed—the hon. gentleman himself agrees—that the course now taken by the government is the proper course at the present time—that they might have taken a different course at an earlier date, but that this is, on the whole, the proper course to take.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That view is not held by every one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A number of gentlemen here think that Mr. Curry was a senator for two years. Other gentlemen think that he was never a senator. But we all agree that it is desirable that the doubt should be removed, and that the Senate should declare that the seat is vacant. I do not propose to deal with this question at any length, but I desire to call the attention of hon. gentleman to the provisions of the British North America Act and to the position in which this question stands now. Section 32 provides:

> When a vacancy happens in the Sénate by resignation, death or otherwise, the Governor General shall, by summons to a fit and qualified person, fill the vacancy.

The summons fills the vacancy. It does not say that when the senator comes and takes the cath, the vacancy is filled. It is when the Governor General by summons calls him to the Senate that the vacancy is filled.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—What is the summons?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is admitted he has been summoned, so the vacancy is filled. When Mr. Curry was summoned, the vacancy which had occurred in the representation of Nova Scotia in the Senate was filled under section 32 of the British North America Act. Then what took place? Mr. Curry did not accept. Mr. Curry might have got out of the Senate by acting under section 30 of the British North America Act which provides that :

A senator may, by writing under his hand, addressed to the Governor General, resign his place in the Senate and thereupon the same shall be vacant.

There is no other way by which a senator who has been appointed under section 32 can resign. Mr. Curry did not resign in that way. Consequently, Mr. Curry's seat was not vacant until the expiration of two sessions after his appointment. Section 33 says :

If any question arises respecting the qualification of a senator, or a vacancy in the Senate, the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

We are now doing that. I think we have acted properly from start to finish. The hon. member from Marshfield and the hon. senator from Belleville directed the attention of this House to section 128, and intimated that that section conflicted with the view taken by this side of the House. How does section 128 begin ? It begins in this way :

Every member of the Senate or House of Commons shall, before taking his seat therein, take and subscribe, &c.

It recognizes the fact that a gentleman is a senator or member of the House of Commons before he does what is prescribed. I think it is perfectly clear, and even if it were not clear, I do not see that there is any particular object in discussing it at length, because every one recognizes the fact that we are getting out of the difficulty in a way which is, on the whole, correct. I may say in conclusion that the hon. senator from Belleville referred to section 127 of the British North America Act, which provides that any one who was a member of the legislative council at the time of the union and was appointed to the Senate was to accept by writing within thirty days. That rather confirms the view taken on this side of the House, because it was specially provided that a gentleman who was a member of the legislative council if he did not wish to accept, should resign in writing. There was nothing said about the others, and the implication is that they could not resign in that way.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but the point which has been suggested for the first time by the hon. senator from Belleville under section 127, instead of being an argument in favour of the position he has taken, is a very strong confirmatory argument for the position taken on this side. I will try to make that point plain. The statute provides for a senator resigning, but section 127 contains a special provision applying to members of the legislative council of Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. It provides :

If any person, being at the passing of this Act a member of the legislative council of Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, to whom a place is offered, does not within thirty days thereafter, by writing under his hand addressed to the Governor General of the province of Canada, or to the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick (as the case may be) accept the same, he shall be deemed to have declined the same.

There was a necessity for that. The very organization of this Senate depended upon a limited time being fixed within which something definite under the hand of members of the old legislative council, should definitely determine what they were going to do, and therefore there was a special requirement put in that case, giving them a limited time within which they should say whether they did or did not accept ; but there is no such limitation when other members of the Senate are appointed, and therefore any other member of the Senate appointed in the way the statute prescribes has two years to consider and determine whether he will accept and qualify by taking the oath before taking his seat. Thus the argument, instead of being one telling against the present action, is one which makes strongly in its favour. In the case of the first appointments to the legislative council a definite act was to be done within a definite time, but in the others the appointee is left to take the course during a period of two years. He must either attend in his place within that time or forfeit his seat.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then during the two years he is not a senator.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes, he is a senator. If a member of the old legislative council were offered a place, he was not appointed; it was necessary to determine a time within which he should say whether he accepted or not.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—That was the thirty days.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes, for that particular person.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The hon. gentleman said in the present case he had two years to accept.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—In the case covered by section 127, it was not a case of providing for members being summoned to the Senate. It was providing for the case of a legislative councillor being offered a seat in the Senate. That is a different thing from being appointed or summoned. It is a different thing from being created a senator as the summons would create a senator; but the offer being made for a limited time, he had to declare within that time whether he would accept or not, and therefore the period of thirty days was fixed, because the very organization of the Senate depended upon action being taken at once. There was a case of a limited time being fixed. The fact that no time limit was prescribed in the other case is an argument in favour of the position that there is no time limit, beyond that which is given for a member of the Senate to come here and take his place; so that the argument, so far as it goes, tells against the hon. senator from Belleville who brought it forward, instead of being in his favour. While I quite agree with the hon. senator from Halifax that in the present condition there is no substantial advantage to be gained by a prolonged discussion of the matter, yet inasmuch as the one side of the case has been presented here, I shall trouble the Senate for a few minutes while I put forward the position I take in reference to the matter. In the first place, we have been asked what is a summons. We need not have any doubt in determining what the summons is which is prescribed here, because that is determined by the British North America Act. Section 24 provides that:

> The Governor General shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the great seal of Canada, summon, &c.

That is what a summons is. That summons has been put in form and the form that is used declares the position and status of the person named therein. It is in the name of the King.

> Know ye, that as well for the especial trust and confidence we have manifested in you, as for the purpose of obtaining your advice and assistance in all weighty and arduous affairs which may the state and defence of our Dominion of Canada concern, we have thought fit to summon you to the Senate of our said Dominion; and we do appoint you for the , and we do command you, that all difficulties and excuses whatsoever laying aside, you be and appear for the purpose aforesaid, in the Senate of our said Dominion, at all times whensoever and wheresoever our parliament may be in our said Dominion convoked and holden; and this you are in no wise to omit.

So the House will see, as the hon, senator from de Salabery suggests, it does not call for acceptance. The Act of the Governor General in the name of the King, under the Great Seal of Canada, declares the appointment to be complete when the summons is issued. The statute to make that clear, goes on to say 'every person so summoned,' having the King's warrant under the Great Seal of Canada, shall become not only a member of the Senate, but a senator.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why does the hon. gentleman leave out the words 'comply with the provisions of this Act?'

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I did not omit them at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is after complying with the provisions of the Act.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I said 'subject to the provisions of the Act,' he shall become and be a senator. That is to say he is declared to be, and the statute says he shall be a senator.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—'Subject to the provisions of the Act.'

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—He is declared to be a senator, not merely a member of the Senate, but a senator, so that there is a complete process for creating a senator. The person so summoned shall become not merely a member of the Senate, but a senator, and as such shall be entitled under the other section to hold a place in the Senate for life, subject to the provisions of the Act, of course. Then it provides one way in which he may cease to be a senator, and that is by writing, not to a member of the government nor to the clerk of this House, but to the Governor General, the high authority who has authorized the issue of the summons in the King's name. That is the definite way and the only way. It cannot be accomplished by any other means or by addressing his communication to any other person. It is not to be an informal document, but a document addressed to the King's representative and to his only. Further,

> When a vacancy happens in the Senate by resignation, death or otherwise, the Governor General shall by summons to a fit and qualified person, fill the vacancy.

The Act thus prescribes how the vacancy is to be filled. It is to be filled by a summons to another person, and when that summons issues the vacancy is filled. What more is necessary to make it a complete appointment? Then the provision is made in section 39 to which the hon. member from Belleville referred :

> A senator shall not be capable of being elected or of sitting or voting as a member of the House of Commons.

Surely a strong argument can be built on that. It simply means this, that having been summoned by the King's warrant under the great seal in the terms of the summons which we have heard quoted, appointing him to fill a vacancy in the Senate, his position as a senator would be complete, and he would have no right to vote or sit elsewhere. Why not ? Why would he not have a right to vote if he had been a member of the House of Commons before ? It is because he has ceased to belong to the one House and has become a member of the other, and although it is quite true an improper use might be made of that by such governments as we have had before, there would be no evil effect from it, because the moment he got the summons he could resign the senatorship and that would entitle him to continue as he was before. Now, with reference to section 128, the oath of allegiance which is prescribed here can only be taken by a member of the Senate, so unless the person summoned is a member of the Senate he is not entitled to subscribe to the oath which is provided in section 128. If, then, he is entitled to take that oath, it is by virtue of being a member of the Senate, and only by virtue of being a member of the Senate. That is not a necessity to his becoming a senator ; it is only an essential qualification to his having a right to come here and vote.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing the Governor in Council should tomorrow pass an Order in Council summoning the Hon. J. P. Whitney to the Senate, and issue the warrant which has been issued in the case of Mr. Curry. If Mr. Whitney should treat it as Mr. Curry has done, would he be a senator ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If he did he would not be premier of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could resign.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. We all know that, but Mr. Curry did not resign.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not see that that places any difficulty in the way. Either one of two things is the case ; either Mr. Whitney is disqualified from becoming a senator and therefore it would not apply, because it only applies to qualified persons——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The qualification only applies to citizenship, to his being a British subject, which is a proper qualification.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—He is a disqualified person under the statute, or else if he is qualified he would become a member of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand from the answer that Mr. Whitney would be a member of the Senate unless he resigned ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—No, the reverse of that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then where are all the arguments we have heard ? The argument has been that when a man is called to the Senate he is a senator until he resigns. Then, if you call Mr. Whitney to the Senate you make him a senator, and disqualify him to be premier of Ontario, and subject to a penalty if he continues to hold that position.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The more we discuss that matter——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The more we want to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The less light we have. The hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) says that the words 'subject to the provisions of this Act,' must apply to the qualifications of a senator. We cannot give that interpretation to the Act, because the Act says that the Governor General shall from time to time in the Queen's name, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon fit and qualified persons to the Senate. The Governor makes his choice among the persons who have the qualifications called for by the British North America Act, which qualifications are set forth in section 23. Only such persons as are qualified are to be summoned, so when a summons is issued the questions of qualification have been dealt with. The law goes on to say 'subject to the provisions of the Act.' It does not say 'qualified persons subject to the provisions of the Act,' but it says 'qualified persons,' and then goes on to say, 'subject to the provisions of this Act every person so summoned' or so qualified 'shall become and be a member;' so that the words 'subject to the provisions of this Act' cannot apply to the qualifications, because only persons who are qualified are to be summoned, and those persons, 'subject to the provisions of this Act, shall become and be senators. The hon. member says they are. ' If they are, when do they become senators? 'Shall become and be'—they must become senators, and after becoming they will be senators. If they are at the time senators, they do not want to become senators; so I do not think the interpretation put upon the words by the hon. sénator from Toronto is correct. The hon. senator from Halifax refers to section 32, which reads as follows:

When a vacancy happens in the Senate, by resignation, death or otherwise, the Governor General shall, by summons to a fit and qualified person, fill the vacancy.

That is the question—is it filling the vacancy if a person refuses to accept? Suppose to-day the seat rendered vacant by the absence of Mr. Curry were filled by a person who should act as Mr. Curry has acted, will the government be filling the vacancy by issuing the summons? Not at all.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is begging the question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know what that means—I am not a lawyer. But nobody has answered the objection raised by the hon. senator from Belleville,—if the Governor in Council should summon Mr. Whitney, would he be a senator? That has not been answered. It is not the summons that makes the senator. If it is the summons, then if Mr. Whitney is summoned to-day he becomes a senator. No one has answered that objection, and I should like to have it answered.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should be very much disappointed, and certainly would lose all confidence in the British North America Act, if its language were not sufficiently wide to permit every member of this House to express a different opinion as to its meaning. I have never seen a question of law raised under the British North America Act which did not permit practically every member of parliament to express himself freely and diversely from his neighbour. Such seems to be the case in this particular instance, and it has been well demonstrated in the other branch of parliament. I regret to have to differ from my hon. friends on this side of the House, but I certainly cannot subscribe for a moment to the opinions which they have expressed with reference to this subject. It seems to me there should be no difficulty in determining from the case as presented to the House, that there is a distinction between membership and vacating a seat, as the distinction is drawn in the Act. We are not asked to declare that Mr. Curry was or was not a member of the Senate.

We are simply asked to make a declaration, or place a declaration on the records of this House, that the seat is declared vacant. Now, in the first place, we have not only the section of the Act which provides as to the qualifications of appointment, but under sections 24 and 25, I think we must come to the conclusion that immediately a person is summoned to the Senate by warrant under His Majesty's royal sign manual, as it is expressed here, he becomes a member of the Senate. That is certainly quite clear from the wording of section 128 of the Act, because it speaks of the person as being a member of the Senate when he approaches this table and before taking the oath. Now it is sufficient for me to know that Mr. Curry's appointment was gazetted. We have before us the 'Canada Gazette' gazetting the appointment of this gentleman as a member of this House. We have before us under the Great Seal his appointment as a member for the Senate. My hon. friend from Belleville seems to draw a distinction between this gentleman being summoned and being appointed. I may point out that this summons not only summons him, but appoints him. Now it seems to me that the only question we have to determine is the vacating of the seat. Section 31 provides that the place of a senator shall become vacant in certain cases, and again section 128 says:

And every member of the Senate of Canada shall also before taking his seat therein, take and subscribe before the Governor General or some person authorized by him, the declaration of qualification contained in the same schedule.

Does not the hon. gentleman overlook the fact that this gentleman has been appointed to a particular place in this Senate, and that all the records of the government show that he has been so appointed, namely, as the member for Amherst. So that we are simply called upon under the Act to declare, not that he is or is not a member of the Senate, but simply that the seat is vacant after what has happened. Under those circumstances it seems to me the academic question is not before us as to whether he was a member or not. It is enough to know that the highest authority in the realm in that behalf has appointed him to occupy the seat. True he has not filled it, but nevertheless what we are called upon under the Act to declare is that the seat is vacant. It seems to me that is the question before the House, and none other, and personally I have no doubt upon the matter.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If a man comes up to the table of the House with a commission in his pocket and takes the oath, does that make him a senator? If he has no commission and takes the oath, does that make him a senator? He cannot come to the table unless he is a senator.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

CALGARY, RED DEER AND BATTLEFORD RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the third reading (Bill 19) an Act to incorporate the Calgary, Red Deer and Battleford Railway Company, and the motion in amendment of the Honourable Mr. Lougheed thereto.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have no fault to find with the hon. gentleman from Calgary for moving this resolution with reference to the Bill in question, but I would like to say that I do not think there is very much in it. It appears to me that after a Bill has been before any committee of this House and fully discussed there, the proper course for the House would be to adopt the report of the committee. However, the hon. gentleman has seen fit to move this resolution and we have to deal with it. In the first place, the hon. gentleman moved a resolution in the committee which was voted down, and afterward he got some new light on the question and became seized of the fact that there was a small difference between the wording of the petition and notice which was given, and the wording of the Bill that has been presented to the House. As I understand it, the notice that was given mentioned the fact that this road should run from Calgary to Battleford, while the Bill that was introduced said it should go from a point at or near the town of Calgary. My hon. friend from Calgary takes exception to that. He says it should mention the fact that this road should go into Calgary. It appears to me that this is a system that has been adopted and has been carried out not only in this House but in the other House for years and years. In nearly every Bill there is inserted the words 'at or near' the point, whatever it may be, from which the road is to start, and I never heard of exception being taken to it. It has been introduced in these Bills for obvious reasons. In the first place, when a Bill is introduced in the committee of this House and is discussed by that committee, the committee is not always seized of the facts with reference to the engineering difficulties that might be in the way. Now, before you could force a railway company to build its line to a certain place by setting that out in the Bill, you would necessarily require a report from a qualified engineer as to whether the railway company could build to that point or not. We have never had a report of that kind, and for this reason in every one of those Bills, the words 'at or near' have been inserted; and for that reason, I think it would be wise to leave the wording as it is at the present time. Now, with regard to the difference between the words 'Calgary' and 'at or near Calgary,' it does not amount to anything, because if my hon. friend will turn to the last clause he will find that there is a provision which says that the railway company must expend a certain amount of money and build a certain length of road. It does not matter to what point they construct, but if they do not complete the road, the rest of the charter is cancelled, so that if we took out the words 'at or near' and inserted what my hon. friend wishes inserted in the Bill, it would not in any way compel them to build into Calgary. They would build where they wanted to build, and I know of no law which would compel them to go further. It is strange to me, considering the number of years that the hon. gentleman from Calgary has been a member of this House, that he did not find this out before. I have taken the trouble to go through the different Bills passed last year, and I find that very nearly every Bill passed by this House last session contained the same words 'at or near.' I have a list of them here. I do not want to take up too much time, but I find that the Nipigon Railway Company Bill had these words inserted in it, and I think my hon. friend from Calgary had something to do with that measure. Again we find the same words in the Pontiac Railway Company Bill, the Thorold and Lake Erie Company Bill, the Toronto and Hamilton Railway Company, the Watertown and Lucknow Railway Company, the West Canada Railway Company, the White Horse and Alaska Railway Company, the Berlin, Waterloo and Wellesley Railway Company Bill. All these different charters have passed this House and I take it for granted that my hon. friend must have been present in the House when some of these Bills were discussed in committee, yet I have never heard him take any exception to any of the Bills passed with these words in it. These words were inserted in the Canada Central Railway Company Bill, the Brantford and Hamilton, the Campbellford and Lake Ontario Western Railway Company Bill. All these Bills were passed last year with the words 'at or near' in them, and no exception was taken. What appears strange to me is the fact that it was not five minutes after exception was taken to this Bill in the Railway Committee by my hon. friend, until another Bill came before the committee which affected the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It contained the very same clause, word for word, but my hon. friend was conspicuous by his absence. He was not there to take up the question at that time. I think that this Bill is perfectly right. As a matter of fact, as I said before, the difference between the words 'at or near' and the word 'Calgary' amounts to nothing. It is about the same as the distinction between tweedledum and tweedledee. You cannot force the railway company to construct a line into Calgary unless they want to do so, and as to the question of bonuses which was brought up by my hon. friend in the discussion of yesterday, I suppose he is aware that before any subsidies are given to any railway company in this country, not only in the House of Commons but in any local legislature, a certain set of resolutions has to be submitted to the House, and these resolutions show exactly where the road in question is to be built to and where it is to be built from. These resolutions must be submitted before a dollar of the money is voted, and that would be the proper time for any person who is interested in having a railroad constructed to a certain place to take exception to the wording of the Bill, if any exception could be taken. But we have a Bill before us in which, so far as we know, no request is made for a cent of aid either from the town of Calgary or from this parliament or from any local legislature—as far as we know they are not asking for a cent; and why we should go to work to change the wording at the present time is a strange thing to me. I am quite willing to admit that my hon. friend is a good lawyer. I will take it for granted that he is, but I will venture to say that he is not a very good engineer. Now he comes here and asks you to accept the proposition that they can build a line into Calgary. Now if my hon. friend had produced the report of any competent engineer to show there would be no impediment in the way of getting into Calgary, and that it would not cost a vast amount of money to construct the line into the city, we could then discuss the matter; but for a legal gentleman to come here and ask us to accept his word, without any scientific evidence as to the character and topography of the country in and around Calgary, I think is going a little too far. We do not know anything about the character of the country around Calgary. It might be possible to build a road in there, but supposing it is possible for a railroad to get into the town of Calgary, there is, I submit, a provision—and I suppose my hon. friend as a lawyer knows about it,—in the Railway Act with reference to this very point. It has been discussed in the other House and I suppose has been discussed in this House—a provision with reference to the location of lines. I am bound to say that I have myself taken exception to railways passing towns that were established before the railway company apply for their charter. In other words, supposing a town has been built by the energy of the settlers of a certain inland portion of the country where there has been no railway communication, and that a certain railway is projected through the country where that town has been established by the people. If the railway company should propose to go to one side and shunt that town, I would certainly take strong grounds and say that the railway should be compelled to build into that town if possible, if there were no engineering difficulties in the way. We must always take that point into consideration. But in the case of a town which has a main line of railway, like the town of Calgary, which has a transcontinental line of railway, and has I believe two other railways running into the town—it would not be fair to take such action. This is a branch line, constructed for the purpose of opening up certain coal fields, and without a report from some engineer as to the character of the country surrounding that town, I doubt whether we could put a clause in the Bill which should be a hard and fast clause and compel the company to build right into that town. Without our having any knowledge of the country I do not think it would be a fair thing to do. The clause as it stands has been inserted, as I said before, in nearly every Bill that has passed this House and the other House for years. To all intents and purpose it is a model clause. When the Railway Act was introduced in the House of Commons there was a provision made to cover this very case, because we had a discussion in the House with reference to railways shunting towns and that sort of thing, and it was provided for in section 122 which my hon. friend I suppose is well acquainted with, being a lawyer. The section reads as follows:

122. The company shall prepare a map showing the general location of the proposed line of the railway, the termini and the principal towns and places through which the railway is to pass, giving the names thereof, the railways, navigable streams and tide-waters, if any, to be crossed by the railway, and such as may be within a radius of thirty miles of the proposed railway, and generally, the physical features of the country through which the railway is to be constructed, and shall give such further or other information as the minister may require.

2. Such map shall be submitted to the minister in duplicate and prepared upon a scale of not less than six miles to the inch, or upon such other appropriate scale as the minister may determine, and shall be accompanied by an application in duplicate, stating the Special Act authorizing the construction of such railway and requesting the minister's approval of the general location as shown on the said map.

3. Before approving such map and location the minister may, subject to the Special Act, make such changes and alterations therein as he may deem expedient, and upon being satisfied therewith shall signify his approval upon the map and the duplicate thereof, and when so approved the map and application shall be filed in the Department of Railways and Canals, and the duplicate thereof with the board, and no change or alteration from the general location of the line of the railway, as approved by the minister, shall be allowed, unless such change or alteration has been first approved by the minister.

The minister has the power of altering and changing the location of any railway as he may see fit. Before a railway company can build a mile of road they have to submit these plans to the Minister of Railways for his approval, and they cannot lay down a tie until they get the approval of the minister. He is the responsible party and he must see that the interests of all parties are protected. Now, I do not think for one moment that it makes much difference whether we leave these words in the Bill, or eliminate them. As I pointed out before, I do not think that you can compel a railway to build into a certain place if they do not want to go there, provided they are not asking for public aid. If they are asking for a subsidy, that is a different matter. My hon. friend says that they may hold up the town of Calgary, but my hon. friend forgot to tell you that the town of Calgary might hold them up. I have known cases where people have been held up by a town. If you could compel a railway to go into a certain town and did compel them by legislation, it appears to me that the value of property would go up in that town very quickly, and if the company wanted a right of way, or any grant of land, they would probably have to pay fancy figures. Of course, they have the power of expropriation, but we know what that amounts to in many cases. The people appointed as arbitrators on the value of property simply have to go by the information they receive as to the value of property in that town. I venture to say that some of the people in that country imagine their property to be as valuable as property on King street in Toronto, and I have no doubt many imagine it is more valuable; so that if the railway company could hold up a corporation like Calgary, you must take into consideration that Calgary might possibly hold up the company. But I am not putting that forward as an argument. The strong argument is that this has been the practice in this House and the other House for years. This particular wording is adopted, so that if there are engineering difficulties in the way the company will be allowed to make a detour, or to stop, or something of that kind. For instance if a town were built on the top of a mountain, you could not put a clause in the Bill which would compel the railway company to run to the top of the mountain. As far as we in this House are concerned, we have very little information. We do not know whether there is a mountain or a lake or what may be there. A great many of us have not visited the place, and my hon. friend, who is a legal man, asks us to take his word that there are no engineering difficulties in the way. I venture to say my hon. friend could not tell you whether a railway should have four per cent, five per cent or one per cent grade going into Calgary, because, not being an engineer, he would not possess the necessary technical knowledge. So that I think we are safer to stick to the practice which has been in force for years and leave the clause in the Bill as it stands. If there are engineering difficulties in the way, they may not be able to construct the road as required. If there are no engineering difficulties in the way, they want to go there. My hon. friend knows this railway is to be built to open up certain coal fields. He knows as well as can be that you cannot get the products of the coal fields to market without going to Calgary, but, it might be possible that this road might want to join the Calgary and Edmonton perhaps a little to the north of Calgary, and go in over the steel of the Calgary and Edmonton and over their bridges. There might be a possibility of that. Railway companies do not all have money to burn, and they would want to go in as cheaply as possible, but the fact remains that this road is going to be built for the purpose of opening up the coal fields and they are going into Calgary in any event. I do not think the argument advanced by my hon. friend with reference to the town of Edmonton applies here at all. He said that the railway was built to Strathcona and stopped there. I do not think there is any law in this country that could compel those people to go any farther if they did not want to. The high level bridge that they would have had to build across the river at that point would have cost several millions, and I do not think the company was prepared to expend such a sum at the time. However, as to getting bonuses, that is a matter of detail. That is a matter between the corporation of Calgary and the people who are building the road. If the corporation of Calgary think this road is of such importance to them that they want to offer a bonus perhaps they will do so. I do not say that my hon. friend did it wilfully, but he misled the House with reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific going into the town of Edmonton. He left the impression with the House that the Grand Trunk Pacific had held Edmonton up, and that they would not go into the town of Edmonton until they got $100,000. I think if my hon. friend will take the trouble to inquire he will find that the corporation of Edmonton, or the people of Edmonton, gave the $100,000, not to get them to go into Edmonton, but to have them establish in the town of Edmonton all the workshops that they were going to construct in the western country, and it was a question for the people of the town of Edmonton whether or not it was worth $100,000 to them to have the whole of the workshops of the transcontinental line built in the town. It is not a question for us to discuss or decide whether it was wise for them to do that or not. That is a matter for themselves. The same thing will apply to the local government. My hon. friend, who is a thorough believer in provincial rights, will believe that it is a matter which the local governments up there will have to decide for themselves, whether they give assistance to railroads that are to be built or not, but I venture to say that they are astute enough, if they do give assistance, to require that the road be built where they want it to be built before they will give one dollar of their money for the purpose of having the road constructed. I have no doubt the city of Calgary will have a representative in the legislature of Alberta, and when that representative is there he will see, as my hon. friend has taken upon himself here to see, that if money is being voted by the province the road is built where it should be. The strong point is that this Bill has the same provision in it as every other Bill that has passed this House. I want to emphasize the fact that my hon. friend has assisted in putting these other Bills through. Ten minutes after this Bill went through the committee another Bill containing the same clause came up for discussion, and if my hon. friend was not there, he should have been there, and should have called attention to it. Whatever reasons my hon. friend has for the stand he takes, I think the House will see that the custom which has been followed for years should be adhered to, and that unless we have the report of a competent engineer as to the character of the country through which the road will run, we should not lay down a hard and fast rule and compel the railway company to build a road where it cannot conveniently be built.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Has that Bill been changed since it passed the Standing Orders Committee ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the point.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Were any words added after it passed the Standing Orders Committee?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I might say that the notice called for the building of a road to Calgary. It did not say the town of Calgary. It might be open to the interpretation that Calgary meant the district of Calgary, because if you wanted the road to come into the town of Calgary the Bill would have said so. This simply says 'at or near Calgary.' The notice which was given and the petition which was presented read 'from Calgary.' It might be considered by some that that would mean the boundary of the town of Calgary but it might be considered by others to have a different meaning and it would leave it open to arguments as to whether that meant the city of Calgary or the electoral district, and I venture to say there would be an opening for the hon. gentleman and his friends to quibble over.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Tell me the area of the district of Calgary ? How large a place is it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution could give more information about the electoral district than I could because he lives there. The notice that was given says 'at Calgary.'

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That is the district.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes. It did not mention the town at all.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Are the words the same in the Bill now before us as in the Bill that passed the Standing Orders Committee of this House ? Has there been any change in it from the time it passed the Standing Orders Committee until the present time ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I might say for the information of my hon. friend that I think in all the Bills there is what we call the model clause and I think they are pretty nearly all drawn by the law clerk. The law clerk has followed a certain form which has been followed for years, and has put in the words 'at or near.'

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The committee made no change ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not know that we made any change. I think it was probably put in by the law clerk, but the Standing Orders Committee passed the Bill with the words 'from Calgary' not 'the city of Calgary,' but 'from Calgary.' Whoever drafted the Bill inserted the words 'at or near' the town of Calgary, which my hon. friend wishes to eliminate and make it read 'from Calgary,' but I pointed out the fact that if you read the last clause of the Bill—and this is in every Bill, it is not confined to this Bill alone—if you put in the words 'the town of Calgary,' there is no way in which you could compel them to go into Calgary that I know of. It reads :—

> And if the railway is not so commenced and such expenditure is not so made, or if the railway is not finished and put in operation, within the said respective periods, the powers granted to the said company by parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted.

If they build within a mile of Calgary and stop there, and this charter lapsed, the charter would lapse for the portion of road that had not been completed, so that they would then not have a charter to build into the town of Calgary at all, but it would not interfere with the road that had been constructed, and as I pointed out before, they could build the road up to that point and then drop it, and nobody could force them to go in, so that there is really nothing in it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman from Kingston hit the point at issue in this matter. That is, does the Bill conform with the petition, what they ask for, and with the notices asking for the Bill? They do not conform and my hon. friend who has just quoted a number of Bills was not able to tell us and did not tell us whether those Acts conform to the petitions for those Bills, or whether those Acts he read from conformed with the notice in the public press and the 'Gazette,' and that is the whole question before us. We have nothing to do with the railway, whether it is in or out of Calgary, or where it goes. We have to sustain and conform to the rules of the House. The petition for the Bill says distinctly that the company asks for power to build from Calgary to Battleford.

If we give them what they want, they ask for more. There is a notice published in the 'Gazette' and in the newspapers announcing that they intend to apply for a Bill to construct a railway from Calgary to Battleford. The petition and the notice conform to the same language. The Bill, as brought in, deviates from that, leaving it an open matter where the line shall commence. It says 'at or near Calgary.' It may be five or ten miles from the city limits. If this House wishes to sustain its own rules, if rules are to be of any use at all, we should not give the company more than they asked for. The amendment of the hon. member from Calgary eliminates those words 'at or near' and gives the company exactly what they petitioned for and what they declared in their advertisement they wanted. However anxious hon. gentlemen may be to please a member who has charge of a Bill, they should first of all look to the integrity of the rules of the House and sustain them. We cannot be doing any wrong or any hardship to any company or to any persons if we give them what they petition and advertise for. They should not be allowed to break the rules of this House by adding anything more to the Bills than their petitions call for. The very title of the Act itself is 'Calgary, Red Deer and Battleford Railway.' I hope the House will sustain the rules by striking out the words 'at or near' as called for by the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I be permitted to say a word in explanation and reply to what the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Davis) said in opposing my amendment. In fact, everything my hon. friend said seems to me to furnish the very best reasons for adopting the amendment. He has assured the House that there is no doubt whatever that this road will be built into Calgary. He has further assured the House that the intention of the company is to convey coal, and of course they will carry it to Calgary. He has further assured the House that the difference between the clause as it stands and the clause as I wish to amend it, is only the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. All this confirms the view which I have already submitted to the House that there should be no indefiniteness in the language fixing the point of commencement, that if there is no injury going to inure to the company from adopting the specific language which I have suggested, the House therefore should at once adopt the amendment as the language of the Bill. If there is any security to the public whatever in an Act of parliament, it is to have specific language. I need not say that nothing contributes more to expense, difference between parties and litigation, and all the annoyance common to misunderstanding, than wideness of language in legislation of this kind. My hon. friend has sought to throw the onus on myself with reference to the terms to be employed in this Bill. All I ask my hon. friend to do, and all I ask this House to do, is to adopt the language which the promoters of the Bill introduced themselves into the notices and into the petition and which the Bill should necessarily follow. But my hon. friend seeks to transpose the duty and cast the responsibility upon me of assuming to say to the company that they should go where he says they do not want to go. Now so far as the engineering difficulties are concerned, no responsibility should rest upon my shoulders of convincing this House that there are no engineering difficulties in question. Under the rules my hon. friend is required to produce to the Railway Committee a map showing the point of commencement. He assumes the responsibility, in the specific language employed in the notice and petition, to adopt such a point of commencement as would appeal to their own intelligence as a starting point. It is for them to consider the point of the engineering difficulties. Then, having in their notices and in their petition named a particular starting point, Calgary, they must have taken into consideration the question of engineering difficulties and consequently none whatever remains. The very best assurance I can give to my hon. friend that insurmountable difficulties such as he has called up are not facing him is that, as I pointed out yesterday, no less than three roads have been required by parliament to start from within the city of Calgary and have already done so.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—How many have been built ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Calgary and Edmonton has been built, and begins in Calgary. The Red Deer and Calgary Railroad, whose Bill received the second reading, has spent a considerable amount of money in grading and so on, and has adopted plans starting from within the city of Calgary. However, the House, I am sure, from the very fact of these gentlemen having advertised to run from Calgary, will necessarily conclude that the promoters of the road have considered the alleged engineering difficulties ; but I can assure my hon. friend there are no engineering difficulties of any consequence to be encountered. As my hon. friend has already said, the road is intended practically to convey coal to the city of Calgary. I apprehend, therefore, that the question of engineering difficulties does not stand in the way. My hon. friend has expressed a considerable degree of solicitude as to the wideness of the language I have proposed, namely, 'Calgary.' He has suggested that that might possibly mean the district of Calgary. I can assure him that I am quite prepared to assume the responsibility of the word 'Calgary' being adopted, and quite prepared to take the risk of its not being the district of Calgary from which the road will start. I may say the district of Calgary is at least one hundred miles long from east to west and seventy-five miles wide from north to south, so I fancy there is no possibility of either the public or the railway authorities, or even the promoters, entertaining for a moment the idea that the starting point is to be a district one hundred miles long by seventy-five miles wide. Further, I might say my hon. friend, in introducing the Bill, directed our attention to the fact that the regulations of the committee required a map to be prepared. Now, that map conformed with exactitude to the notices, and the city of Calgary appears upon the map in all the artistic glow of red ink that could be adopted by the draughtsman who prepared the map, and this railway is shown as starting at that particular point. Therefore, all I ask the House and my hon. friend to do, as he says the difference is not very great, is simply to adopt his own map, his own notices and his own petition, and then no difficulty will arise as to the question at issue. One word as to the fact that this language 'at or near' has been employed in other Bills. I may say that I am not urging upon the House to take a hard and fast stand in compelling railway companies to start from a specific point. That is for this House to decide from time to time, but the object of publishing notices in the 'Gazette' and newspapers is to apprise the public of the route to be adopted, the terminal points, &c. Consequently, I am bound to say that if my hon. friend had used in his notices the wide language which is now employed in the Bill, I have reason to believe that the city of Calgary would, as they did on former occasions, have appealed to this committee to tie the railway down to a point of commencement on or within the boundaries of the city. But I am quite satisfied to accept the language, even though it be broad, that is contained in the notices and the petition.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Do you consider the words 'at or near' a broad expression ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes ; because 'at or near' might permit the company to go miles outside of the town of Calgary, while from Calgary to Battleford fixes at least the boundaries of the town.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—In connection with this matter the position taken by the hon. member from Calgary is one that would carry very considerable force in my mind if he backed up his statement with the fact that in the granting of charters for railways in the past, we have strictly adhered to the wording of the notices and petitions from Dan to Beersheba. If in every single case the Bill said from Dan to Beersheba and not 'at or near,' his argument would carry force, and I should be strongly inclined to vote for his amendment. But he has not produced a single instance in support of his position. If he had been able to say that the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, for instance, or any other railway, had been incorporated strictly in accordance with the petition and notices——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They do comply with the notices.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—My hon. friend does not know that ; he is merely making the assertion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How does the hon. gentleman know ? Can he state to the contrary ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If my hon. friend will ask an adjournment of this debate and promise to bring before this House the notices and petitions in other cases, and show that in each of them the Bill strictly followed the notices and petitions, I promise him I will give very serious consideration to the point he has raised, but if not, I do not think it would be right to hold up this Bill because it says 'at or near.' It has been the practice to use the expression 'at or near' in Bills of this character, and I see no reason why we should make an exception of this particular company. Let my hon. friend adjourn this discussion and be prepared to submit a dozen cases to show that there are precedents for the stand he has taken, and I shall be willing to consider whether we should support his amendment or not. If he is not prepared to do that, I, for one, am not ready to make an exception of this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does not the hon. gentleman think that all Bills should be based on the petitions and notices ? Because if they are not, then the localities affected thereby never can tell whether they should oppose them or not. Does not the hon. gentleman think that that ought to be the rule ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I quite admit that we should adopt that principle, but unless it can be shown that we have done so in the past for years, and that this is the only Bill that violates the principle, I do not think it would be right to hold up this company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is no argument.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If the hon. gentleman can show that we are violating a principle that has prevailed for years in this House, I shall vote against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No custom can prevail against a rule. Why does not the hon. gentleman from Wellington exact from the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) what he wants to get from the hon. gentleman from Calgary? Did the hon. gentleman who spoke before say that all the Bills passed by the committee, were in accordance with the notices and petitions? He never said so.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not think my hon. friend has a right to make a statement of that kind. I am able to say that the hon. member from Wellington is perfectly right. It will be found on examination that frequently there is great difference between the wording of notices and petitions and the wording of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If we have been doing in the past things that we ought not to have done, if we have not made our Bills comply strictly with the petition and notices, it is no reason why we should continue following a wrong course. And when we find further that a member of this House, representing that district, feels that justice will not be done if we pass the Bill in its present form, I contend the House ought to hesitate and not take it for granted that, because we have been allowing Bills to pass under certain circumstances though they did not adhere to the wording of the notices and petitions, we would be warranted in doing an injustice to the locality where this road is to run. The views of the people there are represented, no doubt, more or less by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, and those views ought to have weight with us, when he calls the attention of the House to the matter. If we have been lax in our legislation in the past we ought to call a halt, and say that in this case and for the future we will adhere strictly to the rules. I hold very strongly that the hon. gentleman representing Calgary ought to know what the wishes of the people of that locality are. We can easily understand that the people of Calgary, having the notices before them, did not expect the company would come here and ask for a Bill giving them power to start at a point five or ten miles away from Calgary. If they had known that such a thing would be done, very likely there would have been strong representations from Calgary against it, and we would have been shown how it would affect the people of that locality. Feeling that we would neglect our duty, and that the people of Calgary would have just cause of complaint if we allow this Bill to go through the House without amendment, and in a shape that the people there had no reason to expect, I support the amendment.

The Senate divided on the amendment which was rejected by the following vote.

FESSENDEN WIRELESS TELEGRAPH COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved the second reading of Bill (I) An Act to incorporate the Fessenden Wireless Telegraph Company of Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I object; that is not the committee to which this Bill should go. The title shows that it is to incorporate a company to establish a telegraph system, and surely the Bill should go to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I do not think it is a harbour. I am sure it is not a railway or a telegraph company. I hope my hon. friend will not press his objection. It is not a telegraph company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You so designate it in your Bill.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It is wireless. If my hon. friend thinks the Bill should go to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, I am not very particular about it.

The motion was amended and agreed to.

BRITISH CANADIAN EMPIRE LEAGUE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved the second reading of Bill (P) An Act to incorporate the British Canadian Empire League.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This cannot be held to be a public Bill. It is clearly a private Bill, and should be introduced by petition. It would be a bad precedent to allow this Bill to pass as a public Bill.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Last year the Canadian Artillery Association Bill was passed in the very same way, and this is exactly a copy of that Bill. It is therefore not out of the ordinary course, and there is a precedent for it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not know there were any precedents for it; but even if there are, it is not in accordance with the rules of the House.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—There are several precedents for the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Bourinot defines private Bills as follows:—

> Private Bills are distinguished from public Bills in that they directly relate to the affairs of private individuals or of corporate bodies, and not to matters of public policy or to the community in general. They must pass through the same stages as public Bills, but at the same time must originate by petition (a) and be subject to certain standing orders in both Houses of parliament. Judicial, as well as legislative functions, are entrusted to committees to which all petitions and Bills of a private nature are referred with the view of carefully protecting all the interests involved in the proposed legislation. The parties whose private interests are to be promoted appear as suitors before a select committee to whom the Bill has been referred, whilst those who apprehend any injuries and are opposed to the legislation sought for are admitted as adverse parties. The analogy which the proceedings bear to those of courts is sustained by the fact that certain fees must be paid by the promoters of a private Bill, before the House will permit its passing. All persons whose interests are affected by the measure must have due notice of its nature, so that they may have every opportunity to present themselves before the House and dispute, if necessary, its passage.

I was not aware there was any exception to the rule. That there are exceptions is no reason why we should not follow the rule as long as we have it. We have been in the habit of compelling churches, benevolent and charitable institutions, which have not their origin in a desire to make money, but to accomplish some benevolent purpose, when introducing their Bills, to proceed by petition, pay a fee and in every way follow the rules relating to private Bills. I think this Bill falls under that category.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend has overlooked one fact. If he will read the rule he will see that it applies to Bills where there is profit or loss. There is no profit or loss in this. It is simply like a Bill to incorporate a board of trade. There is no money in it at all. This is a benevolent institution because its object is to impress on the minds of the people of Canada the great benefit of imperialism. I heard my hon. friend the other day discussing the question of withdrawing the troops and the navy from Halifax and thus weakening the imperial sentiment in this country. Here are so many gentlemen, not on any particular side of politics, all combining and joining together and seeking incorporation that they may disseminate British ideas throughout this country. Is there any great harm in that? If you say it is a public Bill, I entirely agree with you. They ask that they may imbue the people with British ideas and spread a sentiment of imperialism through this country when we are filling it up with Doukhobors and Mormons and all sorts of people from all parts of the world. I cannot see any harm in spreading British sentiment through the land. My hon. friend may say they should get letters patent, but they cannot, because to get letters patent, you must have capital paid up. There is no capital in this. Their only capital is their sentiment of loyalty to the King and Crown.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman from Marshfield insist on his point of order?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Inasmuch as our practice has been somewhat varied, I would suggest that the hon. gentleman defer the second reading of the Bill until to-morrow and in the meantime the Speaker can prepare his decision. Besides, the Bill has not been printed yet.

The SPEAKER—I intended to ask that the second reading be deferred until Tuesday next, because the hon. gentleman presented a petition which has not yet been reported on by the Committee on Standing Orders. As the Bill has not been printed, I ask the hon. gentleman to postpone the second reading until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have no objection.

The order was discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

MOOSEJAW AND EDMONTON RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

REPORTED FROM THE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (20) An Act to incorporate the Moosejaw and Edmonton Railway Company, with an amendment. He said:

The amendment to the Bill now before the House consists in striking out clause 11, which was re-enacting a clause which had been left out in the consolidation of the Railway Act in 1903. That was a clause allowing stock to be given the promoters of the Bill without their paying for it—paid-up stock. That provision was very wisely left out of the Railway Bill, and the clause in this Bill, if allowed to stand, would have permitted in this special case the granting of stock not paid for. That is the reason why the Railway Committee struck out clause 11 this morning.

The report was concurred in.

G.T.P. CONSTRUCTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to Ask the Honourable Senator Templeman, as a member of the Dominion government, if he at any time last year received a letter from Mr. Hays, one of the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, to the effect that construction on the proposed railway would commence at Winnipeg, and the Pacific coast simultaneously. And if such a letter has been received, how does it agree with the negotiations now being carried on by Mr. Morse, an agent of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, with the government of British Columbia, for a grant of money, or land as a condition, if such a grant were made, that construction would be commenced east and west at the same time.

And whether the honourable gentleman knows that Mr. Morse has held out the threat that if no grant is made construction would proceed from the east only. And if it is the intention of the Honourable Senator Templeman, as a member of the Dominion government, to remind Mr. Hays of the promise contained in his letter. And to insist that the substance thereof shall be adhered to ?

He said: When I put this notice on the order paper, I was not aware of the substance of letters written by Mr. Hays to the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Templeman). I find after consulting the debates of last year, that there was no promise by Mr. Hays that the construction of the railway would be commenced in British Columbia at any particular time. Therefore, as there is no promise, nothing can be done in the matter; but I can say this, that if the motion I made last year and that made by my hon. friend from Victoria had prevailed, the company would have been bound to make a commencement on the Pacific coast. The hon. gentleman knows how anxious the people of Victoria are that that should be done. It may be thought that from my strong opposition to the National Transcontinental Railway project last year, I am not in a position to say anything now; but I have this to say, that after the verdict of the people at the polls last election, endorsing the policy of the government, I withdrew any opposition I had to that enterprise. Now, my intention is to make the best of it that I can for the whole country, and especially for my own province. Probably the hon. gentleman will be able to tell us that he will do all he can to conserve the rights of British Columbia. We have been neglected completely in the contract, although it is the fact that British Columbia is entitled to its share of any benefit to be derived from that railway. One substantial reason for being so entitled is this: that British Columbia pays as much per head taxation to the Dominion government as all the other six provinces. All the provinces pay about $20 per head to the Dominion, while British Columbia contributes $20.60 per head; and that reason alone would entitle us to a great deal of consideration. I would impress on the hon. gentleman to use all his influence and do all in his power to have the construction of the western section commenced on the Pacific coast as soon as possible. He knows the feeling of Victoria as well as I do. He knows that Mr. Morse, agent of the Grand Trunk Pacific, went to Victoria to try to obtain from the province a grant in aid of the railway, and failing to get a promise of aid, he said emphatically that they would not commence construction at the coast until they would work their way from the east to the west. Whether Mr. Morse was authorized to make a statement of that kind, I do not know. Whether he was or not, I think he was very unguarded and very wrong in making it. He was angry with the provinces because he did not get what he asked for. What authority he had to make such a demand, I do not know; but I would impress upon my hon. friend to do all he can with the company to have a commencement made on the Pacific coast simultaneously with the construction westward from Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I am very pleased to hear my hon. friend from Victoria has withdrawn his opposition to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, and is now heartily in accord with the policy of the government in its construction. It is a sort of death-bed repentance; but nevertheless we are glad to see a change even at this late hour. I am sure he must see that the building of the railway to the Pacific coast must result in great benefit to the province. My hon. friend having seen, since he put this inquiry on the order paper, a letter written by Mr. Hays to me, has practically abandoned that part of his question, and now confines himself to the appearance of Mr. Morse in British Columbia, and the negotiations which that gentleman carried on there. It is quite true that last session, when I gave a notice to amend the private charter of incorporation of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, so as to ensure early construction of the railway on the Pacific coast, I received a letter from Mr. Hays, which I considered then, and which I consider now, binding upon that gentleman, as the representative of the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. I think it would be well, so that there may not be any mistake in future, that I should put that letter in full in the Debates of this House. Mr. Hays, it is true, did not distinctly promise that work would begin at any precise date. He did not say that work would begin simultaneously at Winnipeg and on the Pacific coast, because no one asked or expected that the company should do anything of that kind; but he made a very fair statement of the intentions of the company as to starting construction of the line. As to what Mr. Morse may have said while in British Columbia, or what negotiations he may have carried on with the provincial government, of course I am not informed. I have no means of knowing what he proposed to the British Columbia government, further than the reports of the interviews alleged to have been had with the McBride government, which have appeared in the newspapers of the west. I am bound to say, with my hon. friend, that if these reports were accurate certainly Mr. Morse was asking for a very large grant indeed from the province of British Columbia, to carry out an arrangement, which I thought then, and still think, will be carried out without any concession of that kind from the province. I took it that Mr. Hays' letter, written for a specific purpose, justified me at that time in dropping the amendment that I had proposed to the Bill. While my hon. friend thinks it does not definitely or distinctly make any promise, I think when he reads it carefully he will change his mind. The letter is as follows :—

Letter of Mr. Hays to Senator Templeman.

Montreal, Quebec, July 12, 1904.

Dear Sir,—In reference to your inquiries as to probable date when construction on the new transcontinental line will begin on the Pacific coast, I beg to say : That surveys have not yet reached that stage of completeness to enable me to fix any definite time for commencement at either end of our road.

With regard to the western end, there are many things to consider, including the important question of harbour facilities, and the nature of the country through which the road must run is such as will necessarily consume considerable time in perfecting surveys and locating the line.

I may say, however, that it will be the policy of the company to diligently prosecute to completion the surveys which have been in operation for over a year, and so soon as the progress of the surveys in British Columbia will permit, construction will be commenced from the Pacific coast to the end of the road and be carried on continuously in an easterly direction until the road is completed. In fact such action will be necessary to complete the road within the time limit.

I think this covers the point raised, and that a more definite declaration cannot at present be made.

Your reply in the Senate to an inquiry on the subject seems to cover the ground fairly and accurately.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) CHAS. M. HAYS.

Hon. Senator Templeman, Ottawa.

Notwithstanding the newspaper reports as to interviews in British Columbia and of the conferences and negotiations carried on, which of course we must always read, keeping in mind the fact that Mr. Morse was there as a promoter of a railway enterprise, trying to obtain a land subsidy from a government not too unwilling to part with their land, I have every reason to believe, apart altogether from this letter of Mr. Hays, that construction will begin at a very early date, as soon as the surveys are completed to the Pacific coast. The acquisition of the Kittemat Railway Company's charter, which carries a provincial subsidy of $5,000 per mile, and which opens up a large coal area on the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific, gives them a railway 150 miles long, which will be commenced within a year and completed within three years, and which will be used, as a feeder, at all events, to the main line of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. I am bound to say that in making this statement, I am using newspaper authority, but I have information from the promoters and original owners of the charter as well, so that notwithstanding and outside of the letter of Mr. Hays, I have no doubt whatever that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will be commenced on the Pacific coast as soon as the surveys of the company will permit. I think that is the correct policy. I agree with my hon. friend that a policy which would begin construction of a great transcontinental railway at the eastern end, and would not build a mile of track on the Pacific coast, until that section was reached from the east, would be a ridiculous one to pursue. I do not think any great railway corporation like the Grand Trunk Railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific or their contractors, would think of pursuing such a policy. I am possibly saying more than I should say, not being very well versed in railway construction; but I am speaking at all events with the approval of railway contractors whose opinion on the subject carries, with me, at all events, considerable weight.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend, in view of his being a member of the government, and in view of the reliance he places on newspaper reports, whether he or the Dominion government, have communicated with the government of British Columbia as regards any agreement entered into or any proposition made between himself and Mr. Hays in regard to the company starting construction on the Pacific coast ? I make this inquiry particularly in view of the fact that authentic newspaper reports have represented that Mr. Morse, as general manager of the company, has sought to exact from the province of British Columbia very large subsidies in consideration of beginning work on the coast, and in view of the further fact that Mr. Morse has threatened, according to the press, that unless these subsidies are granted, the road will not be commenced on the Pacific coast. There certainly should be such communication between the two governments as to prevent that condition of affairs occurring if this government is relying on the promises of the Grand Trunk Pacific to carry out the terms of the letter given to my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I have no personal knowledge that any communication has taken place between this government and the British Columbia government with respect to the terms given to the Grand Trunk Pacific, nor do I know any reason why this government should consult the British Columbia government in granting charters or making agreements regarding the building of a line of railway across the continent. At all events, as far as I know, there was no such communication, nor do I believe we should have had such communication with the British Columbia government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend think it is in the interest of the public, and more especially of his own province, in view of this arrangement between himself, as representing the Dominion government, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, that the province of British Columbia should be compelled, in the absence of information, such as he must possess, to give large subsidies for this purpose; when my hon. friend anticipates that without a subsidy the railway is certain to begin construction in British Columbia ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—My hon. friend seems to think the British Columbia government has been compelled to give large subsidies to the Grand Trunk Pacific. That is not the fact. You cannot compel British Columbia to give away money or land, and in fact they have refused, and to my mind properly refused, to give any.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It will be remembered by those who were present last session that my hon. friend from Victoria put a notice on the order paper, asking for an amendment to the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, which would have compelled the company to commence work simultaneously from the east and from the west. It will be remembered also that the Senate voted that motion down, the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Templeman), who represents the government, voting against the motion. It will also be remembered that a very short time after, for some reason—it is unnecessary to say what the reports were—the hon. gentleman himself put a notice on the order paper which would have resulted, if carried, in an amendment to the charter, compelling the Grand Trunk Pacific Company to commence work from the east and from the west at the same time. A short time afterward the hon. gentleman dropped that motion. Whether the reports which were circulated around the House at the time, were well founded, I cannot of course say——

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—What were they ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will tell the hon. gentleman if he will wait a moment. Whether they were accurate or not, I am not prepared to say; but it was whispered around the Senate, that the hon. gentleman had received intimation from Mr. Hays that he should not press that motion, because if it were carried, it would prevent the Grand Trunk Pacific Company from exacting from British Columbia aid towards the construction of the road, whether by a cash subsidy, or a land subsidy, I do not know; but it was stated that the reason the hon. gentleman dropped the motion was on account of such an intimation received by him from Mr. Hays. We know that the motion was dropped. I do not vouch for the accuracy of the report which was circulated at the time; but that the motion was dropped we know, and that it was dropped without giving any reason at that time, we know. The letter which the hon. gentleman has read, is, I think, a fair statement from a railway standpoint, but from what has transpired since, and the answer which the hon. gentleman has given to the inquiry made by my hon. friend, it is clear that there was some proof in that report, more particularly when we take the report of an interview published in the Victoria Daily 'Times,' of Friday, March 17. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows how much reliance can be placed on a report which appears in that journal; and I presume he will vouch for its accuracy. In that report I find this passage occurs :—

Mr. Morse was asked if he could give any assurance that work would commence from the Pacific terminus when that was selected. Mr. Morse's reply was most emphatic. He said the commencement of work from the western end depended entirely on the people of British Columbia ; that if aid in the way of a land grant was refused, the company would not begin work on the Pacific coast. The line would be built, on the contrary, from the east to the west, which was the way in which the road could be built the cheapest, and thus in the interest of the shareholders.

Then he goes on to say what is in the interest of the province and the country; and there is a positive declaration on the part of a gentleman in authority, that unless the British Columbia government were prepared to be held up, and to make over to that company a large land grant or aid in some other form, the road would be built from the east to the west, that being the cheapest mode of doing the work. Inferentially we have it that if a grant were made they would begin at the western end at the same time they began construction at the eastern end, though it could be built cheaper by commencing at the east and continuing section by section until they reached the Pacific coast. That is a statement made by this gentleman who occupies the very prominent position of vice-president of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. It is well that the country should know, giving as largely as they do in aid of this road, what is the real intention of the company. I think the House will disagree with my hon. friend when he says that the government has no interest in the manner in which this road should be constructed—whether it should begin at the east and west simultaneously, or begin in the east and go westerly.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I did not say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the duty of the government, in the face of this declaration, if their attention was ever called to it; and the fact of its being published in the 'Times,' which I understand is the government organ——

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Not a government organ.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It speaks on behalf of the government.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—That is right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And it enunciates the views of the government, whatever they may be. We presume the 'Times' would know what those views are; and when the 'Times' did not contain any reference to them, the presumption is that the hon. gentleman opposite, would be able, if not to dictate, at least to intimate to them what course they should pursue. It is evident, from what is taking place, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company intends to hold up that province in the manner intimated by the hon. gentleman who has brought this question before the House. And it does seem to me that in the interests of his own province, he, as a member of the government, should take action through the Railway Department, to ascertain whether Mr. Morse spoke authoritatively or whether he alone is responsible for his utterances. I think the interests of the country, of his province, and of himself, demand some action of that kind.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I have heard to-day for the first time the rumour that my hon. friend says was current around the corridors of this House, that I dropped the motion to amend the Bill which I placed on the order paper, because Mr. Hays came to me——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not that he came to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—That he had represented to me, directly or indirectly, that if that motion was carried it would be impossible for his company to go to the province of British Columbia and practically compel that government to give them a large land grant to enable them to begin construction on the Pacific coast. I beg to tell my hon. friend that it is inaccurate in every particular. No person, neither Mr. Hays or any one representing the Grand Trunk Company, ever made such a suggestion to me. It was represented to me by the law department of the government, that the amendment which I placed on the order paper and which remained there for a considerable time, infringed upon the terms of the original contract entered into between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, or at least that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company would claim it infringed upon the terms entered into between them and the government, and that the management of the Grand Trunk Railway would be compelled to obtain from their directors in London a consent to the change that I proposed to make. It was not deemed wise to imperil the Bill, or postpone its passage through this House; and I considered that if I obtained from the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company a letter reading as the letter reads I was obtaining all the promises necessary to bind that company to commence construction, when their surveys permitted, on the Pacific coast. I am bound to say that it is satisfactory to me, and I believe it is satisfactory to every person in British Columbia who is not a party politician, or who is not trying to give away the lands of that province to railway companies. My hon. friend must remember that under the terms of the agreement with this railway company, the line has to be completed in seven years. I should like to know how any railway company which is required to complete a line across the continent, or at all events, from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean, in seven years, can go to the province of British Columbia, and compel them to give one dollar or one acre of land to insure that construction work shall begin in the province. It is not in the interests of the province that they should make any grant of the kind. They will reap all the benefits of the construction at all events within a few years, and that is all our province is looking for. I think if it had not been for a few ardent politicians in the province of British Columbia suggesting to the Grand Trunk Pacific that they were open to give away some of their lands, if that company would only send out an agent to the city of Victoria and open negotiations, we would have heard nothing whatever about these alleged communications between Mr. McBride and the company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The letter is much more satisfactory than I thought it was, and it shows that what Mr. Morse has done has been done on his own account; and I think Mr. Hays can properly call for an explanation by Mr. Morse, because his statement is diametrically opposed to what Mr. Hays has written in that letter.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Quite right.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C)—With regard to the company not completing their road in the time agreed to in the contract, that does not amount to anything. We extend the charters of railways every day here, and if this company came to parliament and said, 'we are not able to complete within the time allowed and we want an extension for two or three years,' parliament would give it to them, without a single objection. I realize perfectly well the difficulty in the way of any member fastening anything on this contract unless it agreed entirely with the views of the Premier. The Premier of this country took the subject entirely in his own hands, and he and the Grand Trunk Company arranged the whole matter, and I fully exonerate my hon. friend from British Columbia (Hon. Mr. Templeman) in relation to anything that does not appear in the contract. I dare say he used his influence, but I know that the Premier rejected everything except what exactly suited his own views and those of the Grand Trunk Company. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not notice that the other day the hon. Minister of Railways, in answer to a question by one of the British Columbia members, said he was then trying to induce the company to commence construction at the coast simultaneously with construction from Winnipeg, and I dare say he will be able to accomplish that, in view of Mr. Hays' promise.

LABOUR UNION LABELS BILL.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I move that Bill (10) An Act respecting the Labour Union Labels, be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next. I was asked by parties interested in this Bill to have it restored to the order paper. While I may have my views with reference to this question, if a large body of the people of the country want to lay their views before the committee, I think they should be allowed to do so. The Bill has been amended in the House of Commons, and I think we might grant these people the right to be heard.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Objection having been taken to it, it cannot go on to-day, and the hon. gentleman will require to give notice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has not been a practice in the past to require formal notice in a matter of this kind.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—When the Bill came over from the House of Commons, any hon. gentleman could have moved the second reading of the Bill for to-day, without any notice, and its second reading could have been set down for to-day, and therefore there is no notice required.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.—A similar case occurred two years ago, in an amendment to the election law which was introduced in the House of Commons. On its being read a first time here nobody took interest in it and it was dropped. Observing some days afterwards that that was the situation, I made inquiries as to how I could have brought it before the House, and I learned then—I do not know that there was any ruling on it—that I had to give notice. I gave the notice that I would move to have it placed on the order paper, and I acted upon it. It would be perfectly regular when the Bill was read the first time, for any hon. gentleman to move that it be read a second time on a certain day, but that has not been done. Therefore, I think the proper way is to give notice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is giving notice that he will move the second reading on a certain day.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If it requires a notice of motion, I am willing to give the notice, but I ask the ruling of the Speaker. I think it is still before the House.

The SPEAKER—As there has been no action taken on the Bill after its first reading, I take it for granted that this motion is a formal one to place the Bill on the order paper for a second reading at a certain date, and that could be moved at any time. Therefore, I declare the motion in order.

The motion was agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

First report of joint committee adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adoption of the first report of the joint committee of both Houses on the Library of Parliament. He said :

This report is purely formal. It states that the committee met a first time on the 23rd March, that the report of the librarians was prepared and adopted, that a sub-committee was appointed to audit the Library account and that plans for the library extension were laid before the committee and referred to the two Speakers and the two librarians. It is simply a history of what has taken place.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN. As the question of the Library has come up, I may say that we are in need of a good dictionary. There is in the Library a dictionary of colossal proportions, but it only reached C or G a couple of years ago, and I do not know whether it is going to be continued or not. I simply throw out this reminder and suggest that some dictionary like the Century should be purchased in the meantime. Perhaps it might be ascertained whether the Imperial dictionary, to which I have referred, is in a state of suspension or whether it is dead altogether.

The motion was agreed to.

PACKING AND SALE OF STAPLE COMMODITIES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (121) An Act to amend the Act respecting the packing and sale of certain Staple Commodities.

In the committee.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This is a Bill which the House will observe is intended to prescribe a certain size for apple boxes. A small penalty is fixed if after a certain date, namely, July 1st, 1906, apples are packed in boxes for export or exposed for sale in any other size of boxes than is here described. I may mention that this question has been discussed for several years by the Fruit Growers' Associations throughout the Dominion, and I believe that they have unanimously advised that the size of a box shall be fixed by statute, as is the case in respect of barrels and other packages in which similar fruits are offered for sale. There has been some little doubt as to what size of box would be best, but the preponderance of opinion appeared to be in favour of the size described here—a box 10 x 11 x 20—which is about one-third the size of an ordinary apple barrel. The British Columbia Association passed a resolution affirming this in 1902. The Ontario Association had it before them for some time, and after letting it stand over for a year, they passed a similar resolution in 1903. This was endorsed in Quebec by the Quebec Pomological Society, which recommended a box of the same size as is described here. In 1904 the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association meeting at Bridgewater, passed a similar resolution, also recommending a box of this size. In February the Prince Edward Island Association at Charlottetown, recommended the same size. The matter has now been for perhaps two or three years before the several fruit growers' associations, and although, as I have said, there is some slight difference of opinion as to the size which would best suit the different markets, they are all agreed that it is desirable that a box of uniform size should be prescribed by parliament, and that, in particular, persons sending out apples for export, unless they pack them in trays, for which special provision is made, should be required to use a box of this description.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does this Bill apply to domestic apples ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Bill refers to export. It does not appear to apply to anything but apples shipped out of the country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the word export apply to all the paragraphs?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think so. I think the provision applies exclusively to apples for export. The hon. gentleman will see that the words are repeated in all the clauses.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—Does this prohibit the use of barrels ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No. It merely provides for the use of boxes of a standard size. There has been a demand on the part of English merchants that apples shall be sent in smaller packages than barrels, and it is obvious that if boxes are used it is desirable that they should be of uniform size. Otherwise there would be danger of confusion and possibly of litigation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman appears to me not to have fully comprehended the effect of this measure. He is a strong advocate apparently of uniformity in the size of packages ; but this Bill will not produce uniformity. It simply provides for a minimum size of box. It does not provide against boxes being made larger than the specified size. I regard the measure as a very inconsequential one indeed. It simply provides that if apples are packed in boxes, the boxes shall not be less than a certain size, and therefore uniformity will not be the result of this legislation. My hon. friend read the resolutions passed by the fruit growers' associations in the different provinces. If they are examined closely it will be found that the desire was for uniformity. I know that was the case with the fruit growers of Prince Edward Island. This is the same sort of legislation that we have on the subject of apple barrels, and I consider it very bad legislation indeed. We should have a uniform barrel, and a uniform box, so that every barrel or box of Canadian apples sent to any market in the world would be of the same capacity. We have established a minimum barrel, and I presume it is intended that three of these boxes should fill a barrel, but our legislation is that 96 quarts shall be the minimum size of our barrel. That corresponds, not in the shape of the barrel, but in size, with the United States apple-barrels, but in the province of Ontario and perhaps also in the province of Quebec a very large proportion of apples are shipped in second-quality flour barrels, and we are very much at sea on the subject. It is very desirable that we should have uniformity. I am not opposing this Bill, but it is very insufficient and will be of little assistance.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The fear the hon. gentleman expresses is not likely to be realized. My experience of trade is that if you buy a box of anything you will not be in the slightest degree in danger of receiving more than the prescribed size. If the inhabitants of any particular province are in the habit of giving large measure, heaped up and running over, they are a distinguished exception to the usual rules of trade that prevail in these articles.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I consider the proposed change a very desirable one. The reception that our fruit has met with in the English market, in view of the methods of shipping that have been employed, has not been at all satisfactory to our shippers. Our fruit crop is quite extensive, and is becoming greater all the time. If this legislation will improve the standard of our fruit, and place it in the English market in a more acceptable form to the English consumer, it is commendable ; and my impression is that it will have such an effect, for this reason, that there are many people who would willingly buy a box of apples of this size, who perhaps would not care to buy a barrel. They can also, in purchasing a box of apples, easily shake it up and see what it contains to the bottom. There will not be the same likelihood of putting poor apples in the centre as there would be in packing barrels. We know there has been a very general and loud complaint in regard to apples shipped to England, that in the tops of the barrels in many cases the fruit is better than in the middle of the barrel. That could not occur to the same extent when fruit is packed in boxes, and if they are shipped in that way they will command better prices. There are many people who would buy a box who would not feel inclined to buy a barrel of apples. I commend the effort to place our fruit under the eye of the British consumer in better shape than it has been in the past. There is no country in the world more advantageously situated to produce good fruit than Canada, and we produce it ; but in many cases unfortunately it gets mixed up in barrelling and the result is that the reputation of our exports has not been such as we had a right to expect. If this measure will bring about a change for the better, it should commend itself to the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As an illustration of the force of my hon. friend's observations, I have just been reminded that a gentleman on the Ottawa river, a Major Sheppard, has for many years been in the habit of sending his fruit to Scotland and England and in all cases he realizes at the rate of $7 to $8 per barrel. That would be possible to a very much larger extent, if fruit growers took the trouble to put up their fruit in the way indicated when sending it abroad. The value of Canadian fruit could be more than doubled if growers and packers were more honest in their methods of putting up their packages. Certainly the reduction of the package from a barrel to a box is an admirable one, because there will be less opportunity for fraud and deception. A purchaser can turn up the box one way or the other, and examine the fruit without trouble. Every shipper could do as well as Major Sheppard, if he were to put up fruit just as the placard attached to the box represented it to be, and he could get more than double the general price.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think any one will dispute the premises laid down by the Secretary of State and the hon. gentleman from Wellington. We know that frauds are committed, and if any legislation could prevent that, it would be in the interests, not only of the buyer, but of the seller. The question is will a Bill of this character accomplish the end which I have mentioned. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he made the first explanation, said the desire of the government and the object of this Bill was to establish uniformity in the packages. The measure does not accomplish that; on the contrary it provides only what the minimum size of the box shall be. It has no reference whatever to a larger box. The Minister of Trade and Commerce meets that argument by facetiously saying that no one is likely to give more apples than are called for by the standard box. Certainly not, but that does not prevent the shipper from shipping his apples in any larger sized box if he pleases, and consequently the object in view is not accomplished by this Bill. That is the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. More than that, clause 4b, exempts certain boxes from the operation of the Bill, another evidence that it will not produce anything like uniformity. It says :

4b. When apples are packed in boxes or barrels having trays or fillers wherein it is intended to have a separate compartment for each apple, then the provisions of sections 4 and 4a shall not apply.

One can understand the advantages of having separate compartments for each apple. The apples would be likely to be shipped in such a way that they would be received in much better condition, particularly if they were covered, as oranges from Florida are, each one wrapped in tissue paper. Anything that will accomplish the object, so much desired, of preventing fraud, and bringing about uniformity in the size of the boxes, so that people will know exactly what they are getting, will be beneficial to the trade. The only point is, the Minister of Agriculture has not in this Bill provided for uniformity. Had he said that a box might be double or treble the size, but must be uniform, the object would have been accomplished.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend from Wellington is partly right when he says, that where a box is used, instead of a barrel, there is not the same opportunity for practising fraud, that is in facing, because the box when opened will disclose a larger proportion of the contents than in the case of a barrel. That is the only advantage to be gained by substituting a box for the barrel. If my hon. friend the Secretary of State was right in the information given to the House of the success of Major Sheppard's exportations, and apple-growers and shippers in this country were made acquainted with it, I imagine they would not be long in adopting boxes, and discarding barrels. They would be getting $7 or $8, instead of $1 to $3, per barrel. I am sorry to say that while possibly some gilt-edged shipment, striking an exceptionally good market, may have brought fancy prices such as have been quoted, no such prices are likely to be obtained for good apples in boxes or in barrels. In fact, the advantages are not very great. The cost of three boxes is greater than that of one barrel, and the difficulty of packing is also greater. It requires an expert to pack apples properly in boxes, in order to fill the box without bruising the fruit or without leaving any vacant spaces. In California and Oregon, and to some extent in British Columbia, shippers are packing in boxes, and they have to employ expert packers, who can do the work successfully. I was at one of our exhibitions this winter, where an expert gave illustrations ; and he amazed me when he said there were sixty-five combinations known to experts in packing in boxes of the dimensions described in this Bill. Hon. gentlemen can see that when four apples placed in a certain position might be too large, three might not be enough to fill the row, and it is then necessary to resort to what are known as combinations. Some of the apples are placed on their side and some flat. There are other devices known to experts ; but those who are not expert, if they tried to do such work, would find that they would be costly apples before they were packed. Only a few days ago I happened to be in the market division of the Department of Agriculture, where they receive very valuable reports of the markets, and I saw one instance where a very good consignment of apples had gone forward in boxes, the fruit wrapped in paper, and yet the prices ranged from 4 shillings to 7 shillings per box. The shipment consisted of first-class fruit, marketed in good condition, and yet that was the price received. In other words they brought from $3 to a little over $5 a barrel in England. Major Sheppard is not the only grower in Canada who sends his apples to England in boxes. It has been tried extensively all over Canada, and while some very good results have been obtained—I think the prices on the whole are better than when the fruit was shipped in barrels—yet I am sorry to say that such a result as Major Sheppard has obtained, if it has ever been obtained, must have been under very peculiar circumstances, and in a very peculiar condition of the market. Such prices do not prevail. I am also under the impression that Major Sheppard uses fillers or trays in his boxes as provided for in the 4th clause of the Bill, and if he does, I can easily understand that apples packed with such great care would commend themselves to consumers ; but that class of trade is expressly exempted from the provisions of this Bill. I do not think the Bill will do very much good. It is establishing a minimum barrel, and that is about all. It will not necessarily bring about uniformity. It would be well worth consideration whether a little more liberty should not be given with regard to the length, depth and width of the boxes. For instance, a packer may find, owing to the size of his apples, that he cannot get the requisite number of rows in without the package being a little too slack, or a little too full, if he makes the boxes exactly as described here ; whereas if there was liberty to call either the 10 inches or the 11 inches the width of the box as might be found most convenient, he would be able to pack his apples much more easily than if the box were made the other way, because he could put the tiers in to better advantage. However, it is only a small point, because I am sure no inspector would find an infringement of the Act if the box was 10 x 11 x 20, whether the eleven or ten was made the top of the box, because the capacity of the box would be precisely the same in either case.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—If the hon. gentleman from Marshfield would reflect for a moment, he would see that if this variation in the size of the boxes were allowed, it would make the shipment of them more difficult. The idea I gather is that not only should the packages contain a certain number of cubic inches, but they should all be of the same size, so as to economize space in shipping by rail or steamer, thereby enabling the steamship companies to give better rates, because the boxes can be packed more closely together. There is one point which seems to have been overlooked, and one which I had the honour of laying before the House of Commons with regard to the inspection of apples. While a great deal of care has been exercised with regard to the packing of fruit, no one can deny the fact that through the recklessness and carelessness, or shall I say greed, of some of our shippers, the market for Canadian apples has not been what it should be; and while I hold that the greatest care should be taken that people buying our apples should receive a specified quantity—whether in box or barrel—it is of more consequence to the English people and to the Canadian shippers that the fruit should be sound and good in every respect. If our fruit-growers and packers were aware of the fact that before a shipment could take place from any of our ports, a government officer would be in attendance, and if a certain percentage of the boxes or barrels opened were not up to the standard, none of that fruit would be allowed to be shipped, but would be thrown back on the hands of the exporter, the result would be that Canada would get what she has a right to get, a first place in the English market for her fruit. I want to say to the credit of Nova Scotia people, that they send their fruit out in the best possible way. It is fruit of the highest grade, and receives the greatest attention at the hands of the British public, and commands the highest prices, simply because the packers are honest in packing their fruit. The farmer sells the produce of his orchard to a packer who ships the apples in his own barrels to the seaboard or direct to Liverpool, in his own name, or in the name of an agent in England. If the farmer were allowed to pack his own apples, and compelled to put his name and the name of his farm, or the number of his lot, upon each package, then if the fruit were found to be improperly packed, he could be made liable and sued for damages. It would soon put a stop to the attempts which are made to palm off unsound fruit on the British market. That is one of the things that our people have more right to feel aggrieved at than about the size of the packages. Fruit, if properly packed, will arrive in the British market in good condition, but the trouble in the past and the trouble today, until some stringent measures are taken, is that good apples are put at the ends of the packages, especially in barrels, while the apples in the middle are of inferior quality. The result has been our shippers and men in the commission business have had large quantities cast on their hands, and it has destroyed the name of our Canadian apples in the English market. The government ought to take stringent measures with regard to this matter; and have qualified officers to take the same precautions with the shipping of fruit that are taken with the shipping of herrings. The herrings, after being cured and barrelled, are examined by a government officer. He has a certain number of barrels opened in every shipment, and if the herring are not properly packed or of proper quality, he refuses to put the Crown brand on them. The result is that herring of inferior quality cannot be shipped. If the same thing were done in regard to fruit, and the government became responsible for the quality of the fruit on which the inspector puts the Crown brand, it would receive in the British market the consideration it deserves.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am very glad the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Hon. Mr. Gibson) has addressed these observations to the packers of Ontario, and I hope that his wishes may be realized, and that the time may soon come when the packers of Ontario will have reached the moral level on which the packers of the Lower Provinces now stand. It is not often we get the Ontario people to admit the fact that they are behind the Lower Provinces, but we ought to hail this confession—in fact it is a brilliant flash of enlightenment.

What the hon. gentleman said is very proper, but really it is not pertinent to the Bill before the House. It was only last year or the year before we passed an amendment to the Inspection Act, providing some guarantee that the apples shipped in barrels should be at any rate nearly of the quality represented. This particular measure is dealing simply with the packing of apples in boxes; and while the measure is not perfect—no human measure is—it goes in the right direction. It provides that the apples, when they are packed for export in boxes, shall be put up in boxes of not less than certain dimensions; and, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says, if a man is to be paid so much for a box he will generally not make the box unduly large. He will bring it up to the standard, but not much beyond that.

I wish to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that the Bill does really prescribe a size for the package. It says that the box shall represent, as nearly as possible, 2,200 cubic inches. If a box runs a cubic inch or so over that, it does not hurt any one; but the box is to contain 2,200 cubic inches. This measure is a step in the right direction, and the people who know most about the subject and who are most interested in it, appear as a whole to have approved of it; and our best plan is to follow their example.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend from Lincoln certainly gave our friends down east a good name with regard to the manner in which they pack their apples; but I am afraid if my hon. friend had a little closer acquaintance with our apples in the east, he might be inclined to modify that opinion to a certain extent. In the first place, growers will have to pack their apples pretty much as they have them. They will grade their apples, first quality, No. 1; and seconds, No. 2; and if they happen to have a bad crop, it will be hard to put good ones in either boxes or barrels. This year in Nova Scotia there was a poor crop of apples—considerable in quantity, but poor in quality—and all the growers and packers in that part of the country did not conform to the high standard my hon. friend from Lincoln referred to, as evidenced by the fact that one of the St. John papers, not more than a month ago, gave the Ontario packers very much more credit for faithful packing than the Nova Scotia people, and added, in no very complimentary words, that some of the Annapolis packers ought to be sent to the penitentiary. I do not know that I am called upon to defend the government in this House. They have very able defenders here, and it is not necessary for any one on this side of the House to take up their defence; but I want to say a word in their favour in connection with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Hon. Mr. Gibson.) He appears to be oblivious of the fact that we have a Fruit Marks Act in this country, an Act to which we gave a great deal of attention in this House when it was going through, and which we amended in some very important particulars in the Senate. I had the support of the hon. member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) in making those amendments. It is an Act which is working admirably. Only last week I was in the market division of the Department of Agriculture, and I was there shown the reports of the inspectors in Halifax on every lot of apples that have been shipped on the different steamers sailing from the port of Halifax this winter. Two inspectors were stationed there, and each lot of apples was inspected. Many barrels were opened, and there is a very elaborate and complete report on the quality and packing of this fruit, and very faithfully and well done. I believe that the operation of the Fruit Marks Act has done a great deal to improve the quality of the apples packed in Canada, especially for export; and I know that many of the growers and shippers of apples sell a very much worse quality of apples on the domestic market than they export. They have learned now that it is foolish of them to try to play any tricks on the British market, because the eyes of the British public have been opened, and if a seamy lot arrives on the market it is sure to sell at a bad price, and the exporter is promptly punished for his lack of foresight. Not only so, but he is liable to a penalty under the Fruit Marks Act if it is found, before shipment, that his apples are not honestly packed. I believe the Act is working well, and the remarks of my hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) with regard to our export apple trade are hardly fair as applied to the trade to-day. Several years ago it may have been true that very considerable portions of our apples were put up carelessly or fraudulently, but that time is passing away; and I shall be very sorry if my hon. friend's observations—well meant, no doubt, they are—should go forth as fixing a stigma, which is undeserved to-day, upon the apples we are exporting to foreign countries. A great improvement has been effected, and we should be very glad here to note that improvement, and to add a word of such a nature as would help to advance the reputation of our apples instead of saying things which are only applicable to the trade a few years ago, but which are not correct to-day, and are calculated to injure the name of our fruit before the world.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend seems to think that the remarks that I made were for the purpose of destroying the trade of Canada, in connection with the shipping of the apples. On the contrary, my remarks were intended to raise the standard if possible, and while I have no doubt that my hon. friend, on going to the Department of Agriculture, saw satisfactory reports made by the different inspectors with regard to the shipment of fruit, at the same time it cannot be denied that large shippers frequently find that on the arrival of the fruit at Liverpool they have to take a less rate than they ought to accept, on account of the condition in which the fruit arrives there. If this inspection is as good as my hon. friend says, why should these shippers be obliged to take a less rate for their fruit because of the unsatisfactory condition in which it arrives. If the inspection and packing is proper, it would arrive in proper shape. The time occupied in crossing the Atlantic is very short. They have the cold storage system on all our fast steamers, and the fruit receives from the hands of the steamship company every consideration, but I want to say to my hon. friend that while there is an improvement and an improvement of which we are all glad, at the same time I do not think that we have reached that state of perfection that we ought to have reached, after all the years we have been shipping apples and fruit to the old country. The fact of the matter is that it is not because of the means that my hon. friend has spoken about, but simply the loss to the shippers themselves, that has caused them, more than anything else, to improve the quality of the apples that they have been shipping in the past. I do not know what was done in Nova Scotia. I was not in the London market last year, but I do say—and I was proud as a Canadian to know—that in London market our Canadian fruit, especially that coming from Annapolis, N.S., reached the highest state of perfection ; and the highest price paid for any fruit in the London market was paid for Canadian fruit. I have no doubt that if our fruit growers in the west, whether the fruit is shipped by the grower himself or by the man who buys it, were to take as much care as the hon. Secretary of State mentions,—if our apples were as well packed as our eggs are, and reached the British market in as good shape, we would get as high a price for apples grown in Canada as is realized for those produced in the old country, where they are grown under great difficulties. I have no wish to disparage the trade of Canada. I am as anxious as any man in this House can be, to see the trade improved, and to see the condition of our shipments improve, and until this is done we cannot hope to attain the position we ought to hold. It is not because of good shipments not always being made, but it is the poor shipments that are sometimes made which destroy the trade of the honest man. The honest man has not the same chance as the man who sends the fruit away in a bad state. In my own town, within a few miles of where I live, I have bought apples, and told the man I would give him a dollar a barrel more if he would handpack them, and in the fall of the year when they were opened, they were found to be all rotten. He put windfalls in them. If these barrels had been examined by the government inspector before they left his orchard or before they were sent out for exportation, I would not have been defrauded by that farmer. Needless to say, he never offered to sell me any more apples. On another occasion I met a man on the street one day who offered me some very large strawberries. He wanted something like ten or twenty cents extra on account of the grade. I bought them on the street and had them sent to my house thinking we would have a treat with the nice big strawberries. When they were brought from the kitchen to the dining room, they were found to be very ordinary strawberries. He had defrauded me out of twenty cents extra, which he pocketed.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What do you expect from Ontario ?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—We have a right to expect the same from Ontario as we would expect from Nova Scotia or anywhere else. I do not want any reflections on Ontario from Halifax, but I do hope that the government will insist upon a proper inspection of our fruit. The package is an important matter, but I hold that the inspection is also important, and as I said a moment ago if these men knew that their apples were to be held either in Quebec or Montreal, and would not be shipped away because of the inferiority of the packing or the inferiority of the apples, then I say that the standard of apple shipping would be very much improved over what it is at the present time.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Reading over this clause, I think that it would be necessary to make some alteration in clause 4A. A few years ago I know that from our section of the country a very large number of people shipped apples to Chicago and got a very good return for them that year. That year the United States crop had almost entirely failed while we in Canada had a fairly good crop. We shipped from our section and paid the duty and got a net return of about $3 a barrel. If anything of that kind occurred again, you could not ship apples to the United States unless you shipped them in those boxes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Or barrels.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They have to be of a certain size. I should suggest that you make it read 'When apples are shipped across the Atlantic.' I think this is intended only for apples shipped to the British market.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If you ship under this clause you are precluded from shipping to the United States, unless you put them in the boxes, and these boxes are intended for the British market largely. In the United States they pack all their apples in barrels, and if anything should happen that there was a shortage in their crop you might find a very large outlet there for your surplus apples.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This provision does not prevent that.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—You can still send them out in barrels.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Might I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, have we the power under the Fruit Marks Act to send inspectors to Boston, Portland or New York, to inspect Canadian fruit going forward, or would we have to do it at the boundary?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am speaking from recollection, but I think we would have to do it in our own territory and in our own ports.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

INSPECTION AND SALE OF SEEDS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (7) An Act respecting the Inspection and Sale of Seeds. He said :

The object of this measure is to prevent, as far as possible, the dissemination of seeds with an admixture of injurious weed seeds. For some years past an educational work has been carried on by the Agriculture Department in sending out bulletins to the various agricultural societies and to the leading farmers of the country, calling their attention to the importance of adopting some system by which the seeds, those relating to the cereals, grasses, clover and forage plants should not contain more than a certain percentage of noxious weeds. Two years ago a Bill was introduced in the other chamber on those lines, and after being discussed there for some time, it was withdrawn with a view of giving it a wider publicity and bringing the subject more fully to the notice of the parties who were interested. Again in 1904 a Bill, improved and enlarged, was introduced in the House of Commons. That also, at the suggestion of the members, after giving it a fair discussion and drawing attention of the public to it, was withdrawn. The present Bill, I may say, is the result of repeated discussions by those who have taken an interest in the subject, and they are legion ; and I think the measure has been brought now to such a stage as to make it acceptable, at all events to the great majority of those who are affected by it. The farmers, as a rule, are in favour of the Bill. The seedsmen for some time made a very strenuous opposition to the Bill. They naturally regarded it as interfering with their trade. At the same time it ought to be remembered that we ought not to be behind other countries in legislation of this nature. They have not only in Europe, but also on this continent on the other side of the boundary line, legislation providing for the freedom of seeds from noxious weeds. In no country in the world is it of as much importance as it is in Canada. We are year by year bringing under cultivation the virgin soil, and it does seem to me to be very regrettable that we should destroy the value of that land, perhaps in the very first crop, by placing in it noxious weeds that cannot be got rid of in a life-time, so that we cannot overrate the importance of a Bill of this character. Of course it will meet with very considerable opposition, because parties think it is interfering with their domestic trade, with the seed they have to sell. The farmer perhaps gets his seeds cheaper if they happen to pass through the hands of a well-known seedsman and sold under warranty, but he is not perhaps prepared to pay a higher price. But certainly there can be no comparison between seeds that are absolutely free, the seeds to which I have referred—that is, cereals, clovers and grass seeds—as free as possible from noxious weeds, and seeds that contain from 15 to 30 per cent of noxious weeds, bringing crops of mustard and thistles and other injurious plants into existence, destroying the value of the land by fouling it for many years to come.

The object of this Bill is to enable all parties to obtain pure seed. No doubt a very great improvement has been made in consequence of the introduction of this Bill. The seedsmen have been adapting the trade to the conditions that will prevail hereafter, when this Act comes into operation. The Act will not apply as between the farmer and the person who purchases from the farmer with full knowledge that the seed he buys is not guaranteed or warranted. Farmers very often exchange seed with each other. They know pretty well the character of the seed from having seen the plants growing on the soil, and in that way there is no deception. Of course if a man chooses to buy foul seed with a full knowledge of what he is doing, you cannot perhaps interfere with his liberty of action, or if he chooses to grow his own seed and foul his land ; but his education, once begun, is sure to grow in the proper direction. There will be an increasing desire year by year to obtain seed which is free from injurious and noxious weeds. The penalties are very low to start with and there are of course exceptions in the Bill which free it from anything like an arbitrary character. It is rather with a view of enabling persons to buy their seeds free from noxious weeds, and certainly we must at all events approve of any legislation that is directed to work so desirable an end. The Bill of course can be much more fully discussed in committee in various details. One hon. gentleman has already announced an amendment, which might be considered in committee, which I am not prepared to discuss at the present time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think every one in Canada who has given the slightest thought to the subject which we are now considering will agree with the remarks made by the hon. Secretary of State, that every possible precaution should be taken to secure a pure seed unadulterated by weeds, and it will be the duty of parliament to enact any legislation which can possibly accomplish that object. The simple question is whether the Bill under consideration will have that effect, or whether, when we come to examine the details, it will not be found to be absolutely impracticable to carry out the provisions. It may be said—and it has been said in this discussion—that the seedsman can procure machinery by which to extract the weed seeds from the grain itself. We know that in Ontario a large amount of money has been spent in order to procure machinery to accomplish the object which this Bill has in view, but it is a mistake to suppose that a few hundred dollars will accomplish it. I have under my hand a letter showing that in Ontario one firm in particular who deal in seeds have expended thousands of dollars in an effort to accomplish the result this Bill has in view, but that notwithstanding all the improved machinery that has been invented it has been found impossible to fully accomplish that object. This report is very voluminous, but perhaps the Secretary of State would have time to look through it. If so, he will find that after the most exhaustive investigation which has taken place in England by the Departmental Committee of the Board of Agriculture, they have found it impossible to accomplish the object which the Minister of Agriculture and the government have in view in presenting this Bill to the House. While I am making some running observations in regard to this matter. I will read some suggestions made by those who are acquainted with the subject, in order that they may be considered when they go into committee. I am not rising for the purpose of opposing the principle of the Bill; on the contrary our desire should be to make it as perfect as possible. When you come to look at it and read the third and fourth clauses, you will see that they provide for the placing on every package of seed the names of no less than twenty-five varieties of noxious weeds. When you come to take the number of little packages we have, I think it will be found to be an impossibility. Then the hon. Secretary of State said the farmers were in favour of this Bill. The farmers were so far as I could learn as much opposed to the principle of the Bill, as originally introduced, as the seedsmen themselves, but the second subsection of clause 3 relieves the farmers of a certain portion of the responsibility which might attach to them, and it goes so far that it seems to me it will destroy the the object that the Bill has in view. That result will be avoided to a certain extent, if the amendment which is proposed by the hon. senator from Wellington be adopted, but whether that clause should not go further is a question which should be considered. It seems to me that the purchaser should secure that certificate and not the farmer. If you look at the Bill carefully, you will find that the provisions cannot be carried out. There is one clause which perhaps might remove some of the difficulty. But clause 5 might destroy the whole object of the Bill. Clause 5 gives to the Governor in Council through the Minister of Agriculture the power to change and amend the law and all the regulations. What political pressure may be brought to bear at any time is hard to say. The Bill says :

5. The Governor in Council may make regulations determining the maximum proportion of seeds of the weeds named in sections 3 and 4 of this Act, that may be tolerated in any seeds without affecting their character as being within the meaning of the said sections free from the seeds of the said weeds.

Then you will observe in clause 6 provision is made that a man shall be subject to a penalty if there is a greater proportion of weeds than five in one thousand of the seed sold or offered for sale, or held in the possession of any dealer for sale. How that is to be determined the law attempts to point out by providing in one clause that a certain number shall be germinable, something like 99 per cent. The English report shows that sometimes it takes weeks and weeks before you can ascertain whether the seed is germinable or not. Some seeds, as we all know, will germinate in a very short time, while other seeds will lie in the ground for years before they will germinate, particularly that seed to which my hon. friend referred, the wild mustard. That has been known to be underground for years and years, and when turned up again it germinates. How that part is to be accomplished is a marvel.

I could go into a discussion of each of these clauses—I have taken the trouble to look through the Bill carefully—but I will not detain the House by doing so. I will, however, read some of the suggestions in order that they may be placed on record for consideration when the Bill comes up again. While the seed of the farmer should be not only looked after, but should be protected against frauds of this kind, we should consider well whether in passing a Bill of this character we do not jeopardize the trade of every seedsman in the country. We must consider whether under this Bill with the heavy penalties attached to violations of it, seedsmen would run the risk of carrying on their business, or whether we would not only ruin their business, but compel them to drop it. If that is the case, with the facilities offered now for the procuring of purer seed than can be obtained by the seedsman, we should be careful how far we go in the direction of destroying that trade, or if not destroying it, placing the seedsman in the position of being subject to enormous penalties. I freely admit that the suggestions which I am about to place before the House are from the seedsmen ; but they are an important class of people in this country, and if their trade be destroyed you can scarcely expect the farmers to obtain the expensive machinery necessary to clean their seed. Nor will it be necessary under the clause of this Bill, which gives them the power and the right to sell to other farmers any kind or quality of seed they may have in their possession. It may be the rankest and foulest that is grown. It is quite true, as the hon. Secretary of State says, that certain seeds once they get into the ground are very difficult to eradicate, and there has not been sufficient attention paid to the character of the seed which has been sown, particularly in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories. Those who have travelled through that country during or just before the harvest would be very strongly impressed with the necessity of securing a purer class of seed. The soil is very rich and weeds always grow more rapidly than grain ; but under this clause of the measure, there is nothing to prevent the perpetuation of this evil either there or in any other part of the country. Unfortunately in Ontario we see, in various parts of the country, fields that are completely yellow with wild mustard. It grows so thickly that one can scarcely see the grain. Take seed from a field of that kind, and the farmer who grows it can sell it to his neighbour and thus perpetuate the evil—not only perpetuate, but increase and spread it. If the product of such a field be sent to a seedsman who knows his duty and has the machinery for cleaning it, he will take a very large proportion of the noxious seed out of it. There are other seeds which scarcely any machine will separate from the pure grain. It is with seeds as with minerals. Take alluvial diggings in the gold fields : there is a certain black sand nearly if not quite as heavy as the particles of gold, which sinks to the bottom with the gold, and it is only by using expensive machinery and electricity and the application of quicksilver that it can be extracted from the gold itself. That applies with almost equal force to the seeds of certain weeds that are noxious, weeds which grow with the grain, and further this Bill provides that unless 99 per cent of the seed sold proves to be good the seller is subject to a penalty of $25. These are points which require a great deal of consideration. While we are protecting the farmer and the country, we should be careful not to destroy by our legislation any particular trade in the country, in which large amounts of money are invested. Subsection D of clause 7 puzzles me. It says that the provisions contained in this Bill shall not apply to seed marked 'screenings' and held or sold for export only. Why that should be done I am at a loss to know, while you prevent the export of the purer kinds of grain. We should look after the interest not only of our farmers, but of foreigners besides.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is for feeding purposes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you want to accomplish the object that is intended, then you should provide that such seeds be ground before being fed, because every one knows that in using screenings which contain large quantities of noxious seeds for feeding purposes they are scattered by the animals and fowl to which they are fed. Provision should be made that such seed should be ground to prevent them germinating. The suggestions which have been sent to me are as follows :

2. The trade having on hand a supply of seeds purchased in good faith and not anticipating any such stringent measure, have no opportunity of disposing of their present holdings until the approach of another season's trade ; the date of the Act coming into operation will therefore entail a very serious hardship.

3. While it might be possible to get small samples of the seeds mentioned in this Act pure, no seedsman would undertake to sell seeds under the penalties exacted in clause 7, because to obtain absolute purity in large quantities would be impossible.

3. According to the reading of this clause it would appear that the Act applies to all seeds whether intended for use in Canada or for export to foreign countries.

4. It is not clear but that all seeds in the possession of seed merchants, are subject to the penalties under the Act, whether such seeds have been recleaned or are in store for the purpose of being recleaned.

4. In view of the severe penalties under the Act, the seedsman has no protection against unscrupulous purchasers, who after emptying the bags bearing the seedsman's brand, might refill them with seeds of an inferior quality.

That trick was attempted during the last election, when one candidate desired to ruin the reputation of his opponent by getting a certain amount of seed and having it examined, when it was found to be very impure, and he published that to the farmers. It turned out on investigation that the seed was not sold by the candidate at all. However, such frauds are punishable under the law. The suggestions continue :

4. The proposed system of marking the bags and grading the seed would interfere with our foreign trade, as European seedsmen have their own methods of selling, and no marks are permitted on bags excepting the initials of the purchaser and destination for shipping purposes.

4. The proposed number of grades is quite inadequate for the practical carrying on of the trade.

5. Adulteration is not sufficiently provided against.

5. Germination.—It would be impossible to carry on business with the restrictions under this Act in regard to germination. A seedsman will receive a car of seed and possibly ship it out the same day. How could germination be tested under these circumstances ?

6. Why is the seedsman alone liable to criminal prosecution under this Act, while the grower who is responsible for evils this legislation is intended to cure, is exempt from the penalties ? This is certainly an injustice.

In other words, it is making that an offence in one for which the other is not liable, and the discrimination favours the man who grows and produces the article.—

No provision is made for seeds in warehouses or stores for purpose of being recleaned, or while in transit to such warehouses or stores for purposes of recleaning.

15. The principle of paying an informer any portion of a fine is pernicious and should have no place in the Act. No limit is fixed as to the time when the vendor's responsibility ceases.

I am not prepared to adopt in its entirety this last suggestion. We know in the administration of many of our laws it is almost absolutely necessary to make some provision to recoup any expenses incurred by the informer or to give a certain portion of the penalty to him, otherwise you would never be able to find out and punish the frauds. I have many other documents of a much more elaborate nature here, and other suggestions which we can bring up when the House is in committee. I deemed it advisable to make these few remarks for the purpose of bringing to the notice of the House the importance of the Bill and the necessity for making certain amendments in order to render it workable and to accomplish the object in view. I have already said that the suggestion of the hon.

senator from Wellington, while to a certain extent a good one, does not go as far as it should go to accomplish the object he has in view.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I do not find any fault with the principle of the Bill—I think every member is in full sympathy with the object in view; but whether or not it will be an advantage in its present form, is a question. I know full well the hardships of the agriculturists of the country in trying to contend with noxious weeds. Whether this Bill will relieve them of this hardship, or increase the hardship, is a difficult question to be decided. I know the Minister of Agriculture has conferred a good deal with seedsmen and farmers. He has had before him delegations in connection with the measure. We are entitled, before we are called upon to pass this Bill, to have all the information we can get about it. The measure touches a very important industry. When you touch the agricultural industry you are touching what has been, what is and what will be for all time the greatest industry of the Dominion, and anything that may affect it should be done in a very careful manner. I would suggest therefore that the hon. Secretary of State should appoint a committee to which the Bill could be referred. We could have the advantage of all the information that is possible to be procured from the outside as well as from individual members of the Senate. If the Bill should go before a committee of the Whole House we would not have the advantage of that information. If the Secretary of State does not care to send the Bill to a select committee, but would prefer one of the standing committees, I have no objection. I do not wish at this stage of the Bill to point out the clauses to which I might take exception. They can be more fully dealt with when we reach them in committee. I feel that the seedsmen and farmers of the country should co-operate if they are going to prevent the spread of noxious weeds. In our district at least that co-operation is going on. The seedsmen go round and select the cleanest farms they can find and purchase the seed grown there. The seedsmen have to put in machinery which is too expensive for the farmer, and with it they clean the best seed and retail it to the farmers. In this way they are trying to do away with noxious weeds as far as possible. But I do not wish to go further into the question than to ask the Secretary of State if he will let us have a committee to deal with this question where we would be able to get outside information, so that when it comes to us to deal with it, we will be able to do so intelligently.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I trust the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Lindsay will be acted upon by the hon. Secretary of State. Like the hon. gentleman from Lindsay, I have a good deal of correspondence with regard to this measure and I am sure we could not properly deal with it in a committee of the Whole House. It would be wisdom on our part to take this matter up by a special committee to be named by the hon. Secretary of State. It seems rather a peculiar idea that a farmer can sell foul seed to his neighbour without being subject to a fine, but that the seedsman to whom he sells it, even after cleaning it, is subject to a fine if it contains more than a certain percentage of foul seed. There should be an arrangement by which the farmer should be obliged to have his seed cleaned before he undertakes to sell it for seed. There are many points of the Bill which require consideration. We have plenty of time to take the matter up, and we should not accept a Bill of such importance without giving it careful consideration. The whole country is interested in it. No farmer likes to buy seed without being sure that it is clean, and I am sure if seedsmen fail in keeping clean seed I cannot see how a farmer should be allowed to sell his foul seed direct to another farmer without incurring the penalty provided in this Bill. I hope the hon. Secretary of State will allow the Bill to go to a select committee.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I entirely agree with the hon. gentlemen who have last spoken, that this measure should be dealt with most carefully, and by men who have a practical knowledge of the subject. Of course the seedsmen and the farmers are most vitally interested in the question. I know from practical observation in our country, where a large quantity of seed is obtained from Ontario, especially grass-seed, that land has been decreased one half in value by the noxious seeds it contained. I have been told by expert seedsmen that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are the dumping ground of Ontario for these impure seeds. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I agree with the last speaker that it seems rather an invidious distinction that we should provide legislation which allows one man to go scot-free for doing that which subjects another man to a penalty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When a farmer buys seed from his neighbour he does so with a full knowledge of what he is purchasing.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—A farmer can go to a seedsman's store and if he has ordinary intelligence he can examine the seed and know what he is buying. I should like to see the law general in its scope. Under the law a man may produce grain containing 25 per cent of noxious weeds, and sell that without incurring a penalty, enabling him to sell his good seed and also worthless stuff, not fit even for feed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He cannot do it under the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I mean under the existing statute. I am most emphatically approving of this Bill, but I endorse the suggestion of the last speaker, that it should be dealt with by a select committee or one of the standing committees of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It gives me the greatest pain to be obliged to differ from the three hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. I suppose I must be wrong, but it seems to me that this inquiry which is proposed before a special committee would take up the balance of the session and give senators who are anxious for employment something to do, and at the close of the session we would not know any more about the subject than we do at present. It is the duty of the Minister of Agriculture and the officers of his department to consider the interests of the people, more particularly of the farmers, and I assume that this measure is the result of the consideration which the Department of Agriculture have given to the question during several years. It does not seem to me reasonable to suppose that a committee, even of senators, would, in the course of two or three weeks, evolve a much wiser measure than has been produced by the consideration bestowed for years on this subject by the officers of the Department of Agriculture, who are, to a certain extent, experts. It is very proper that the measure should be considered fully, and I have no doubt the minister in charge of it will be prepared to deal with objections, and if he has not the necessary information, to acquire it when the measure is going through a committee of the whole House; but I must enter my humble protest against the proposition that this measure should be referred to a special committee, and that the senators should be turned into experts on a question of this kind.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It appears to me that all that has been said on this subject with reference to the duty of the Minister of Agriculture and the responsibility resting on him and his department will be assented to by every member of the Senate, but we are called upon here to deal with a matter about which we either have information or ought to get it in some way. If the Department of Agriculture have this information before them, it would be very useful to us to form, in an humble way, with the limited intelligence we have, some opinion on the matter before we amend the law, particularly before amending it on the lines that section 3 of this Bill would amend it. It does seem to me that on its face it is a matter which is proper to speak of on the second reading, for it is the principle of the Bill. It does seem to me to be a very extraordinary case which justifies one man in selling an article in a certain condition, while the purchaser from him may not sell it, even though he may try to make, and almost succeed in making it a perfect article. It looks like making a law for one man and one class of persons, and a different law for another man and a different class of persons, and if there is anything which is dangerous legislation, it is that class of legislation. It may be that it is possible the circumstances warrant all this, but those circumstances are not before us now. It is possible that if the evidence were here, it would appear that in order to try and accomplish something it would be necessary to take this step as an experimental matter, but we have not an opportunity of knowing what there is to justify such an experiment. No one will doubt for a moment that the subject is one of the very greatest importance, and that the great wheat fields of the west, which are to furnish food for all the world or, at all events, for Britain, in years to come, may be absolutely destroyed by the existence of noxious weeds, and that it may be necessary to adopt extreme measures, even if the result of this legislation is to be practically to put the seedsmen out of business. The farmers have no means of cleaning their seed, and if the effect of this measure is to be that the seedsmen cannot sell seed without these penalties attached, it may put them entirely out of business.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is not the interpretation of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—If every sale of seed containing more than one per cent of prohibited seeds is to be followed by a penalty, what business man could stand such an attack as would be made upon him? I am told it is a fact that with reference to some weeds it is not possible to entirely exterminate them, and if so the percentage which is mentioned here, 99 per cent, is a very high percentage. While I am not saying anything against the object of the Bill—it is one we are all in favour of, yet without having more information, I think, on the face of it, the Bill is one which presents objections. These could be dealt with very much better and more satisfactorily by having a committee who could receive evidence, either from the Department of Agriculture or from other parties. If ever there was a case in which there should be an inquiry, this is one; and an inquiry such as that suggested by the hon. gentleman from Lindsay and the hon. gentleman from Lincoln, it appears to me, presents a way of dealing with the Bill without which it may be open to very serious objection. The very grievance which it is sought to remedy may be perpetuated and extended instead of being lessened. The government should see their way to accede to an inquiry of some kind. If they object to calling witnesses and hearing parties, at all events let the committee have before them the information the department have on the subject; and we will be able to arrive at a conclusion which will be more satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was quite aware that this Bill would be subjected to a great deal of criticism, but when one remembers that it is the result of many years of consideration by experts, not alone experts in Canada, but experts in other countries, it will be admitted that it is a very difficult problem to solve to meet the views of people who are interested from different standpoints. If we were to have a special committee we could learn no more than we possess now, if we choose to read over the bulletins issued from time to time by the Department of Agriculture, giving the judgment and views of experts. We could not possibly have these experts before us. We should call 30 or 40 witnesses on one side and 30 or 40 witnesses on the other. There is great misapprehension as to the position of the farmer on this subject. I stated at the opening of my remarks that the farmer did not come within the provisions of the Bill if he is selling to a neighbour.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Why should he not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The man who buys from the farmer must buy the seed for his own land.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—But he can sell to a hundred farmers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he can sell only to a farmer who is going to use the seed himself.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Surely he can sell to a hundred neighbours who would use the seed themselves?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You could not get a Bill of this kind through and not allow a farmer, who is making no misrepresentation, who is selling seed he does not guarantee, who is selling it to a man who knows exactly what it contains——

Hon. Mr. BLACK—What is to hinder a farmer under this Bill to raise fifty bushels say of adulterated timothy seed and sell it to his neighbour?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For his own use.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I think that is very objectionable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman would go further than this Bill goes.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You cannot educate the people by this one Bill. It is something that could not be done; it would be absurd to attempt it. You are not going to make more than a certain advance. Probably in eight or ten years more we will have a Bill of this kind before us which will be much more stringent in its character. You must make a beginning somewhere. This Bill is the result of an examination made by experts who from time to time have consulted farmers, seedsmen, and agriculturists in different parts of Canada. There is an association known as the Agricultural Seedsmen's Association, and they have taken evidence and gathered information from all quarters as to what could be done. This Bill does not claim to be perfect; it could not be perfect. It is simply a beginning and therefore you cannot expect from it the protection which one would naturally desire. When the farmer sells to the seedsman there is no fraud or deception about it. The seedsman knows what he is buying. He purchases for the purpose of having the noxious seeds withdrawn from it. Both parties know what can be accomplished. The seedsman is not obliged to buy it. To give you an idea of the immense difference between seed grown in one locality, I will take the report from Prince Edward Island on the quality of red clover and the prices, and you will see the extraordinary difference between seeds that might be comparatively pure and those that are extravagantly foul. Here is a case of seed at St. Peter's which was sold at $6.90 per bushel. The number of weed seeds in a pound were only 180. Now at Bridgetown the market price was $7.20 a bushel and the number of weed seeds was 11,740 to the pound, yet that seed sold for 30 cents more per bushel than the pure seed at St. Peter's. At Marcil, Prince Edward Island, where the price per bushel was $8.10, the number of weed seeds to a single pound was 19,350, so you can see the extraordinary difference there is between these seeds. Of course a seedsman would readily discover the difference and would certainly be able to tell where the difference was so great as in these cases. How could the farmer tell?

Hon. Mr. BLACK—The farmer is allowed under this Bill to act as a seedsman and sell this adulterated stuff.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Do you expect every farmer to have machinery to clean his seed? It would be impossible. This Bill only calls attention to the necessity of having pure seed if it can be obtained. There is a clause in the Bill which allows the Governor in Council under certain conditions to make very liberal expanding regulations.

The Governor in Council may make regulations determining the maximum proportion of seeds of the weeds named in sections 3 and 4 of this Act, that may be tolerated in any seeds without affecting their character as being within the meaning of the said sections free from the seeds of the said weeds.

Then it allows a large proportion of other seeds than those named which are not so injurious. It has to be a liberal Act in that sense. You could not now adopt a stringent law, such as one would like to frame to meet existing conditions, and enforce it satisfactorily. This professes to make a beginning, and it brings public notice to the Bill. It calls attention to the very great value that would attach to our farms and our seeds if we could produce a purer class of seed. We know very well that there are farms in this country that produce very clean pea seed. You know that such seed on the other side of the line commands 50 and 75 cents a bushel higher than ordinary peas will, simply because they are known to be superior seed. All seed that is known to be pure in character commands a higher price in the market and we should seek to obtain that standing for our seed in Canada. There is no country in the world in which it is so important, because we are breaking up land which has no foul seed in it, and it does seem regrettable that we cannot make a beginning and have our lands free from foul seed. There are many lands in Canada absolutely valueless on account of the foul seed in them. Hon. gentlemen may criticise the Bill. It by no means professes to be perfect. Its object is to draw public attention to the importance of improving our seed. The penalty is not high. It is limited to $1, and it will only be imposed in very gross cases. I regret, therefore, that I cannot consent to the Bill going to a special committee, because we should gain no more information, and we would not obtain as valuable information as we will be furnished with by the bulletins issued by the Agriculture Department.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—The hon. Secretary of State appears to lay great stress upon the fact that delegates from the Seedsmen's Association and others have been before the Department of Agriculture in reference to this matter, but unfortunately the Department of Agriculture have not received their inspiration from those gentlemen. They have not acted upon the suggestion of the Seedsmen's Association; they have rather acted upon the suggestion of the farmers, who wished to impose impure seeds upon their neighbours and others throughout the country, and that is the weak clause of the Bill. I must say I heartily concur in the suggestion of referring it to a select committee, which can obtain information that will be valuable. The Bill is most objectionable in its present form, because while the seedsmen are restricted, it allows the farmer who produces foul seed to sell it. He can sell it not only to his neighbours but to others. I hope the hon. Secretary of State will reconsider the matter and consent to allow it to be referred to a special committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. Secretary of State says a beginning must be made somewhere, but there is no beginning if you allow the farmer to sell his foul seed. If the same restrictions are placed on the farmer as on the seedsman, there will be no difficulty in passing the Bill. Why not place the same restrictions upon the men who clean the seed and the men who buy the seed? The farmer is exempt, but the moment he sells his grain to a seedsman, the seedsman is liable to be fined. The farmer can sell fifty bushels of clover-seed, a bushel each to fifty different farmers, and he will have fifty farms foul and yet he cannot be fined. If you go into a seedsman's store and buy ¼ pound he is liable to be fined $1 a package, which would amount to $60 per bushel, while the farmer goes scot-free after selling fifty bushels to his neighbours. Any restriction imposed should be placed upon the farmer. The farmer, we are told, has not the same opportunity of cleaning the seeds that the seedsmen have. If the seedsman has taken every precaution, with all the machinery and ingenuity possible, and notwithstanding all these facts, foul seeds still remain, he is to be fined for having a cleaner seed to sell than the farmer who gets it from the land. Surely that is not starting with a clean sheet. Let us start equal. Why should the farmer be allowed to sell a foul article and the seedsman be compelled to clean his seed, and after it is cleaned if there is one per cent of foul seed in it, he is to be fined? That is why I object to the Bill. We ought to have fair play all round, and while I have the same consideration for the farmer as any one, I say the seedsman also should be protected.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has given the very best reason for referring this measure to a committee of the whole House. It seems to me every hon. gentleman in the House is in favour of having our seeds purer tha they are at present. The principle of the Bill is that the seeds shall be pure, and I do not see any reason why there should be a prolonged discussion on the second reading. The details of the Bill will be considered in committee.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I could satisfy hon. gentlemen in this chamber that there is not an inconsistency in the Bill, and that it is not an unfair thing to allow the farmer to sell to his neighbours. A farmer knows what seeds are on farms adjoining his. One farmer raises seeds with mustard in them, yet another farmer, who knows that fact, will not hesitate to go to him to buy that seed.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have taken some little interest in this Bill. I have read it carefully, and if there is one thing more than another I feel a deep interest in, it is protecting our farms from being polluted with foul seeds, more especially in the Northwest Territories, because already some portions of that new country are infested with weeds brought in from Ontario and Quebec. But whilst I appreciate to the fullest extent any legislation having for its purpose the preventing of the spread of noxious weeds, I must say I do not see much virtue in this Bill along that line. Clause 3 gives the names of a variety of weeds which the Bill is designed to protect the country against. I do not know many of them by the names given, and I venture to say that there is not one farmer in 500 in Canada could pick out many of them by the names in the Bill. One objection of many people to the Bill, is that you allow a certain percentage of foul seed. These seeds are, many of them, very small and very prolific. I forget how many thousand may be produced from one seed of wild mustard or stink-weed, and other weeds are equally prolific; so that a small number sown in a field might produce very evil results. Then you undertake to say that a certain percentage of seed must germinate. How can you tell how many seed in a bushel of wheat would germinate? The Bill is defective in that respect, and will lead to endless trouble if any one undertakes to enforce the provisions of that particular clause. My idea is that we should compel every farmer to clean his seed. A number of years ago we were short of oats for seed in the district where I live—in fact, there was a shortage all over Assiniboia and we procured our seed oats in Ontario. I among others got Mr. McKay, the manager of the Government Experimental Farm, to get oats from Ontario. He bought the seed from good reliable men, the very best farmers in Ontario, and I procured fifty or sixty bushels for myself. The seed being bought in this way, many farmers who used it thought it would not require to be cleaned, and the result was that many farms were infested with wild mustard. It was so on our farm —we did not know it was there until it grew up, when my boys immediately went to work and pulled it wherever they could find it. They took an army of men and worked across the field, and pulled out all the mustard plants that could be found. We have kept that up for several years, and think we have now got it pretty well out of the field, but even yet we sometimes find it growing. Our rule is to send a man on horseback across the field. He can see the mustard quite a distance and pull up the plants. Even if a farmer sows clean seed—and he is bound to do so in the Northwest in the interest of the community as well as in his own interest—he cannot protect himself from the negligence or carelessness of his neighbours. We have no fences; cattle run at large from about the 15th of October, and that is long before the snow comes. In threshing his grain, the farmer separates the wheat from the foul seed, and in nineteen out of twenty cases that foul seed is left where it falls. After the threshing is over, horses and cattle roam at large over the fields and eat this foul seed, and thus it is scattered over the neighbouring farms; so that no matter how careful one farmer may be, if his neighbour is careless he cannot keep his land free from foul weeds. Every farmer should be obliged to clean his seed, whether raised by himself or not. My hon. friend says they cannot afford to buy fanning machines. They can and do. Four or five farmers can join together and buy a good fanning mill, and in that way clean their seed and soon have a very small percentage of noxious weeds. The seed of the stink-weed and wild mustard will lie in the ground for years, being of an oily nature. When the ground is stirred they sprout, and it is almost impossible to clean land when the seed once is scattered over it. Under this Bill you could not get anybody to prosecute the seedsman. There would be a good deal of bother about it, and then the fact of allowing 5 per cent of the seed sown to be foul permits the distribution of it through the country. A farmer can just as easily clean his seed as he can sow it; the cost of cleaning it is very small.

Surely when every man is able to buy a seeder, half a dozen men in a neighbourhood can jointly purchase a fanning mill which costs only $30 or $40. Then with regard to the germination clauses, there is a great difference in seed. If oats are touched in the least with frost they will not germinate, whilst wheat may be frozen to a great extent and still be very good seed. Therefore it is difficult to say what will germinate and what will not. I think this Bill should not become law, because I am satisfied it will not have the effect desired. The government might think it over and reintroduce it in the near future, trying some other method. There are some seeds which are so like many varieties of noxious weed seeds, that even an expert would be puzzled to tell the difference between them. Take clover and grass seeds for instance; there are hundreds of seeds just like them and you cannot get a mill which will separate the good from the bad. You are undertaking a very hard proposition which will lead to a great deal of trouble and do very little good.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—There is no doubt the last remark of the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Perley) is correct—the government are undertaking a very hard proposition when they try to get clean seed, but I would call the attention of the House to the fact that almost all the suggestions the hon. gentleman offers are purely municipal or provincial in their character. The local authorities deal with noxious weeds on the farm. It would be absurd for the Dominion government to undertake to require farmers to sow clean seed, and pull weeds on their farms. The Bill along the lines intended is a good Bill. The hon. gentleman objects to the provision that one or two per cent of seeds sold by seedsmen may be foul. Surely that is better than having ten per cent or more of noxious seed. The Bill is in the right direction. This measure does not require the farmer to sow clean seed, does not touch him at all, but surely it is right to require seedsmen to sell clean seed. I can appreciate the importance of this measure for Manitoba and the Northwest. Quite a large portion of Manitoba is becoming infested with noxious weeds, in fact, in some of the older settlements where the people have not been careful to keep their fields clean, it is almost impossible to grow a profitable crop. It is time something was done to protect the west from the spread of noxious weeds. Like the hon. gentleman, I have had some experience in having noxious weeds introduced through purchasing timothy seed, and I found it very hard to get rid of some of them, especially the Canada thistle. I repeat the government have undertaken a difficult proposition, but from the work done by the Department of Agriculture, and the representations of delegations in connection with this matter, apparently even this difficult task of trying to prevent the spread of noxious weeds has been fairly well met by the proposed measure. Possibly something might be done to meet the views of the hon. gentleman from Wellington in reference to preventing farmers selling foul seed, but so far as the seedsmen are concerned they have appliances for cleaning seeds, and therefore the Bill goes in the right direction.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The object which this Bill is aiming to accomplish is one of very great importance. I doubt if in this parliament, or possibly in many sessions past we have had a Bill of greater importance than the legislation which is now engaging our attention, because freedom from weed pests and the ensuring of sound seed are two of the most important matters affecting an agricultural country like ours. I must say that the general aim and scope of the Bill I heartily support. At the same time, possibly, when we get into committee we might make a few changes to improve the measure. There is one provision I cannot understand—that is entirely out of harmony with the general scope of the Bill. I refer to subsection 2 of clause 3, which is as follows :

> 2. The provisions contained in this section shall not apply to the sale of seed that is grown, sold and delivered by any farmer on his own premises, for seeding by the purchaser himself, unless the purchaser of the said seed obtains from the seller at the time of the sale thereof a certificate that the said seed is supplied to him subject to the provisions of this Act.

That clause will permit the freest sale of seed between farmers themselves, which means that bad weeds can be propagated nearly as effectively as if sold by seedsmen. That clause should be reversed and read something like this :

> The provisions contained in this section shall apply to the sale of seed that is grown, sold and delivered by any farmer on his own premises, for seeding by the purchaser himself, unless the vendor of the said seed delivers to the purchaser, at the time of the sale thereof, a certificate that the said seed is not supplied to him subject to the provisions of this Act.

I would not object to going this far, that a transaction between one neighbour and another might be effected, but to my mind it is a mistake to say that every farmer who sells seed to another farmer is to be exempt from the operation of this law unless he chooses to deliver a note making himself responsible, which we know he would never do. I know there are great difficulties in applying this Bill. One of them has been stated by my hon. friend from Belleville and is to be found in clause 4, which describes the seed that shall be treated as No. 1. It requires that 99 per cent of the seeds must be of the kind that has been sold, and that 90 per cent out of the 99 per cent must be germinable. The 90 per cent might be germinable and still be very bad seed and not entitled to rank as No. 1. You might get timothy seed, for instance, that is almost entirely germinable, and still have a weak and sickly seed giving only a poor plant. It should be good plump seed. That is a point which ought to be reached in some way if possible. We should ascertain what is going to be classed as No. 1 seed, and it should be No. 1 in other respects besides being free from bad seeds and being germinable. Both these points are important, but the seed should also be plump. I am just pointing to these two provisions in the Bill which I think should certainly not be sanctioned by the House without very serious consideration. I know the general objection has been offered to the Bill that it will compel the seed trade to pass into the hands of the larger dealers, as smaller dealers and farmers cannot provide the necessary machinery to properly clean their seed. That I presume is the reason why transactions between farmers are permitted, because farmers cannot keep the necessary equipment for the separation of seeds as seedsmen will have to do. I understand it is costly to put in a complete equipment, such as will be necessary in order to render a seedsman perfectly safe under the operation of this measure. The effect of that will be to shut out many small seedsmen, but it is better so than that the country should be flooded with bad seed. Even though the farmers should be charged more for seed as a result of the enforcement of the Act, the good arising from it would quite offset any disadvantage resulting from shutting out the smaller classes of seedsmen. It is quite true that a farmer in selling seed cannot possibly have the equipment for properly separating seed such as the large seedsmen have, and all will have to instal such equipment to comply with the provisions of this measure.

Another difficulty that would arise is that when a farmer introduced a particularly good variety in his neighbourhood, his neighbours could not buy from him at all if the Bill did not contain some provision like subsection 2, of section 3, but it would be quite enough if the section were reversed as I have suggested. In that way sales between farmers would be placed under proper safeguards. I am prepared to support the Bill, although I confess that my views with regard to it are not very thoroughly matured. I see very serious objection to some of its clauses, which I think require very earnest consideration. Whether they can receive that consideration in a Committee of the Whole House, or whether they would receive it more fully if the Bill were referred to a select committee, I am not prepared to say. It is quite possible after the matter is discussed here carefully, and we come to understand the measure better, that the hon. minister who has charge of it, might hold it over for further consideration with his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and in that way we may make it as good a Bill as it can possibly be made.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am altogether in accord with the principle of the Bill, and although I am under the impression that the exception contained in subsection 2 of clause 3, may lead to a great deal of abuse from the fact that farmers, when dealing among themselves, will be tempted to buy inferior qualities of seed because they can get it at a lower price; nevertheless in dealing with a measure of this kind, I realize that it should not be too radical at the outset. I have no doubt that is the opinion of the Minister of Agriculture. It is a new measure, and if it were too radical in its character, there would be a danger that it might not attain its object, from the fact that farmers or the people interested would rise against the working of the measure and demand its repeal. They would possibly become biassed against the measure. It is better to introduce a Bill which, while not perfect, would leave the matter open to amendment from year to year as experience might dictate, and as the people realize the benefit arising from such legislation. I am sorry that the hon. leader of the House cannot see his way to referring the measure to a committee of some kind, who would have the benefit of hearing—possibly not all the parties interested—but the officials of the Department of Agriculture at least. It would be but right to make such a reference, if this honourable House is to be enabled to deal with the measure intelligently; and it would facilitate the passing of the Bill on proper lines. I feel there would be danger, if this Bill were discussed in Committee of the Whole, that for want of proper information changes might be made which would not be in the best direction; and I hope the hon. minister will reconsider his decision in the matter. I quite appreciate the fact that the department is responsible to a considerable extent in presenting a measure of this kind and is jealous of leaving the Bill to be discussed and amended by a committee where all kind of opinions might be expressed, but if it were understood that a committee would be appointed for the purpose of getting such information as could be supplied by the officials of the Department of Agriculture, there should be no objection.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be referred to a committee of the whole House on Thursday next. He said: In referring a Bill of this kind to a special committee, the intention of the hon. gentlemen who spoke in the earlier part of the debate was to avail themselves of the views of the seedsmen and country merchants dealing in seeds and of the farmers. I felt, and I think I am safe in saying it would be the general opinion of those who have given thought to it, that we would have such a diversity of opinion, it would give us no positive or valuable information. The opinions of experts, of those who have given thought and time to the inquiry and who have examined into all the circumstances, would be valuable; and if at a later stage it is thought desirable to have witnesses of that kind there might possibly be no objection; but I would not like to say I would be bound by it. It has a good deal to recommend it. I quite appreciated that when my hon. friend (Mr. Béique) spoke last. In the meantime I propose that the Bill be referred to a committee of the Whole House.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF BILLS POSTPONED.

MOTION.

The Orders of the Day being called.

Second Reading (Bill 86) An Act respecting the Ontario and Minnesota Power Company, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

Second Reading (Bill 87) An Act to incorporate the International Bridge and Terminal Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

Hon Mr. SCOTT said: I have been receiving a very large number of telegrams with respect to these two Bills and I have two letters at least from the premier of Ontario, together with a large number of communications from different parties. There are very substantial objections to these Bills. The principal parties who are objecting live at Fort Frances, and therefore it would take some little time for them to get here. I wired them to-day that we would have the Bills postponed for ten days, in order that ample time might be allowed. The premier of Ontario said he would depute a barrister of Toronto to come here and give the views of his government on the subject. I understand Mr. Ritchie was in the city to-day and was to have called on me; however, I did not see him. I had previously announced to him that I would see that the Bills would be postponed in order that he might be in a position to give his views upon them. I therefore move that the Orders of the day be discharged and that the second reading of the Bills be fixed for Thursday, the 13th inst.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (Y) An Act respecting the Interprovincial and James Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Bill (Z) An Act to amend the Act respecting the Canadian, Yukon and Western Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

THE COMMISSION OF ULRIC LAFONTAINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER inquired :

What is the date of the commission of Ulric Lafontaine, Esq., of Montreal, as extradition commissioner ?

Has the said Ulric Lafontaine, who is a justice of the peace and clerk of a court, received instructions from the Department of Justice to sit in all the cases of extradition to the exclusion of the other commissioners who all occupy a higher rank in the judiciary of the province of Quebec ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer placed in my hands by the Department of Justice reads as follows :

1. 26th December, 1898.

2. No. The Department of Justice does not instruct judicial officers in the discharge of their functions.

INSPECTION AND SALE OF SEEDS BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to say that there has been an expression of opinion from a number of hon. gentlemen that they would like to hear some expert evidence in connection with the Seeds Bill set down for to-morrow. It has been therefore arranged that if any gentlemen who take sufficient interest in it would be kind enough to meet at the offices of the Department of Agriculture, corner of Queen and O'Connor streets, the minister himself will be there to answer any questions in connection with the Bill, and also the particular officer of the department who has had for some time charge of this examination into the seed question. If I could learn from hon. gentlemen what time would be most convenient to meet, I would give notice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why could not the meeting be held in our Railway Committee room ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will have a number of specimens of seeds in various conditions obtained from various quarters, and in that way it would be rather illustrative of the question. I presume they could not very well bring their samples here, otherwise we could have our meeting here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The apartments down there are utterly inadequate if any considerable number of senators should go down ; they are too small and cramped. I cannot imagine that it would be difficult for them to bring up enough specimens to answer the purpose, and it would be very much better if the meeting were held here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They would not require many specimens. What we want most is an explanation as to how the provisions of this Bill would work. I think eleven o'clock would be a suitable hour.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—From what I gathered from the hon. gentleman from Lincoln, I think the object was to give those who are opposed to the measure an opportunity of presenting their side of the case. I do not know whether they got that opportunity in the House of Commons or not. I have received quite a number of letters from seedsmen throughout the country strongly objecting to the Bill, in its present shape, and pointing out especially the advantage that it is proposed to give to farmers to sell to each other, thus virtually shutting out the seedsmen from disposing of seed unless it is up to a certain standard. I have met several seedsmen, and have had letters from others ; and the question is whether it is of any use giving them a hearing. They want an opportunity of stating before the committee what their objections are. I thought yesterday the object of this meeting was to hear what those who are affected by the Bill have to say. They claim they have not been well used in being given no opportunity of presenting their side of the case. Of course it would be short notice to expect them to come here to-morrow. The question is whether it is the intention to give these men an opportunity of stating their objections to the Bill. I know the seedsmen throughout the Dominion consider this Bill a very serious interference with their business. I am entirely in favour of the government's endeavour to improve the condition of seeds by passing a law that will tend to prevent the spread of noxious weeds through the sale of impure seed. It is a commendable object if we can only get a measure which will be workable, but I should like to give the seedsmen an opportunity of showing why they are so strongly opposed to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The seedsmen have had this under consideration for three years. They have been heard over and over by the officers of the department. Their objections have been stated and heard, and in most cases over-ruled. A number of seedsmen accept the Bill. I inquired over the telephone to-day and learned that several, among them, Mr. Rennie, of Toronto, are not opposed to the Bill. The question has been threshed out most completely with all the seed-growers over and over again. I give the answer for what it is worth, but the question has been threshed out completely with all the seed-growers over and over again, the objections have been heard and met as far as possible, and we have endeavoured to present a Bill that is acceptable to parliament.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am glad to hear the statement which has just been made by the hon. Secretary of State and under the circumstances I withdraw my suggestion.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (AA) An Act respecting certain patents of the Ideal Manufacturing Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (BB) An Act to incorporate the Monarch Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

FITZ-SIMONS DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the third reading of Bill (F) An Act for the relief of Jane Marie Fitz-Simons.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Has that evidence been distributed yet ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have not had the evidence yet. I want to see a copy of the evidence before I cast my vote, and I ask that it be allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the hon. gentleman is labouring under a mistake. I have had the evidence before me for some time, and I think if the hon. gentleman will inquire at the post office, or will examine his papers, he will find that it has been distributed and printed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—So far I have received copies of evidence in two divorce cases only. And after perusing the evidence, I may say that I will vote against one of them.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—There is no question about it. The evidence in this case was delivered to me over a week ago, and I sent a copy of it to a member of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The Bill has been read the third time, and the question now before the House is, shall the Bill pass. I can see no advantage in holding it at this stage. If the hon. gentleman had objected to the third reading it would have been a different matter. But it is very unusual to have such action taken on the motion that the Bill be finally passed.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If any hon. gentleman objects on the ground that he has not seen the evidence, I have no objection to letting it stand.

The SPEAKER—Shall the Bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Under what heading?

The SPEAKER—That is a question.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have no recollection of ever seeing a Bill on the order paper in the position in which this Bill now is.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—It is a new departure.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They can afford to wait another day before getting their divorce.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—What object can there be? There cannot be any action taken to stop the final passing.

The SPEAKER—There can be a division.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the first place this would create a very extraordinary precedent. I do not think such a thing has occurred in the Senate since we became a Senate, that a measure has been put down for its final passing in the Orders of the Day. The order after the third reading is looked upon as a merely formal one, that the Bill do now pass. There is one instance where a Bill was defeated on that motion, but it was put immediately after the motion for the third reading. Then there is this other consideration, the hon. gentleman votes against the Bill in any event, as do all members of the church to which he and I belong, so there is no object to be attained. If the hon. gentleman will tell the House that after he has had an opportunity of reading the evidence, he may vote in favour of the Bill, then there would be something in his suggestion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I might have an opportunity of telling why I think the recommendation of the committee should not be adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The evidence, I may say, is of the most overwhelming nature.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I submit the motion should be put now.

The Bill passed.

SPREAD OF TUBERCULOSIS IN CANADA.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Edwards, that in the opinion of the Senate the time has arrived when parliament should take some active steps to lessen the wide spread suffering and the great mortality among the people of Canada, caused by the various forms of tuberculosis.—Hon. Mr. McMullen.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—When I moved the adjournment of the debate on the very important question introduced by the hon. senator from Rockland (Hon. Mr. Edwards), I did so for the purpose of making a few remarks in support of the institution at Gravenhurst, which has been doing such admirable work for some years. I may say I am in entire accord with the resolution. This subject should have been taken up by Canada years ago. It is a lamentable fact that such a very large proportion of our population has been taken from us by the disease to which the hon. senator has drawn the attention of this chamber. It has broken up and ruined many thousands of families. I know several instances myself where every member of a household has been carried away one after another, and it will be one of the most laudable acts of the government if they could adopt some method whereby a stop could be put to the ravages of this disease. I shall not offer any remarks on the infectious nature of tuberculosis or anything along that line, because we have already had three very admirable speeches in this chamber dealing with that feature of the case, and I believe there are yet one or two professional men who are thoroughly posted on the subject to be heard. It would be absurd on my part, therefore, not being a physician, to attempt to enlighten the House on the question. But the question has arisen in my mind, in what direction should the government give encouragement towards this attempt to stop the tide of destruction resulting from the existence of this disease throughout the Dominion. I do not know whether it would be wise to attempt to erect sanitaria all over the Dominion in the different provinces. I have no doubt it would burden the resources of the Dominion very seriously if the attempt were made. However, encouragement might be offered by the way of a grant towards the construction of sanitaria in the different provinces proportionate to the amount of accommodation which they would be able to furnish. Where a building is erected with accommodation sufficient for forty or fifty people, certain assistance might be given. Then there might be an annual contribution per capita towards the support of the institution. In that way there would require to be an inspector appointed who would visit the different institutions and inspect them, and keep a careful record of the work done. The provinces might be appealed to also to contribute something. They should certainly do their share.

I have had an invitation to form one of a deputation to wait upon the premier of Ontario on behalf of the sanitarium at Gravenhurst. They are approaching the government of Ontario for the purpose of trying to get a provincial grant towards that institution, which has been in existence for many years and has done excellent work. It was founded as the result of contributions by a number of gentlemen in the city of Toronto and throughout the province of Ontario who took an interest in the subject. There was a general appeal, and all those who sympathized with the movement for the establishment of a sanitarium in that district, which was looked upon as a desirable location for an institution of the kind, responded liberally; and very large amounts of money have been contributed. I can give an illustration of the work the sanitarium is doing by citing the case of a young man in the town where I live. He was twenty-two years of age, and to all appearances nearing his end. It was thought it might be well to send him to the Gravenhurst institution. He went there and remained for something like a year and a half. When he returned to the town he weighed something like fifty-four pounds more than when he left, and was wonderfully improved. In fact, he furnished positive evidence of the advantageous results of his going to Gravenhurst. A meeting was held in the town and a very respectable contribution was made towards the institution. I do not know what course the government may decide upon, but unquestionably it would be most desirable if institutions could be started and made successful at other points. The sanitarium at Gravenhurst has issued lately a statement showing a very substantial decrease in deaths from consumption in the province of Ontario of late years. The rate has run down, I think, something like 15 or 20 per cent in four to five years. There has been a very marked reduction from the mortality which prevailed before the establishment of the sanitarium, clearly showing that the movement to check the disease has been attended with considerable success. It would be well if we could encourage any movement that would tend still further to reduce the number of deaths taking place from tuberculosis.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How is that institution at Gravenhurst maintained?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—By voluntary contributions.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—They charge patients.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The institution has been maintained in that way, and it is a very creditable establishment and has done remarkably good work. We have no very expensive institutions of this kind, and to increase the number would be a step in the right direction. We are spending a large amount of money to bring people to this country, and we are glad to know that for the last few years that expenditure has resulted in a constantly increasing influx of population; but when we bring people here it would be a most commendable thing if we tried to save their lives after we get them, in cases where they suffer from consumption. I notice that in England, enormous sums are expended on institutions of this kind. In Glasgow itself there is immense hospital accommodation. It covers some 31 acres, and there are no less than 35 buildings for the purpose of dealing with all cases of the disease sent there.

I could not lose this opportunity of saying a few words on behalf of the sanitarium at Gravenhurst, to which I am glad and proud to say I have been a contributor for a number of years, and intend to be in the future. I should be glad if the government could see their way to giving it some encouragement. The institution has never turned away a patient. Any one going there who has means to pay can get better accommodation perhaps—purchase accommodation to suit themselves—but there is not a single instance in which the poorest creature that had not a dollar to offer in return for the attendance, medicine, and relief supplied, has been turned away from their door. They deserve a great deal of credit for the manner in which they have treated these poor patients.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Before I begin, while the echo of the hon. gentleman's words is dying in the chamber, I wish to say that he is misinformed about the institution at Gravenhurst. It has done a great deal of good no doubt, but you pay for anything you get there, and it is a goodly sum that is charged. They could not be expected to treat patients free, because they have the cottage system, and these cottages are beautifully furnished. Lately there has been a movement to make those free, but whether it has succeeded or not I do not know. I only wish to correct the impression about the institution, because it would be very wrong to give the idea that these institutions could be supported and maintained by private benevolence. Such an impression would largely nullify the effect of anything I have to say upon this subject. I feel it a great honour on this occasion to be asked by the gentleman who introduced this resolution to assist him, and I do so with the greatest pleasure, because I feel that no more important subject has come before the Senate in my time, and I am astonished to see there is not more interest—I cannot call it enthusiasm—manifested by hon. senators in this resolution. The hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat said he would let the physicians speak of the matter. They have nothing more to do with it than he. We are bound by duty, by the law of God, by the social law and by the law of humanity to assist our neighbour. It is incumbent upon all persons to alleviate misery and make the country as healthy as possible.

The hon. gentleman who has undertaken to introduce this resolution has done a great work. If I thought for a moment that the only object he had in view was to bring the subject before the House for the purpose of causing some excitement and showing that he was doing something, I would not have interfered on this occasion. I questioned him on the subject, and I believe he is actuated by that charity which 'suffereth long and is kind, envieth not, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up.' I believe he is acting on the best of motives. I have known the hon. gentleman since he came into this House, and engaged as he is in a great number of occupations, I thought that it was a noble act on his part, and it did honour to the Senate, inasmuch as the honour which comes to any member of this chamber is reflected on the Senate. I say he did honour to the Senate in that he accepted the honourable office of moving the resolution now under discussion. He undertook a herculean task, a task which will be thankless, I venture to say, unless people become more grateful than I have known them to be. He has undertaken an immense obligation, and I think it is my bounden duty as a fellow-senator and fellow-citizen, as it is the duty of other hon. gentlemen, to sustain him in this respect, and to assist the object which he has in view, of initiating some movement in this House, which, radiating from this chamber, will go down to the municipalities and from them to the citizens. All must unite if anything is to be done in this country for the purpose of mitigating or removing this dread disease. I need not tell hon. gentlemen anything of the desolation and misery consequent upon tuberculosis, which causes, as hon. gentlemen have stated, such a large proportion of the mortality. In different countries where statistics are kept, we find that according to various influences, one-fourth or one-fifth or one-sixth of the whole mortality is due to this disease. It is not the first time that the subject of tuberculosis has been discussed in this Senate. In the year 1900, while the Hon. D. Mills, of most agreeable and honourable memory, was leader, a Bill came from the Minister of Agriculture for the inspection of meat. I saw that there was a great deal in that Bill which could not be accomplished. It led to a scientific discussion. I could show hon. gentlemen by reading a few words the necessity which exists that the inspector of meat should be a man qualified in the use of a microscope, qualified to estimate the value of tests on cattle, and able to examine slaughtered cattle and determine whether or not tuberculosis is present. That was the reason I asked the Hon. Mr. Mills, after explaining the necessity for this—because an immense number of these inspectors would have been required—to allow a committee of the physicians of the House, as being the members most familiar with the subject, to deal with the question. He kindly consented; and we looked into the Bill and saw that it was inoperative and could not be carried out without enormous expense. The Bill was dropped and there was nothing more about it. This brings up another question of vital importance to us as legislators. The year after that, 1901, Dr. Koch made an important announcement at the Tuberculosis Congress, of which I have the details here. First I may say to you that poultry and domestic animals are very liable to tuberculosis. It occurs in about 17 7-10 per cent of oxen, cows, and so on.

In pigs and swine it amounts to 15½ per cent; but in sheep, strange to say, it is three ten-thousandths per cent, which shows an almost incredible difference between the two. This has been attempted to be accounted for because the sheep are more in the open air, but I cannot see much reason in that. Dr. Koch, who discovered the bacillus of tuberculosis, the essential cause, at the meeting made the startling announcement, contrary to the universal belief of the civilized world, that it was not communicable from animals to men. He made the assertion contrary to the opinion of the whole of the congress of scientific men gathered from all parts of the world. There was not one man present who supported it, but he gave abundant evidence to show that he was right. I will read to the House the exact words uttered by him in his own speech, because they are of historic interest. He said :

> Though the important question whether man is susceptible to bovine tuberculosis at all is not yet absolutely decided, and will not admit of absolute decision to-day or to-morrow, one is nevertheless at liberty to say that if such a susceptibility really exists the affection of human beings is but a very rare occurrence. I should estimate the extent of infection by the milk——

I want hon. gentlemen to pay attention to this. He proceeds :

> ——and by the flesh of tubercular cattle and the butter made of their milk as hardly greater than that of hereditary transmission, and I therefore do not deem it advisable to take any measure against it.

That is an important assertion, yet he is alone in these conclusions. There were other statements made which I could read to you proving that his view was not concurred in. Experiments were made to show that human tuberculosis was transmissible to cattle. This is of great consequence. I thought the hon. gentleman from Wellington assumed a belligerent attitude some few nights ago, in his very animated speech in reference to cattle being admitted to England.. If they will only admit the truth of what Doctor Koch has stated—and it is worth while investigating—they must admit the cattle, and there will be no necessity to send over gunboats, or anything of that kind. What is the opinion of scientific men to-day with reference to this point ? For the information of the House, I wrote to the greatest pathologist in Canada, and I may say on the continent, Professor Adami, in Montreal. Here is the telegram which I received a couple of hours ago with regard to the present state of opinion on this dictum of Doctor Koch's. I mention it because a royal commission was appointed to investigate the subject, and they have not fully reported. He says that the interim report of the British Royal Commission 'on the whole was against Doctor Koch.' As I said, they were all unanimous against this opinion of his, and this would seem to be the opinion at the present time. I give it to you, as I think it would be of interest. Think of the incalculable benefit it would be if the exportation of our cattle to England could be permitted.

Another important matter is the milk supply. It is a large constituent of food—almost the whole food of infants and children, and it is most advisable that this should be pure and clean. My inclination, I must say, without, of course, attempting at all to put myself on any parity with even those who are opposing Doctor Koch's, would be against his view, because in any case in the examination of milk for infants it is of the utmost importance to take every precaution; and, therefore, I should continue to advise, as I have in the past, that it would be better that milk intended for infants should be boiled.

Of course, this does not interefere with the other matter that I have to bring before the House. As I said, this subject of tuberculosis is of more interest than any other which has come before the House, and I only consider this a trumpet note given by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa for the purpose of arousing attention. I should be greatly amazed if I believed that the members of this Senate were indifferent to a subject of such vital importance to them. In such a representative body as I see before me to-day, every member is just as much obliged as I am, and more so, to investigate this subject in the interests of humanity and of those he represents. I say this without any desire to mention what might be unpleasant, but I think it my duty to utter a warning, with the hope that it will be the beginning of an awakening which will spread through the whole of the country and be of incalcuable benefit.

The essential element of this disease is a small tubercule—a small greyish mass —which is produced by a parasite. There are many parasitic diseases. We have the parasite of cholera, and there are certain conditions which they must undergo before they are indicated as a cause, but such tests and experiments have been carried on as to render it impossible to believe otherwise than that they stand in the relation of cause and effect. Take away the bacilli of tuberculosis and you have no tuberculosis. Take away the bacilli of cholera which are found in water, and you have no cholera. The same condition exists with regard to the bubonic plague which caused a great deal of excitement some time ago and which it was found was communicated from rats. No matter how you treat the disease, whether it be tuberculosis or any other disease, it will do no good unless you get at the cause. In the great science of medicine, the highest skill is employed to find out the causes of disease, and then to remove them. The tubercle is found in every part of the body. Wherever there is a blood vessel the tubercle is liable to exist, and unfortunately these tubercles accumulate. It is an insidious and mean disease. There is not a relieving feature about it. It is a chronic disease, lasting a couple of years or more, and in every case hope is inspired, even when the person has the appearance of death; in the death agony the patient believes he will be better in a short time. Whether that has a beneficial effect I leave those who are more philosophical to say. I rather think it is a benefit, because the suffering being so great the hope mitigates the severity of the suffering. At any rate it is an insidious disease. Every other disease comes on with a shock—some with a convulsive movement. They all announce their presence, but this disease enters the body like a thief who moves silently and stealthily, and it attacks the young particularly. The greatest number attacked are persons between the ages of 12 and 30. It has its favourite sites and often its favourite portions of the body. For instance it attacks the lungs, and we have generally four or five times as much pulmonary consumption or tuberculosis of the lungs as of any other part of the body. It may attack any other part; bones, joints or any organ. The deposit goes on for a time, and the tubercles accumulate. The natural resisting forces of the body are always present and ever on the watch for hostile invaders. The natural tendency is to recovery, and were it not for the excessive deposits and accumulations a man would recover. The tubercle constantly tends to multiply. Soon after it is deposited it softens and breaks down into a yellowish mass, which liquefies and destroys the tissues. Hectic fever occurs and often hemorrhages also. The hemorrhage in the early part of an attack of tuberculosis is slight and more easily recovered from. In the later stages, when it is the result of the destruction of tissue, it is more dangerous.

Wasting influences are exerted on the unfortunate body, diarrhœa, sweating, &c. I have seen the blankets and quilts soaked from sweating so that you could wring them. You see what attention such people require. While the body is wasting away and the attendants are straining every nerve to sustain the patient, they are subject to contagion, and that is where the danger of it arises. I have one case in particular now in mind—respectable farmers, healthy and strong, where one unfortunate man got tuberculosis of the lungs, and five members of the family passed away from the disease in succession. I stood there aghast, not knowing what to do. I could not believe it was all hereditary, because the father and mother were the last to go, but every one in that house died one after another, and I see now they all died from contagion. They all infected one another, and if I had known enough to separate them as I would have done in a case of small-pox or any other disease known to be infectious, I might have saved their lives, but it was not at that time known to be infectious. We believed then that hereditary transmission was the cause of tuberculosis, and that it was incurable and not preventable. I do not intend to dwell any longer on a description of the ravages of this disease. Suffice it to say, I never saw a case, whether sent to a sanitarium or not, that recovered. Incipient consumption is very difficult to determine, and it has puzzled many a physician. At that stage it admits of cure. The mode of entrance of the infection into the body may be mentioned. It infects by inhalation. Of course it may get in through an abrasion of the skin. The bacilli are floating in the atmosphere, where do they come from ? Koch says on this point :

So the only main source of the infection of tuberculosis is the sputum of consumptive patients, and the measures for the combating of tuberculosis must aim at the prevention of the dangers arising from its diffusion.

This is supported by every scientific authority. There is no doctor who does not accept it, that the disease is parasitic, and comes altogether from the sputum, and that by rendering this sputum innocuous you prevent the infection from spreading. There are many other things I thought of mentioning, but I have a scheme to bring forward which I think will not necessitate my making as long a speech as I intended—I will come to that presently. Now the causes of all diseases are two, predisposing and exciting. You understand the meaning of those two terms. The exciting cause of this disease is the bacillus. What are the predisposing causes ? What is it that renders one man more easily a victim to this infectious and insidious disease than another ? There are various causes and the removal of these is what I wish to present for your consideration. All the causes that predispose to consumption are those of debility. There is no race, no climate, no temperature, you can find where this disease cannot exist and flourish. They have buried the bacillus at one hundred and eighty degrees below zero, a temperature sufficient to liquefy air, and kept it there for two months, and when it was taken up it was as active as ever. Even in the cooking of food it may be difficult to destroy it. The amount taken into the body varies according to the predisposition of a person to the disease. Damp, dark and dirty neglected premises are where it flourishes. Sunlight, cleanliness and cheerfulness are all hostile to it, and they are good things for anybody to have under any condition. Syphilis is also said to be a cause. Another cause is alcoholism. That is not mentioned by many, but in my opinion it takes away the flower of the population by predisposing to tuberculosis. I will give on this subject the words of a very distinguished Frenchman, the dean of the faculty of the University of Paris. Speaking of it he says it is the most potent factor in the causation of tuberculosis. I have seen many cases of the brightest young men, who have suffered from alcoholism. Mind you, the wretched habitations of the poor are purveyors, as Simon, of London, has said, of the public houses, and the public houses are the purveyors of tuberculosis. There is the circle for you. I cannot tell you how many extraordinarily able men—for this disease occurs very often among the best and finest characters in the world—are lost from this cause. The finest figures and chests I ever saw were those of consumptives. John C. Heenan, one of the finest specimens of humanity, and Tom Sayers, equally good physically, died from tuberculosis. What caused it in them ? It was alcoholism. So it is with many of our young men. Therefore, the people who practise temperance will be the greatest in the world. So this French authority says, and he is right. He says :

I should like to draw attention to a mistake made too easily in the different countries by ministers who have charge of the financial departments of state. They calculate the sum the state gets from the duty on alcohol, but they should deduct from it the cost to the community of the family of the ruined drunkard, his degenerate, infirm, scrofulous and epileptic children who must have shelter.

I do not know whether the Excise Ministers are to blame in any way. They are not, but I would say this as an inference from this quotation, they ought to give back a little of that money which they get from these people; I do not think it would be anything more than their duty and right to do so.

The remaining influences are found at work wherever people are living in bad habitations, I mean where there is bad ventilation, where the sewerage is defective. Previous disease has a great effect ; inflammation or cold have a decided influence in starting the disease. I mention these various predisposing causes so that you may not lay the flattering unction to your souls that if you have sanitaria you will have no consumption. The fact is you must begin at the the foundation and make the action general. and if this movement I am speaking on to-day is not general—if nothing results from it—I will say that the hon. gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) ought to resign his position. It is the duty of the head of the state, that is, the Dominion government, and equally incumbent on the provincial government, on the municipalities and on private individuals by their benefactions and otherwise, to aid in this movement. Where does Canada stand in this respect to-day? I might read a report from Dr. Montizambert which deals with the subject. The Governor General is in favour of stamping out tuberculosis and presided not long ago at a meeting, as a result of which we were told they were going to do a great many things, but nothing has been done as yet. This country has not a great many of the causes which exist in more densely populated countries, to produce disease, but in all countries, and especially in Canada, it is much easier to effect the object we have in view, namely, to remove these causes. For example we can do something to diminish intemperance. We can do something to make our cities and home surroundings healthier. We can have better drainage and cleaner streets and avoid a great many things which lead to disease. There is one matter that has not been mentioned at all—spitting. This expectoration must be stopped by every one in the country, and would it not be cleaner, healthier and more polite if we had no expectoration in public halls, in the street cars and on the sidewalks? I get up in the morning early and I often find the sidewalks polluted by people who defile them with expectoration. That could easily be stopped if attention were paid to it.

The task begun to-day by the hon. gentleman from Rideau, must be carried out; and here is the city in which it should be tested. Ottawa gets $60,000 annually from the federal government for the purpose of beautifying it; here we are surrounded by the influence of the Governor General and his court and suite and all the government officials. Are they to stand idle without setting an example to the rest of the country? I say it would be a shame to the government if such were the case. Therefore I want the president of this association to say to-day that by resolution on the part of all here present we will begin by getting one or two members from each province of this Dominion to co-operate and then lay down a distinct set of regulations as to what is to be done. These regulations affect the provincial government. There is not a country in this world that has the perfect system of charities that Ontario has. I never heard of any country where charity is given so generously and so carefully, and with so much good effect. Now it is very easy to get the province of Ontario to pass certain laws. Municipalities, I dare say, can stop this abominable habit of spitting in all places, in the cars, in public halls and on the side walk. One man in Boston, a millionaire named Bradbury, was recently fined heavily for a first offence against a by-law of this character, and for a second offence was sent to jail for 24 hours. In Sydney, Australia, they fined a man one pound or $5, for a second offence. We do not want to go so far as that. I believe the people of this country are so intelligent that they will obey the law, and I trust no law will ever be passed in Canada which the people will say a word against, because here the laws are framed by the people. They have a part in the making of them and we never pass laws contrary to public opinion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How can you avoid expectorating?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Can't you have a handkerchief?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—In the field or on the street.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—You can carry it in the pocket if you are subject to the habit or stay at home. There are pocket spittoons made of aluminum, there is oiled paper, and as a matter of fact in places where consumptives patients are, there are spittoons made specially. Now that mention has been made of this matter, I may say that destruction of this sputum is a very important matter, and care is taken in all places where there are consumptive patients to have it burned. They do not like to throw it on the earth; it is destroyed in some way and burning is the most effective way.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Asbestos spittoons might be used.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN. They might be too expensive. They make these pocket spittoons so cheap that they can be destroyed after being used for one day. In tuberculosis the sputum is so profuse that it is necessary to use a larger vessel. Every precaution must be taken against this infection. The provincial government can regulate notification, which is very important too. There should be a notification of all cases of this disease wherever they may exist, just as you are bound to notify in cases of small-pox. In that way precaution may be taken to guard against infection. There are different degrees of infection in different diseases. Consumption may be contracted by inhalation, but this cannot take place unless the sputum is dry or unless you are very close to the diseased person. When the expectoration dries it is still swarming with bacilli which float in the atmosphere for a considerable time and are inhaled into the lungs. That could be avoided to a very great extent, and it is what we want to effect.

The streets could be kept cleaner than they are at the present time, and it would be a grand thing for the community if that were done. Another way to prevent the spread of the disease is by education. In our schools all the instruction needed could be put on a portion of one leaf, and the provincial government could direct the teachers to give instruction on it for a few minutes every day. Leaflets could be furnished, and the time occupied would be but a few hours in the year. We have heard of the reduction of tuberculosis in England. During Queen Victoria's reign ten Acts were passed having reference to the housing of labourers and artisans. Mr. Peabody, the great American banker, before he died gave $2,500,000 out of his own private means to build healthy houses, clean, well-ventilated dwellings, full of light and sun. They were rented at a nominal sum to artisans, so that they would not be thought to be recipients of charity. Look at the good effect that has had. We do not stand so much in need of anything of that kind. Then the clergymen of this country will be willing to speak on this subject, and there is not a doctor in the country who will not lift his voice with all the force he can command in favour of preventing the spread of this disease, although it is against his own financial benefit. These are means which I mention on this occasion, and if the people will undertake to meet the difficulty in that way—there is no great effort required—all that is necessary is a long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together, and the spread of the disease will be checked. The hon. gentleman from Rideau will have the proud satisfaction of saying he has made Ottawa the healthiest city of the Dominion and a model for all the other cities of Canada, and he will be the recipient of honours higher than have been vouchsafed to any man in this Dominion, and we, as members of the Senate and his colleagues, will be honoured also. I hope the same brain power he has exercised in the organization of his business, which has brought abundant success, will achieve success in this direction also. I hope God will bless him for it, and I think He will. Now, he has the opportunity of his life, he has it in his power to rise to a higher position than any man ever did before in this country, and I tell him that I shall be an humble recruit; but so far as my humble ability goes and my small means will go, I shall enrol myself under his banner, hoping he will carry it on to victory.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It is not my intention to discuss this matter which has been so well put before the House, but when we consider the importance to this country of the adoption of some means to prolong the lives of the people, it is the duty of every one to raise his voice in furtherance of the movement. We know what sort of country we possess; we know that we have one of the finest climates under the sun for the production of strong, healthy and vigorous citizens. That being so, and Providence having provided us with the means whereby we could have a healthy community, it is our own fault if we do not have in Canada longevity equal to or greater than is known in any other country under the sun. Is it not important then that we should adopt every means to protect our people from the spread of this infectious disease? I adopt, to a very great extent, the principles my hon. friend from Kingston has advanced and the statements he has made, but we must remember that we cannot have healthy men and women unless we have healthy children. Our first duty is to see that the young generation are in a healthy condition, that every means is adopted to prevent the spread of disease among them. What is necessary for the health of children will be necessary in the future for the health of parents. If you have people living in filthy, dark rooms, with unwholesome food, can you expect children under such conditions to be healthy? In dark rooms and dirty houses you find the seeds of disease engendered among the young. As the old adage has it, prevention is much better than cure ; so our aim ought to be, not only to establish sanitaria, but, what is more essential, we should adopt means to prevent the spread of this dire disease. That being the case, instead of expecting a government grant of $200,000 or $300,000 in aid of sanitaria, let us examine our school-rooms and the pupils attending those schools. Do you think it would be right and proper to herd together a large number of children in the school-room, where possibly the teacher is a consumptive who is not as prudent as he should be, thus engendering disease among the children ? Not only that, but generally those schools are constructed without regard to sanitary laws. You will find the children there huddled together, no care being taken to prevent expectoration, and thus children are exposed to disease.

Why do we not adopt the same method as in the United States, and in some other countries ? Before a teacher is employed, if there be any doubt or any suspicion of his not being in a healthy condition, he has to pass an examination before some capable physician, and if there be any suspicion that he is at all afflicted with tubercular disease, he is refused employment in the school. Not only that, but if any of the children in attendance display any weakness in that direction, they are not permitted to attend school. Adopt some method whereby you can prevent the disease entering into and taking possession of the human body, and you will thereby stamp it out. The next question which arises is, what means should we adopt to prevent the disease ? In our schools the children are not in as healthy surroundings as they should be. Any one who has ever taught school will tell you that in winter the ordinary school is just a pest-nest for the children. The windows are all closed, and there is no ventilation. The teacher is quite indifferent, and is constantly throwing wood into the stove, destroying what little supply of oxygen there may be—generally very insufficient, being exhausted by the children in breathing. This conduces to the early production of the disease, and that is just what our friends are now agitating to prevent. Let me say that I admire and appreciate the efforts being made by the various societies to try to eradicate from this country this dire disease. I would advise them to return to the system of sending out literature from one end of the country to the other, for the purpose of having it introduced into our schools. Let every child grow up seeing before them the danger signal so that they may avoid contagion. Then another cause, too often, is bad food—indifferent diet, and perhaps some might say that we are causing disease by starvation. We cannot possibly have the system well nourished, well sustained and well supported unless we give people good reasonable and strong food. That being so, every family should be carefully guarded to see that the children have the proper nourishment to maintain them in good physical condition, if they are in any way predisposed to disease. We are all well aware that there are many theories as to the cause of disease. We have heard this afternoon that milk from impure animals might engender the disease. My hon. friend rather conveyed the idea that you cannot transmit tuberculosis from the milk. In other words take an animal with tuberculosis and you cannot produce the disease from that animal in the human being. I am inclined to think that if the human system is in a proper condition for the reception of tubercular matter, milk from a tuberculous animal will engender disease ; and so strong is this impression that in some countries they say that if there is no such thing as milk used by the citizens of that country, they will never be afflicted with tuberculosis. My hon. friend on the other side of the House apparently takes this view to some extent. I do not advance that as a correct theory, but I say the use of milk from infected animals is frequently admitted and advanced as the cause of the spread of the disease. As to what my hon. friend said regarding the use of liquors, I may say I believe very strongly that as much tubercular disease is produced on account of the dissipation that is taking place in the country as from any other one cause. Take the individual whose system is lowered and his vitality weakened and impaired by the effects of alcoholic liquor, and place in that system the germs of the disease ; I say that there is very great danger indeed of tuberculosis of the lungs. We know the effects of liquor. No one can take a drink of liquor but that in a few minutes it is exhaled from the lungs. We all know that liquor drinkers have to resort to something to sweeten their breath if they come in close proximity to others, otherwise the odour is at once detected. If you persist in the practice of drinking alcoholic liquors and thus weaken or impair the tissues of the lung, you prepare the way for the bacillus in the lung. Therefore it is a warning to every individual to abstain from the use of liquors under any circumstances. It is true some of the best physiologists say that the young man should not drink a drop, that the middle-aged man may take a glass, and that the old man ought to drink. I hardly believe in that doctrine, because we have had in the Senate some of the oldest men of the country who never drank in their lives. That shows that they have avoided the danger to which the liquor habit would expose them. Individually, I believe that it is an unfortunate thing that any one should weaken the system by the use of drinks.

The next question is, what is required to be done to prevent the disease? We should, in the first place, see that every means is used to prevent its further spreading. It is not necessary for me to state the loss by tubercular disease through the country. That has been fully described. But the loss to the country bears no comparison to the amount of sorrow and affliction that it brings to the people of this country, the loss to the individual and the sorrow to the parent. I have known families of five, six, eight or ten being swept away by tubercular diseases, and that being so, one would conclude that the financial loss is not to be compared to the loss in other ways. Then the next question arises, is the disease transmissible from the mother to the children. This is a disputed question. Some contend that such is the case, and others contend that it is not. We unfortunately know that in many cases one member of a family who has been afflicted with the disease remains at home with the rest of the family and it extends to the other members of the family. That may be the result of hereditary tendencies to some extent. As I said, before, if you have a system weakened in any way, the soil in which the bacillus locates itself being thus in a more receptive condition than it would be in another person, that person will be more liable to contract the disease by transmission from parent to child. We know that the lungs are not the only part affected. We know full well that every portion of the body is affected by tubercular matter. The lungs are perhaps more prone than other portions of the body on account of the bacillus coming more frequently in contact with them, but if that bacillus enters the system at any point it is liable to extend through the whole body. We have the disease located in the joints, we have the disease located in the mesentery and various parts of the glandular human system. We find it in every tissue of the body. Frequently we find it in an ulcer, where it is utterly impossible to effect a cure until the bacilli be destroyed, and removed from it; showing that no portion of the human system is free from this disease. Every portion of the body is liable to be attacked, and therefore it is necessary for us to understand the best method of excluding the germs. While I am strongly in favour of isolation, while I am strongly in favour of people being sent to sanitaria, yet I believe much can be done by careful treatment even at home. It is impossible for everybody to be sent away to a sanitarium. A great many people cannot afford it. Use the proper remedies at home. See that your children and families are properly cared for and you will not require to send them away, and you will not require to ask the government for a large grant. I am well aware, and the best authors say that from 50 to 95 per cent of human beings are to a certain extent affected by it. If that be so, how is it that they become cured? They are not sent to sanitaria; careful treatment at home, good diet, fresh air, lively exercise, and pleasant surroundings to enable them to become comfortable, happy and contented. That will go a long way to do away with the disease. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe firmly in the principles that I have enunciated here as to the circumstances in which the disease is propagated, yet I believe that even with all the care we may exercise we will find the disease springing up in certain localities. That being so what should we do? We should promulgate as much information as we possibly can from one end of the Dominion to the other. We should try and get as much information as possible into the hands of the people, in reference to the methods by which they can avoid infection. By that means we will prevent much of the loss of life consequent upon the ravages of this dreadful disease. I have mentioned to you the drinking habit. You will ask me how is it that this causes the disease. We all know what the effects of liquor are on the human body. We all know that it has a depressing effect, I can remember full well in my practice in my earlier life, we gave liquors together with cod liver oil, and various other kinds of medicine to ward off the disease. Take a certain stage of the disease where the patient is hopeless, when the system requires something to support it, and you have not the means to support it, I can understand perhaps that if some good whisky—no doubt the Scotch would say Scotch rye whisky—were used, it would enter into the system and act on the oxygen of the system to keep up the animal heat and not require the tissues of the system to be called upon. The liquor does not cure the patient. It only mitigates, perhaps, the difficulty just for the time being, and therefore there is no permanent benefit in the use of liquor in that way.

I should be greatly pleased if the government could see their way to grant aid to the various sanitaria in the different provinces of Canada, but I cannot see my way very strongly to advise a system of that kind. I have yet to see how such a system can be properly and efficiently carried out. We have an inspector here who is supposed to watch the immigrants coming into this country. I make the charge here, and I believe it is true, that the proper degree of care and interest in the various kinds of immigration coming into this country, has not been exercised as it ought to have been. We find people imported into Canada from foreign countries. They want to get rid of them there. They are the children of diseased parents and they are brought out here and mix with our own population, thereby contaminating the health of the people of the Dominion of Canada. If the officials would watch more carefully the kind of immigrants they permit to land in this country, I think perhaps they would do as much good as will be done by voting a small amount of assistance to the various institutions. Are we not entitled to know when a citizen comes from a foreign country whether that citizen be a healthy subject? Are we not entitled to have our inspectors or professors carefully examine the immigrants coming here. I have been told that the children were inspected in the old country and are also inspected in Canada, but I believe from past experience and from what I have seen, that they are not guarded and protected to the extent that they ought to be. Believing these things, and feeling a desire to offer my support to any means that may be proposed whereby we can in the future prevent the spread of tuberculosis, I am still not an enthusiast. I do not believe we will be able to eradicate that disease entirely from the country. I believe that where the causes exist and where the children are neglected and not kept in the manner in which they should be, we will have the disease engendered, and we will have the disease to fight as long as we have a country for them to live in. I believe that we cannot exterminate tuberculosis from among the people, but I am favourable to every means being adopted whereby we can prevent the spread of this disease. It is admitted to be conveyed by the sputum. If it dries and floats in the air and is inhaled into the lungs, and passes through the lungs, wherever the bacillus may be located it will produce its effect upon the tissues of the body. I believe it is transmitted in that way although it is transmissible by other means. This being the principal means of communication, we should adopt a method to prevent the spreading of the disease by this means in the future. Let us all heartily unite and let every senator feel that it is his duty to promulgate the information which is necessary so that the people may be thoroughly conversant with the causes of the disease, and extend to every school section the warning that unless the children are looked after they are liable to be afflicted. We know that many people are more anxious for the health and safety of the inferior animals than they are of their dear children at home. Let us look to it and see that those children are properly cared for. We may then have what Canada is able to produce—the healthiest race under the sun.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I rise merely to call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) to the advisability of changing somewhat the form of his motion. Before doing so, I desire to say one word only in answer to the remarks which have just been made by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas. There is no doubt that if we could induce the people at large to live in an ideal manner, it would be the best preventive possible, and it would be such a preventive that the services of physicians would not be very often required, but unfortunately we have to take humankind with its shortcomings and we have to face the position as it exists. There is no doubt that the methods now adopted in Canada are the old methods, whereas in other countries since it has been scientifically ascertained that tuberculosis is contagious, and that means could be devised to guard against its ravages, other methods are being adopted to combat the disease and all precautions taken as a preventive ; and it seems to me that it is the duty of the federal government as well as the local government and of municipal governments and of every public spirited gentleman in this country to exercise all possible effort toward that end.

If I understand the motion as it appears on the order paper, it would imply a demand on parliament to take some active steps to lessen the widespread suffering and the great mortality among the people of Canada caused by the various forms of tuberculosis. By using the word parliament it would imply either legislation or a grant, and I think that if the resolution is passed in that form that it will be the last that we will hear of it. The resolution will be adopted, but we shall not hear of any action being taken on it in the future. The matter is more within the province of the local legislatures than within the province of the federal government, and I am afraid that that is an objection which is likely to be raised, and therefore I suggest that the scope of the resolution be enlarged, so that the motion will read in this way :

That in the opinion of the Senate the time has arrived when parliament should take some active steps to lessen the widespread suffering and the great mortality among the people of Canada, caused by the various forms of tuberculosis.

And I would suggest adding the following words :

And that conferences between the Dominion and provincial governments should be had at the earliest possible moment in order that the best mode of action in the premises may be adopted.

If the hon. gentleman is willing to adopt the suggestion and place his motion in this form, then it will be incumbent—after the expression of opinion on the part of this House—on the Dominion government to organize a conference of that kind with the local governments, and after this conference then the organized body mentioned in the resolution should be invited to meet with the governments and to advise with the several governments as to the best means to be adopted in the premises.

Hon. Mr. FISET—In the few remarks I intend to make on the important question which is now before the House, I should be glad to address you in English ; but not being thoroughly familiar with this language, I hope you will allow me to speak in French. My remarks will be short.

(In French). Our thanks are due to the hon. member for Russsell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) for having drawn the attention of this Chamber to this subject, so important, of tuberculosis. His social position, bringing him as it does into communication not only with the well-to-do, but also with the poorer clasess, probably renders him better able than many others to make statements based upon his own experience as to the ravages which this terrible plague is making, above all in families who, for lack of knowledge, or lack of means are unable to give to the unfortunates who have contracted the disease, that particular care which their condition requires. For this fact must be borne in mind: While consumption makes ravages in all classes of society, it may reasonably be expected to work the greatest havoc among those who live in straitened circumstances, in confined quarters, and who are too poor to obtain the comforts of which they stand in need, or possibly ignorant of the means to be taken to fortify themselves against this terrible malady. It is not my intention to speak of tuberculosis as a disease ; this has been done by others, who have addressed the House before me It is enough to say that, thanks to the celebrated Dr. Koch, we are to-day acquainted with the virus of tuberculosis—its microbe, properly speaking—which is termed the bacillus. The eminent Dr. Koch having discovered the microbe, believed at one time that he had discovered a serum which would cure the malady itself. Up to the present time, however, his researches, though very useful, have not yielded the results which were expected. But these researches are being continued, not only in Germany, but also in other countries, particularly in France. This discovery of the bacilli by Dr. Koch, has had the effect of stimulating scientists to seek some way of destroying them in the human organism. Marmoreck, of Paris, was sure that he had found a serum which would cure tuberculosis. Following the example of Pasteur, Roux and many others, he commenced by rendering a horse immune to tuberculosis, and then availed himself of serum obtained from the blood of the animal thus rendered immune, for the purpose of inoculating tuberculous patients. The success which he has attained up to the present has attracted the attention of the scientific world, although the results of his work are still regarded with doubt in certain quarters. It cannot be supposed that the effects of a serum in the case of a slow disease like consumption—one which is of long duration, will be as rapid as in the case of an acute disease like diphtheria. The doubt which still exists has not, however, prevented action being taken. Actuated, no doubt, by the ideas of distinguished philanthropists like Sir Donald Smith, Sir Wm. McDonald, Sir Geo. Stephen, men who merit the appellation of benefactors of humanity, the city council of the metropolis of Canada has been impelled to send one of its distinguished sons, Dr. A. Demartigny, to study on the spot the methods employed in Paris by Marmoreck ; and in a very elaborate report, well prepared, which he has presented to the city council, Dr. Demartigny expressed the conviction that Marmoreck has actually discovered the true serum of tuberculosis. And as a matter of fact, he is bringing into practice in Montreal, the methods which he has studied in Paris. Marmoreck is also contiuning his researches, and perfecting his methods. I am one of those who have confidence in the efficacy of serums, and I firmly believe that sooner or later we shall end by discovering the true serum which will triumph over the bacillus of tuberculosis.

As to the question of this malady being hereditary, that theory is generally denied to-day. According to the maxim of M. Nocard, 'a man is born predisposed to tuberculosis, but he is not born tuberculous ;' meaning, no doubt, that children born of tuberculous parents will be more predisposed to take consumption by means of contagion than children born of healthy parents. But if the theory of heredity in the case of tuberculosis is rejected by the greater number, it is nevertheless a fact that the contrary view, namely that tuberculosis is inherited, is still held by some of the most distinguished doctors of medicine, such as Herard-Verneuil, Landouzy, Quérat, Lannelongue, Damaschino, Leroux, Sabourand, Petit, Laude, Gärtne in Germany and a great number of others. These medical authorities present arguments which cannot be disregarded, in support of the claims that tuberculosis is hereditary. And it is no doubt in consequence of this that to-day we find the widespread idea in all classes of society, but above all in the classes least instructed, that as a general thing tuberculous parents beget tuberculous children.

But every one admits that tuberculosis is contagious, and the principal point to which we ought to devote ourselves is the prevention of this contagion. It is in this direction that all our efforts should tend, and it is this object which my hon. friend the member for Russelll (Hon. Mr. Edwards) has in view in making his motion.

From a sanitary point of view, the isolation of tuberculosis patients is, beyond contradiction, the most efficacious means of preventing the spread of the disease by contagion.

This isolation of the sick can be accomplished in three ways : isolation in the family, in isolation hospitals and in sanitaria. Of these three methods, isolation in the family is the least desirable and at the same time the most difficult to carry out properly. This is the case in tuberculosis as well as in all other contagious diseases. It is necessary first of all that the people of this country should be instructed and made to understand the great danger which exists, that a patient suffering from consumption will communicate the disease to the other members of the family. It is the work of the medical profession to carry on this work of education, and to see to it that their instructions are followed. But what power has the doctor in practice to render this isolation compulsory ? At the present moment—I speak particularly of the country districts—he has none whatever. A person suffering from tuberculosis lives day after day without being separated in any way from the other members of the family. In order to remedy this deplorable state of things, the different provincial boards of health ought to require the doctors to make to the health officers in charge of their respective districts a report in each case of tuberculosis which they treat. The patient ought to be isolated in a separate room, at least during hours of sleep ; his expectorations should be received in a vessel employed for that purpose only, and all possible methods of disinfection should be employed to prevent the communication of the infection by the sick person. The health officer should have all necessary authority to render these precautionary measures effective. These measures are perfectly practicable as regards the well-to-do classes of our population ; as for the poorer classes, patients ought to be treated, either at an isolation hospital or at a sanitarium, at the country's expense.

As to isolation hospitals, the greater number of our large Canadian cities possess such institutions, and the provincial boards of health require every person suffering from a contagious disease to be sent there for treatment. In each one of these institutions there should be established a section known as the tuberculosis section, where poor patients could receive proper treatment and attention free of charge. The establishment of such a section might be at the expense of the city, but aided by a grant from the state ; and this is the only method of protecting the poorer class of the population of the cities.

But the third method, which is the very best, is the method of isolation in a sanitarium. By sanitarium we mean an isolation hospital built as far as possible in the mountains or in some elevated situation, dry, protected from winds and surrounded by trees—above all pine and fir trees—localities where tuberculous patients and others may be treated in pure air and under the most favourable hygienic conditions.

The most important establishment of the kind which we have in the country is, I believe, the one situated in Muskoka, consisting of an hotel, hospital, detached cottages and tents. Patients are treated there under the most favourable conditions, and the results obtained are truly wonderful. It was with great pleasure that I heard the other day the remarks of the hon. member from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed). Without doubt the neighbourhood of the Rocky Mountains, like that of British Columbia, must offer superb locations having every advantage for the establishment of such sanitaria, and the government should establish, subsidize and oversee a number of such institutions. The cost would not be very great, for it has been proven that the dwelling best suited for the purpose—and it is the one which is in use in the sanitarium in Muskoka—is the ordinary cotton tent, of green colour, provided with a complete system of ventilation and with means of heating in winter. In these sanitaria the poorer classes could obtain free treatment and I am certain that the benefits experienced would amply compensate for the expenditure incurred.

This question of tuberculosis which we are now discussing has become one of such surpassing importance that the entire world follows with interest and anxiety the researches and experiments which the scientists of France, Germany, England and America have been carrying on during the past few years. I consider that this question has become for us quite as important as the question of immigration, and that it is only right that we should devote to the task of protecting our population a considerable portion of the appropriation which we set apart each year for bringing in foreigners.

Here in Ottawa itself we have highly competent officials in charge of the different departments dealing with medical and sanitary matters. We have the Director General of Public Health, the Superintendent of Immigration, the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, the Director of the Medical Service of the Militia. Aided by one or more secretaries, this commission might be charged with the work of inquiring into and reporting to the government on the following points :—

1. The exact number of patients to be treated.

2. The measures to be adopted by the Provincial Boards of Health to effect isolation in the family, the hospital or the sanitarium, as the case may be.

3. What subsidies are necessary to be voted by the government to defray the cost of organization, administration, &c.

4. What would not be less important, this commission would be able to advise as to the possibility of creating at Ottawa a bureau for study and research, where microscopic examinations could be made free of charge, not only in the case of tuberculosis, but as well of other diseases. This laboratory could be established as a branch in connection with the experimental farm ; and experiments in the culture of germs, inoculation and the preparation of the different serums, could be conducted at the expense of the country. This commission, to my idea, would be the most practical method for the government to come to the aid of, and worthily sustain, the unceasing efforts of the philanthropists of our country and of the medical world in Canada. In closing, I would say, like the celebrated doctor L. H. Petit, at one of the congresses held at Paris on the subject of tuberculosis,—'Let us continue to work.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (in French)—I may be pardoned if, though not a member of the medical profession, I venture to say a few words in answer to the hon. gentleman from Rimouski (Hon. Mr. Fiset), who has just spoken. I agree with him in all the measures he has proposed to check and suppress the disease, and influence the government to take steps in that direction, but I cannot endorse all he has said. For instance, he is under the impression that a scientist named Marmoreck has discovered an effective tuberculosis serum. This is disputed. Marmoreck belonged to the Pasteur Institute in Paris, where he made a few scientific discoveries, especially one in regard to erysipelas, which brought him great renown. He continued his researches and tried to discover a tuberculosis serum. When he thought he had succeeded, he commenced to apply it, but was obliged to leave the institute because the institute would not assume the responsibility of the application of the serum. More than that, the Medical Academy of Paris condemned the use of the serum. So in France the discovery of Marmoreck is not thought to amount to anything. In Canada, I am told that in a few days the Medical Society of Quebec, composed of the leading physicians of that city, are going to pass resolutions condemning the application of that serum in our country. The principal medical men of Quebec, who have tested the serum, find that instead of healing the disease it accelerates its progress, so much so that in view of the claims made for the serum they think it their duty to let the public know the nature of that remedy. I am told that in Montreal the serum is at present in great favour, but no clear case has been shown to establish its value. I think it is my duty to call public attention to these facts so that nobody may be misled. The remedy is in the experimental stage at present in this country, and from what we have learned so far it is a failure. It might become in the future, when improved, a valuable remedy, but for the time being its value has not been established, and I feel it my duty to state the actual results who have attended the use of the serum.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I entirely agree with the views expressed by the hon. senator from Rideau and with the remarks of the hon. senator from Kingston, showing that the hon. member (Hon. Mr. Edwards) is animated by patriotic sentiments, but I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the resolution, as it stands, is not in order. What would be the result if we passed it ? After members have given expression to their opinions, nothing can be done. It will be in the Debates and nobody will read it. I would suggest to my hon. friend to add to his motion an amendment calling for the appointment of a special committee with instructions to inquire into and report as to the best way of preventing tuberculosis, with power to send for persons and papers. If that is done we will have a report which, if considered sufficiently important, can be printed and published and disseminated throughout the country. Otherwise we shall only have the speeches in the Debates, and very few people will read them.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—It is my intention to accept the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Wellington, and I shall move for the appointment of a committee. as my hon. friend suggests.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—There is no motion before the House. It is simply getting the opinion of the House ; therefore, there can be no amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that is accepted it becomes the original motion. It might be just as well to add to the motion before the House that a committtee be appointed.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I am quite willing.

Hon. Mr. FROST moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow, to be the first order after the unopposed orders.

The motion was agreed to.

2. Did the new appointee already occupy a salaried position at the time of his appointment as Principal Medical Officer ?
3. What was the salary attached to the position which he occupied ?
4. What salary does he now receive for the position to which he has just been appointed?
5. Does he continue to occupy his late position ?
6. If not, who has replaced him, and at what salary ?
7. What salary had Mr. Sewell at the time of his appointment as Principal Medical Officer?
8. What salary had he when he was replaced?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are as follows :

1. Major G. H. Parke.
2. and 3. No.
4. $25 per month.
5. and 6. He did not occupy any.
7. Pay of rank, which at that time was $3.50 per diem.

Bill (82) An Act to incorporate the Annuity Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

BRITISH CANADIAN EMPIRE LEAGUE BILL.

SECOND READING—POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called.

Bill (P) An Act to incorporate the British Canadian Empire League.—(Hon. Mr. Domville.)

The SPEAKER—When the hon gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) moved the second reading of this Bill, a point of order was raised by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson), and I am prepared to decide that matter now.

The point of order raised by the hon. senator from Marshfield is well taken.

This Bill has been introduced as a private Bill based upon a petition which has not yet been reported by the Committee on Standing Orders and it cannot be advanced another stage without a report by that committee. The hon. senator from Rothesay claims that this Bill is a public Bill and need not, therefore, be based upon a petition. To present this Bill as a public one the hon. gentleman should have first withdrawn the present Bill and if it is his intention to proceed on those lines I feel it my duty to inform him that I have carefully examined the nature of this Bill and that I have come to the conclusion that this Bill is a private Bill.

The object of this Bill is the creation of a private corporate body which may hold real and personal property, erect buildings, borrow money, sign promissory notes as they may deem proper. The other object of the proposed association is of a public nature in the academic form only, and although it may tend to affect the public policy of the country, the members of the association individually could reach the same end without incorporating. Their present demand is to obtain a privilegium—the creation of a moral being who will assume obligations for which the persons joining will have but a limited responsibility.

The teaching of religion and of morals is a highly deserving object, yet no sect can obtain an Act of Incorporation vesting that religious association with similar powers to those presently sought for without doing so through a petition.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Accepting the decision of the Speaker, I ask that this Bill be allowed to stand until I can consult those who placed it in my hands.

The Order was allowed to stand.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (57) an Act to incorporate 'La Compagnie du chemin de fer électrique de Trois-Rivières, St. Maurice, Maskinongé et Champlain.'—(Hon. Mr. Legris.)

Bill (60) an Act to incorporate the Algoma Copper Range Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Bill (64) an Act respecting the Central Counties Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Edwards.)

Bill (102) an Act respecting a patent of the Gold Medal Furniture Manufacturing Company, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

SPREAD OF TUBERCULOSIS IN CANADA.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called:

March 30—Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Edwards, that in the opinion of the Senate the time has arrived when the State should take some active steps to lessen the widespread suffering and the great mortality among the people of Canada, caused by the various forms of tuberculosis, and that conferences between the Dominion and Provincial Governments should be had at the earliest possible moment in order that the best mode of action in the premises may be adopted.

Hon. Mr. FROST said: My hon. friend from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Sullivan) yesterday, in his admirable argument, seemed to think that this honourable House was not taking quite the interest in this great subject that it deserves. Whatever others may consider, I for one desire to place upon record my views, and also to show that at least I have an interest in this grave subject. It is one of serious importance and well worthy a discussion in this honourable House. And even if it accomplishes nothing more than drawing the attention of the country to the enormous drain upon it through the ravages of tuberculosis, it will have been time well spent. The hon. senator from Kingston, in his admirable speech yesterday, very successfully impressed the House in his own inimitable way with the great importance and seriousness of this question. And I am bound to say that he made it clear, at any rate, that there was a large hope for poor suffering humanity if only proper precautions are taken in the first instance. And herein, in my judgment, lies the root of the whole matter. The 'white plague,' as it is called, stalks through the land, like a horrible ogre mowing a path for himself through the seething mass of humanity, sending annually many thousands down to premature graves. And unfortunately this has been going on for years. It is argued that because the government are annually paying large sums to bring to the country many thousands of people, they should therefore pay out something to save many thousands who can be cured, provided they are placed in the right conditions and surroundings and receive the proper treatment. It has been demonstrated without a doubt that tuberculosis can be cured, and the remedy is a simple one. Then why permit the increasing mortality to go on ? If the government decide to contribute towards the maintenance of sanitaria, can it not, with equall good reasons, be asked to support other institutions for the stamping out of various contagious and deadly diseases, such as typhoid fever, appendicitis, scarlet fever, and so on ? The obstacle which appears to me to be the most formidable in deciding this question is to exactly discover where individual effort ceases and government responsibility begins.

My hon. friend from St. Thomas yesterday gave us some excellent advice, speaking from a large experience as a physician ; and, it was quite easy to draw the conclusion that in the proper sanitary conditions, good health could be permanently assured. I was not able to follow all the professional terms used by my hon. friend, owing to a lack of medical knowledge, but, I gathered this much, that if men and women would properly ventilate their houses and schools, keep proper hours, abolish bad food and bad liquor, wear suitable clothing for the climate, and if diseased refrain from marriage—which entails disease and misery on future generations—we would have one of the healthiest countries in the world. It was certainly an ideal picture, and if it could be lived up to, how much happier would we all be, and to what great ages would we all attain. But there is so much to interfere that we can only gaze on the picture without ever expecting to attain to it. Look at our cities, and consider the smoke and dust that have to be constantly breathed while men pursue their avocations and secure a living for their families. Take a look into some of the tenement houses, occupied by scores of families breathing air laden with odours from the stench and filth that accumulate in congested and overcrowded localities in defiance of all sanitary rules and regulations. Go down into mines and quarries where men labour by lamplight for their daily bread. When we realize how unsanitary are a large majority of the occupations of our people—how so many groan under the yoke of surroundings that must shorten life and make many living days nothing more than days of pain and misery, we can very readily see why such diseases as the ' white plague ' are so prevalent among us, and why our population is being constantly decimated by such a scourge. The problem to solve is how to overtake and annihilate it. Notwithstanding the over-crowding in cities and the imprudence and thoughtlessness of many who deliberately violate the rules of health, the country ought to show as clean a bill of health as any in the world. We are blessed with an incomparable climate. As a nation we are fond of outdoor sports and athletics. Medical jurisprudence is greatly improved over the old days when blue pills and leeches and bleeding were the favourite remedies for most of the ills to which flesh is heir. Our land abounds in schools and colleges in which sanitation and hygiene form prominent subjects in the curriculum of studies. We have a large and ever-increasing number of libraries upon the shelves of which can be found books that easily direct the reader into correct methods of living. There are very few people now-a-days, no matter what their position in life, but what take a few weeks every summer for recreation and recuperation. Yet with all these in favour of health we find men breaking down from overwork and worry at 40 to 50 years of age, heart failure and paralysis steadily on the increase, and infant mortality reaching figures that are simply staggering. Hospitals are over-crowded with patients and thousands are going down to premature graves yearly from tuberculosis alone.

No doubt much of this appalling catalogue of ills could be averted by the people themselves, if taken hold of in an intelligent manner. This is a land of lakes, rivers and streams. Is there any good reason why any one should live year after year in dirt and filth and contract the most obnoxious diseases, when water is so plentiful ? Where in the whole world can better materials for food be found ? What other country can show better flour, meat, vegetables, fruits, dairy products, and so on, than Canada ; and all within the reach of the humblest in the land, if thrift and industy are practised. Yet, what incalculable pain and disease arises from bad food taken into the system? One prominent physician states that most of the diseases of the land come from an overloaded stomach, superinducing constipation, indigestion and all the evils that follow in their train. How much of this can be overcome by right methods? As an instance of what can be done by individual effort, I may mention a case that came under my own observation. Not long ago a young lady of my acquaintance was afflicted with tuberculosis, and it looked as though she was marked for an early grave. Her physician prescribed a simple diet and fresh air. Through summer and winter, calm and storm, her bed-room window was left open, and to-day, after a year or more of the treatment, she is perfectly well and in the enjoyment of good health. She was determined to get well and went into the treatment heroically and faithfully, and it was a success. Throughout Canada there are many patients languishing from tuberculosis, sitting idly in easy chairs in hot rooms or unventilated apartments, afraid of fresh air and simply waiting without hope until that day when they pass into the great beyond. Fresh air is the great remedy at sanitaria, but it is not necessary to go to Muskoka or Saranac Lake or Colorado to obtain it. It is everywhere in this blessed country, and if indulged in at home, and a strict regime maintained in other ways, success will crown the efforts put forth. There are, however, many that are not perhaps so favourably situated at home as to carry on a thorough treatment, and to whom a sanitarium would be a great boon. As I have already said, people who breathe impure air because there is no other, cannot open their windows and get benefit; and every one cannot live in the country. It is the lot of most people to work for their daily bread; and it is well known that the environment of factories and offices where lights burn all day and men have to toil on in spite of surroundings, does not conduce to the maintenance of health. It is for this class that by a judicious expenditure on the part of the government, much might be done to alleviate the miseries arising from this plague in our land.

The amendment of the hon. member from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) is quite to my mind. It rounds out the motion of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards) and secures future action looking to a solution of the problem. The whole subject is well worth investigation. With statistics before a conference as to the causes and extent of the disease; and with additional information as to the preventibility of it, under certain surroundings and treatment, there is no doubt that an intelligent policy will be adopted that will be worthy of our common Christianity and the terrible ravages of this great scourge in our land, greatly mitigated if not entirely wiped out. I have therefore much pleasure in supporting the motion of my hon. friend from Ottawa, as amended by my hon. friend from de Salaberry, and I trust that every action will be taken and every effort will be made to get at the bottom of the trouble, so that if it is possible by any judicious expenditure of money to eradicate this scourge, the result may be accomplished.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have listened with great interest to the instructive addresses which have been delivered on this subject bearing upon the scientific side of the question. I on the other hand address myself to the economic side. You know that without the sinews of war nothing can be done, and I purpose to make a few suggestions, whether they will be carried out or not. I wish, in the first place, to refer to the pollution of our rivers. It is a disgrace to this city that for years the contents of privies have been carried out on the ice and dumped into the rivers. The people living along the banks of the river have used the water of the Ottawa without filtration, and that is a cause of disease. I am sorry the hon. gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) is not here this afternoon; I wished to remind him of the deep interest which his predecessor, Senator Clemow, took in keeping the Ottawa river free from pollution. It is a disgrace to the city and to the government that the pollution of the river from the causes I have mentioned is allowed to continue. It is an avenue of filth from one end to the other. Another matter which ought to be attended to is the crowding of children in the schools without any attempt to inspect their physical condition. No doubt many children, and probably some of the teachers, are infected with tuberculosis. We spend a great deal of money on immigration, but if a portion of the amount expended in bringing people into the country were devoted to keeping the people we have alive and in good health, it would be a wise policy on the part of the government. If we could save five out of the eight thousand lives lost every year from tuberculosis, it would be a great triumph in the interest of humanity, and the progress of the country. I would suggest that if the clergymen of this country were invited to appeal to their congregations to subscribe towards a fund to build sanitaria and take other steps to eradicate this disease, a great deal could be accomplished. If people were asked to subscribe $50 each per annum, very large sums could be raised; very few would object to paying that amount. I would also suggest to the government that if money is required to build sanitaria they should guarantee the interest on the necessary amount. If $20,000 is spent in each province, that would be $140,000 for the seven provinces, and interest at 5 per cent would be only $7,000. Surely the government could afford to contribute $7,000 a year to try and stamp out the white plague. Then for maintenance the grants from the provinces and voluntary contributions would suffice. The buildings should be put up as separate hospitals and the patients should not be crowded together. Each building should accommodate say about a dozen and not more. That would be a step in the right direction. I am glad to say that the health officer of British Columbia has done a great deal of good in securing funds for stamping out this disease. He has a long list of subscribers who give one dollar annually, and he has also got up tableaux, concerts and meetings, and in that way has gathered together a good deal of money. If something of the same kind were done in every part of the country, there would be no trouble in raising funds. I hope the government will not overlook my suggestions.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—It was not my intention to make any remarks upon this very important and interesting subject, and I do so now only because of a remark dropped yesterday by one who has placed us in the position of debtors for his excellent speech. It was to this effect: He could not tell whether the Senate appreciated speeches of that kind or not, that he did not discover many evidences of sympathy or appreciation, but he did discover that there was quiet, patient listening. We have had a good many discussions on important subjects in the Senate this session, but I am bound to say that we have had none of equal importance to the one now under consideration. Some one has said, perhaps truly, that a man who makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before is entitled to be called a public benefactor. Similarly the man who is instrumental in causing a decrease in the death rate, and where two deaths occurred before reduces the rate to one death, is entitled to be called a benefactor of his race. The hon. gentleman who launched this question in the House has made us all his debtors. He evidently has devoted a great deal of time and care to the subject, and he seemed to speak from the heart, whence all good things should emanate. It must be gratifying to him and to all who so ably seconded his efforts, who have been kind enough to address this House on that subject, to find the Senate so deeply interested in the matter. I think it was that very wise man, Lord Bacon, who said that all knowledge was for the relief of man's state. Now if we have, as I am sure we have, a good deal more knowledge than we had before this discussion began, we must feel that our condition is ameliorated. I do not intend to particularize the speeches. They have all been excellent, including the very impressive and proper observations of the hon. gentleman who last addressed this House. During the discussion the thought has occurred to me, in what kind of plight would we be individually if the violation of the laws of health were made criminal offences. If they were, I think it would take several courts to try each one of us, sitting eight or ten hours a day, for I do not know of any matter about which people are apparently more careless and indifferent than they are regarding the laws of health. The wonder to me is, not that the mortality is so great, but that it is not far greater, considering how careless people are of the rules of health; and one of the lessons that I draw from the speeches which have been made is this, that in order to enjoy good health, cleanliness is one of the indispensable conditions. Some one has said, and I am glad he said it, because I think it is very true, that cleanliness is next to godliness. I believe in that thoroughly. All, no matter how humble their origin, could live in a cleanly manner, much more so than is commonly done. In fact too many people live as though they delighted in committing suicide from day to-day, for we are practically—I do not know that we are exceptions or that some are so amenable to that phrase as others—we are practically, in our disregard and violation of the laws of health, committing suicide from day to day. That is a pretty serious problem. Another lesson I have learned from the medical gentlemen who have so kindly addressed us is this: that another indispensable condition of health is fresh air and lots of sunshine. It seems to me that if there is one thing more than another that can be called a panacea for every ill, it is fresh air and sunshine, and if that truth should go through the length and breadth of the land and the people will just sit down and think about it, a great boon will have been conferred upon the people of this country by the discussion of the subject. As an instance, up in Cumberland, where I live, an intelligent farmer writes me: 'I see in the papers that you are discussing the disease called tuberculosis. Could you send me some information about that matter?' Now, that is an encouraging sign, and it is some evidence of the value of this discussion. I hope the information given will go broadcast through the land. The hon. senator from Victoria has truly said that money is very important in accomplishing this result. I should like to add that we can accomplish a great deal without money, if we only make use of the privileges with which a kind Providence has surrounded us, that is, among other things, plenty of fresh air and sunshine.

We have a good deal, and I hope will have more, valuable information on this subject as it affects the lower animals. That is an important subject, but it is comparatively unimportant when considered in connection with the same terrible disease as it affects humanity. They are lower animals; we are animals of a higher order. These two subjects can be very fittingly discussed together, and I am very glad that they appear on the same order paper. While I try to take an intelligent interest in the minutest and most unimportant Bills—if any Bill in this House can be called unimportant—I should like to have our deliberations here occasionally varied from what some might call the monotony of Bill legislation. It seems to lift us into a higher plane and to teach us what we are, and lead us to ask ourselves the question, whither are we going. With the resolution as amended, which I think is an improvement, the door is open for a good many in the Senate and in the country to make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, and be the means, as philanthropists, of diminishing the death rate and have only one case of mortality occur where there were two before. I hope this discussion will bear abundant fruit, and I believe it will if we show our interest in this important subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER, on behalf of Hon. Mr. Edwards, moved the adjournment of the debate until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. McMullen that the Senate of Canada desires to call the attention of the imperial government to the fact that Canadian herds are now and have been for many years past free from those particular diseases against which the embargo has been imposed.

That this has been repeatedly admitted by the imperial authorities themselves.

That under these circumstances the continued prohibition of the importation of Canadian cattle on the pretext that there is danger of the spread of those particular diseases among the British herds is an unjust imputation on the condition of Canadian cattle, and the Senate of Canada respectfully suggests that the Imperial Act based thereon should be repealed. And that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Honourable the President of the Board of Agriculture and to the Honourable the premier of England.—The Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If I am in order I beg to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Coffey, that this resolution be adopted in lieu of the one that was first printed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No objection. Carried.

The SPEAKER—I do not see that there is any necessity for the motion being put.

With the consent of the Senate, the modification was accepted yesterday.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—The resolution was not carried.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The motion is that the resolution, as amended, be now adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. tomorrow.

SENATE.

ANTHRACITE COAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (H) An Act to incorporate the Anthracite Coal Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto), in absence of Hon. Mr. Lougheed, moved that the Bill be read the third time on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I desire to say a word or two in reference to the report of the committee on this Bill. If I understood correctly, the Bill is reported without amendment, and I am sorry that the hon. gentleman from Calgary is not here to-day, because it is in the recollection of hon. members that he took strong grounds against a phrase used in a certain Bill. My hon. friend was very much in earnest, for not only did he present arguments to this House, but after doing so he tested the sense of the House, by a division on the question as to whether this phrase, which was objectionable to him, should be removed from the clauses of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What is the phrase ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—'At or near.' At the same time standing in his name was Bill (H), which, though not printed, was on the order paper ; and this Bill appears before us to-day. My hon. friend the other day pleaded earnestly for definite language in regard to the location of railways, and used strong arguments; but now we find the expression to which he so strongly objected repeated twice in this very Bill. The words 'at or near' appear in clause 7 of the Bill, and I am sure if he were here to-day he would object to the report of the committee and move that the Bill be referred back to have the words struck out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How was the notice worded ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG. It was not the notice he objected to, it was the expression. He said the latitude of expression permitted railway companies, sometimes, to exact a bonus or assistance from towns on account of their not being bound to carry their line into the corporation which they were passing or in the direction of which their line was projected. He cited one or two instances in the very neighbourhood to which the charter applies. I am glad the hon. gentleman brought it to my mind. He cited one or two instances in the very locality which this projected line was supposed to pass through, and pointed out that the latitude of expression was detrimental to the interest of these localities ; and I am sure if the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) had consulted my hon. friend from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) he would have asked the hon. gentleman from Toronto, to move that this objectionable clause be eliminated from the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The question which has been suggested or the observations which we have just heard, probably would not have been made if the hon. gentleman had been present as a member of the committee to-day, for this question was discussed in committee, and also discussed some days ago in the Senate, and I have no doubt whatever, if the hon. gentleman from Calgary had succeeded in persuading the Senate to adopt his view at that time, he would have seen that this Bill was amended in the manner suggested.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Will my hon. friend assure us that the hon. gentleman from Calgary would have taken that course ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I have no instructions and no information beyond this, that the subject was discussed in committee to-day and the committee determined to leave the words as they are in the Bill. I have no doubt whatever that if the hon.

gentleman had succeeded in persuading the Senate to adopt this view of the matter the other day, he would have been consistent, and had this Bill amended to conform to the view of the majority, but inasmuch as the Senate, as the result of the discussion the other day, adopted the other view, of course he bowed to the decision of the Senate, and left the phrase as it appears in the Bill now under consideration.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Will my hon. friend answer the question—was the hon. member from Calgary present to-day at the committee ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman say that because a majority may determine in a certain way against a man's principles, he must abandon them, as has been done elsewhere ? The hon. gentleman assumes that the hon. member from Calgary, did not insist upon moving to strike out the words 'at or near' in this Bill, owing to the fact that the Senate the other day, by a small majority, insisted upon leaving the same phrase in another Bill. Does the hon. member say that because a majority decided against the hon. member from Calgary that he should therefore abandon his principles ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not say anything of the kind, and I do not think any one here would make such an insinuation against the hon. member from Calgary.

Hon. Mr CLORAN—I am putting it on general principles.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I say he has complied with the views of the majority in the Senate, with reference to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I regret very much that the hon. gentleman brought this matter up. In the first place the question was raised by the hon. gentleman from Calgary in connection with the Calgary, Red Deer and Battleford Railway Company, on account of the petition and notices for the Bill containing no intimation that such a phrase would appear in the Bill. Would the hon. gentleman who has raised this discussion to-day say that this Bill, with which he is finding fault, differs from the petition and notices on the point in question ? If it does, then he has just cause to find fault. In the other case the hon. gentleman from Calgary acted within his rights. Representing Calgary, one of the places affected by the Bill, and having petitions and notices showing that the railway was to be constructed to Calgary, he was perfectly justified in looking after the interests of the people he represents and insisting that the road should go to Calgary. He would have been derelict in the performance of his duty had he not raised the point in the manner he did, and I regret exceedingly that in the absence of that hon. gentleman he should be charged with inconsistency. The criticism of the hon. member is not a fair one.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend has forgotten the speech of the hon. member from Calgary. As I understood it, he attacked the whole principle of having an expression of that kind appear in any Bill, and of course he went on to show what an injury it might be to the town of Calgary. I am very much pleased that he has been converted by the vote which was taken in the Senate the other day, and that he now thinks as the majority do. I was surprised myself this morning to see the Bill with the phrase in it 'at or near,' but I should not like to say, as my hon. friend has said, that the hon. member from Calgary had abandoned his principles. I would rather take the more charitable view of it and say that the majority in the Senate had converted him to their way of thinking.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Might I ask the hon. gentleman did the petition for this Bill say 'at or near,' or did it mention any terminal point ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. member from Calgary took exception to the use of the phrase 'at or near' when the Bill was in committee. Afterwards he saw there was a discrepancy between the notice and the Bill, and he took advantage of that to move in the House that the phrase be struck out. If my hon. friend will read the speech of the hon. member from Calgary he will see that he took objection to the principle of using such a loose phrase.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I rise to a point of order. This whole discussion is out of order. We are discussing a previous debate of this House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We may be out of order, but it is very enlightening.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I was not out of order; I was discussing the report of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC HOUSE TRUSTS.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

That in connection with the drink question, he will call the attention of the Senate to the British Gothenburg experiments and the public house trusts in England.

That in the opinion of the Senate the British Gothenburg experiments and the establishment of public house trusts in England have materially advanced the solution of the temperance question and of the social reform problem, and that the time has arrived when like experiment should be made and like public house trusts should be established in Canada.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Stands.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The motion has been standing a very long time, creating a great deal of unrest among my temperance friends, and I think we should proceed with it an an early date, because if it is important we should have trusts to sell liquor as I read the motion, we should have a chance of expressing our opinion on it. I myself am not in favour of trusts, and I think the discussion should not be delayed much longer.

The motion was allowed to stand.

EMBARGO ON CATTLE.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I should like to refer to the resolution which stood in my name which received the endorsation of the House yesterday, and in order to complete it I move that an humble address, accompanied by two copies of said resolution, be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying His Excellency that he will cause said resolution to be transmitted to the hon. Secretary of State for the Colonies with the request that one copy be delivered to the hon. premier, and one copy to the right hon. the President of the Board of Agriculture of England, respectively, for their information. With the permission of the House, I move this resolution now.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I think there should be a notice of that. However I do not object.

Mr. SPEAKER—This will stand as a notice of motion for Tuesday.

BRITISH CANADIAN EMPIRE LEAGUE BILL.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to call the attention of the House to the form of the Journals containing yesterday's proceedings. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when the hon. gentleman from Rothesay moved the second reading of the Bill which stands in his name to incorporate the British Empire League, I took objection to it. My hon. friend did not state when he made that motion that he was proceeding with the Bill as a public Bill, but I had inquired and found that the Standing Orders Committee had not reported, and that the fees had not been paid on the Bill, and therefore I assumed he was proceeding in that way, and I objected that the Bill was not of a public nature, but was a private Bill, and would have to be reported on by the Standing Orders Committee. The hon. Speaker yesterday decided that my point of order was well taken. I notice the ruling of the Speaker does not appear in the Journals of the House. I learn that in recent years the practice is not to insert the rulings. In former years the practice was to record all the decisions of the Speaker, but I think a difficulty was experienced in consequence of rulings occurring in debates, which would not fit properly into the order of proceedings, and on that account I understand the practice of omitting the rulings now prevails. I think it will be plain to hon. gentlemen that a ruling of this kind affecting a Bill should appear in the Journals. However, that is a matter I am not going to discuss fully now, or take strong grounds upon, but simply call attention to it because I think, for the guidance of the House on future occasions, on such an important point as to whether a Bill of a certain character is a public or a private Bill, the Journals should contain a note of the decision given. It would be quite concise, and it would fit into the Journals admirably. Instead of that, we have no reference to the ruling of the Speaker, and the Bill which was practically ruled out of order by the decision of the Speaker—that is what it amounted to—appears in the Orders of the Day for Thursday next. I am not raising any very strong objection to the action of the officers of the House, but I want to make this explanation that in taking the objection which I did against the Bill, and in future objections which I may take, I am acting under the advice and the instruction of the executive of the British Empire League in Canada, of which I am a vice-president, who are strongly opposed to the Bill in any form, and I say this for the guidance of the hon. gentleman from Rothesay. I also desire to inform my hon. friend and the House that the British Empire League propose to object to the Bill in every particular, and should it reach a committee of this House they will ask to be permitted to appear before that committee and oppose it. I give this notice and this explanation because owing to the very peculiar shape in which our Journals stand, it might be possible that this Bill would come up for second reading when I was not present, and some action might be taken on it which otherwise would not be taken. The report of the Standing Orders Committee has not been received and no notice has been given, and that is the objection which will lie against it as a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend from Marshfield has made a statement from which I can now thoroughly understand why objection was raised by him. In drawing up that Bill I simply copied one which had been passed before, based on all the other Bills. If my hon. friend had stated what he states to-day, that he was instructed by the British Empire League in Canada, or drawing his information from them, and that he proposed to block the Bill at every point, it would have left me then open to have said something, instead of which he is attempting to-day to censure the hon. Speaker on account of some informality in not recording the decision on the Bill. Let me inform my hon. friend that there is no such thing existing to-day as the British Empire League in Canada. I state it without fear of contradiction. I am a member of the British Empire League in England. I daresay a great many other gentlemen present may be. But some gentlemen for their own purposes have thought fit to bring into Canada some other organization and arrogate to themselves a power and an authority which they do not properly possess. They cannot come forward and attempt to dictate what Canadians shall do in Canada. There is no such association. Do they desire to bar us from calling ourselves the British Empire League of Canada, because they choose to usurp the name of a league that has been established in England, and choose for their own purposes, if I may say so, to call meetings here, and publish all their transactions in this country. I have received a paper from England called the 'British Empire League,' of which organization, as I have said before, I am a member. But Mr. Tom Brown writes to John Jones, and says in effect: 'Let us form a British Canadian Empire League,' irrespective of the rest of us who live in Canada and who are members of the existing league; and they take powers to themselves which they have no right to take. They have no legal existence in Canada to-day. I took the trouble to inquire from the Secretary of State's office whether they were incorporated or whether such a corporation existed in Canada, and I have a reply in the negative. An association for the purposes which have been specified already exists in Canada, notwithstanding my hon. friend from Marshfield and his advocacy of those two gentlemen from Toronto, notably one Col. Denison and another gentleman who choose to meet in holes and corners and pass all sorts of resolutions——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—There is no point of order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, it is all a point of order.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That association exists, and will exist, and will do business in Canada irrespective of my hon. friend from Marshfield and all his protests, and parliament into the bargain. If parliament thinks fit to say that the association now seeking incorporation is a loyal one, and desires to promulgate and perpetuate in this country imperial ideas and interests, well and good, but if the hon. gentleman thinks Col. Denison and nobody else shall do such work, he is mistaken, because others can go on without any parliamentary charter or Act or anything else of the kind. You cannot stifle public opinion in this country, and two or three gentlemen, for their own interests and for their own designs, cannot control public interest; cannot say what is to be done and what is not to be done.

The SPEAKER—A summary or a mention of the decision should perhaps have been entered in the Journals, but as the point is not raised just now by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, and as he is simply expressing a desire for the future, I will simply state why the Bill appeared for second reading at a subsequent date. It is that the hon. gentleman from Rothesay moved the second reading of his Bill, and I decided that he should not move the second reading of that Bill until there was a report of the Committee on Standing Orders; therefore, the second reading has been adjourned until next week, because between now and next week the Standing Orders Committee may report on the Bill, and then the second reading would be in order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not here yesterday, but the question that arose yesterday was as to whether it was a private or a public Bill. Has that point been decided ?

The SPEAKER—It has been decided this is a private Bill. The hon. gentleman contended that the second reading could be had although the Bill had been introduced as a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is it customary to record the rulings of the chair on the Journals of the House? I don't think it is.

The SPEAKER—No, it is not. But as there was a point of order raised on the right of the hon. gentleman to move the second reading, there should perhaps have appeared a mention of the Speaker's decision against the second reading of the Bill at that time.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been conveyed to me that it is the wish of the members of the Senate that there should be a recess dating from some day next week. From the present appearance of business, I do not think there will be much if any business before the Senate after Wednesday next. Three or four Bills have been set down for Thursday, but they are not Bills that can be taken up at that time. They will probably have to stand over for a further period. And therefore it probably would be convenient, particularly for gentlemen who live at a distance, to know, and I now give notice that I will move that when the House adjourns on Wednesday next, it stands adjourned until Wednesday the 3rd May.

THE EXTRADITION OF JOHANNES PETERS.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are proceded with, I wish to direct the attention of the government to a matter of public interest and one which, on the face of the statement that has been cabled to Canada, appears to me to be an interference with the duties or with the powers of our criminal authorities in Canada. Some time ago a prisoner who was wanted in Germany was arrested in Ottawa, and under our criminal code and the powers of the Extradition Treaty, I suppose, a Canadian officer was entrusted with his conveyance to Germany, which has been the procedure followed hitherto; but it appears on arriving in Liverpool, our Canadian officer was dispossessed of his prisoner, and was not allowed to carry out his instructions from the Canadian authorities. Now, if this is true, it would create a precedent that would be dangerous for the full enforcement of the Extradition Treaty. It comes from the Canadian Association Press, practically an authorized institution subsidized by Canadian money. The cable is as follows :

> London, April 6.—Johannes Peters, who was arrested in Ottawa last February, arrived on the 'Tunisian' in charge of Inspector Hogan, who thought to convey the prisoner direct to Germany, as instructed by the Canadian police. But Mr. Hogan was unable to do so, as the English police took charge of Peters on his arrival at Liverpool and took him to Bow street police court, London, where, the police stated, fresh committal order would have to be obtained there before Peters could be sent to his own country. Peters was remanded for a week.

If this statement of facts is correct, it is a direct intervention in business that has been considered our own up to the present time. No later than last month the deputy high constable, without any interference on the part of the English police, conveyed a prisoner to Switzerland. In a very short time the law of Canada may have to deal with a very serious case, under the Extradition Treaty, with regard to a crime committed in the United States, in which two persons are very prominent at the present moment. If the action of the police in London is correct, then these two parties who are now before our courts charged with the commission of a crime in a foreign country, should the court decide that they shall be extradited, may be taken out of the country by English police. Will it be necessary for English police to come here and take them to the United States ? Or will our Canadian police be entitled, as they have been in the past, to convey them across the border ? I simply call the attention of the government to this fact, with a view to having it reported to the Department of Justice to see where we stand in regard to this matter.

JOHN C. HOWE, MEDICAL INSPECTOR AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government :

1. Since when has Dr. John C. Howe, medical inspector at the port of Quebec, been in the employment of the government in that capacity?
2. What is his salary, or what are his emoluments?
3. Have there not been complaints, written or verbal, made to the Minister of the Interior, or to the government against the said John C. Howe, since his appointment, with respect to the execution of his official duties, and of what nature are these complaints?
4. Has there not been an official report, written or verbal, with reference to the said John C. Howe, made to Mr. W. D. Scott, superintendent of immigration, during the season of navigation of the St. Lawrence, in 1903, on a complaint brought by Dr. Ellis, then chief of the medical service at Quebec, to which the said Dr. John C. Howe is attached?
5. Is it not true that since 1903 several steamers have passed by Quebec on the way to Montreal without undergoing the medical inspection required from Dr. John C. Howe, notably the steamer 'Pretorian' of the Allan Line, which arrived at Quebec on June 27, 1904, because on these different occasions and more especially on this last one, the said Dr. Howe was by his own fault manifestly incapable of filling his duties?
6. Is the government aware that the said Dr. Howe, medical inspector of immigrants at Quebec, is the cause, unconsciously or otherwise, of many delays and of grave inconveniences in the service of the immigration office at Quebec, and in the movements of steamers and of railway trains which bring and transport immigrants to Canada ?
7. Does the government intend to inform itself of the truth of the facts and to remedy the inconveniences which result therefrom.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :

1. May, 1903.
2. Appointed at a salary of $100 per month during season of navigation.
3. Yes. Complaints received from immigrants, alleging that he improperly demanded a fee before 'passing' them.
4. Yes, in regard to his duties.
5. No. The inspection of the 'Pretorian' was reported in monthly report of June, 1904.
6. No.
7. The government will promptly inquire into any allegations contained in the questions.

CORRESPONDENCE RE PURCHASE OF LOT 4438-A AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all despatches, letters, telegrams and other correspondence and communications received by the Department of Public Works, or any officer thereof, or by any department of the government, or by any officer thereof, from the Honourable Senator Philippe Auguste Choquette in any way relating to lot 4438-A of the official plan and book of reference of Montcalm ward, of the city of Quebec, and to the purchase thereof by His Majesty King Edward VII., and of all despatches, letters, telegrams and other correspondence and communications sent by any and all such departments and officers to the Honourable Senator Choquette relating thereto ; also copies of all plans, if any, filed for the purpose of expropriating said lot in the registration division wherein said lot is situate, and copies of any other expropriation proceedings authorized or required by law to be followed in connection with the expropriation of lands for public purposes and which in any way relate to the lot aforesaid ; copies of all appointments of valuators regarding said lot ; copies of all applications for the appointment of such valuators, and of all correspondence, letters and telegrams relating to such appointments ; and copies of any valuations of said lot made by any valuators ; copies of all orders in council relating to said transactions and to the purchase of said property ; copies of all deeds, powers of attorney, reports and orders in council executed, made or passed relating to the purchase or acquisition of said lot by His Majesty King Edward VII.

The motion was agreed to.

EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved :

That an humble address, accompanied by two copies of the resolution regarding the embargo on Canadian cattle be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying His Excellency that he will cause said resolution to be transmitted to the Honourable Secretary of State for the Colonies, with the request that one copy be delivered to the Right Honourable the Premier and one copy to the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Agriculture of England, for their respective information.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that when the Senate adjourns to-morrow, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 3rd May next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—For the convenience of those who live a long distance from the capital, I would suggest that the adjournment be to a later day. This bids fair to be a very long session.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I really think we might take an adjournment to a later day than the one named in the motion, without any detriment to the public business.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The adjournment I have proposed is a long one, and I do not feel warranted in extending it beyond the time named. We have stretched it as far as we can legitimately go. There is a good deal of business coming up, private Bills legislation, and it is just possible that the discussion of the vexed question now occupying the attention of the House of Commons may come to an end much sooner than some hon. gentlemen suppose.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter of considerable moment. The Committee on Divorce was called to meet this morning, but we had not a quorum. Quite an important case was to be heard, and a number of witnesses were present from British Columbia and the United States. It is rather unfortunate if these witnesses must be kept here under expense because we cannot obtain a quorum of the committee. I would, therefore, with the permission of the House, move that the committee be permitted to sit with four as a quorum, to hear this case.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—What is the regular quorum ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Five, but we cannot get more than four. Some of the members of the committee left without giving us notice, and the result is we cannot get a quorum.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I do not intend to object to the motion, but I think the rule should be followed in a case of such importance. The majority of the committee is fixed as the quorum, and the least that should be done is to give notice of the proposed change.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The clerk of the committee has wired for the purpose of trying to get the chairman here, and every effort has been made to obtain a regular quorum. I make this motion to obviate the necessity of keeping the witnesses here until after the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—There would be no objection to giving notice if we had time to do it ; but to-morrow is the last day that the House will sit before adjourning, and it is also the last opportunity we will have to hear the witnesses. The chairman fully expected to be here this afternoon, but he was suddenly called away to Toronto yesterday. We hope he will be back in time to attend the meeting to-morrow, but we want to be prepared for the possibility of his not being here in time. We want to be in a position to proceed with the case.

The motion was agreed to.

OTTAWA ELECTRIC COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Lougheed) moved the second reading of Bill (12) An Act respecting the Ottawa Electric Company.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Several hon. gentlemen have intimated to me that they wish to speak on the motion for second reading of this Bill, and I suppose there is no objection to allowing it to stand until after the adjournment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Just before the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) left Ottawa, he asked me to move the second reading of this Bill and send it to committee. The solicitors of the company asked me to make this motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It could not certainly be considered by the Railway Committee to-morrow, so there is no harm in deferring the second reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of course if the government say so, all right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understood from the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson), and other gentlemen whom I need not mention, that they desire to be present when the Bill is discussed. I asked the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie whether he had any understanding with the hon. gentleman from Calgary that it was to stand over, and he told me he had.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I cannot dispute that, but it is strange that the hon. gentleman from Calgary should have asked me not half an hour before leaving the city to make this motion if he had such an understanding with the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie. I am told there is a meeting of the Railway Committee to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection to the second reading, if the committee stage is not to be taken up until after the adjournment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With that understanding, I move the second reading.

The SPEAKER—I understand the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) intimated that he wished to speak on the second reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I think the hon. Speaker misunderstood me. I said there would be some discussion on the second reading, but I have no desire to speak.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That can all be done in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was read the second time.

SPREAD OF TUBERCULOSIS IN CANADA.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Edwards, That in the opinion of the Senate the time has arrived when the state should take some active steps to lessen the widespread suffering and the great mortality among the people of Canada, caused by the various forms of tuberculosis, and that conferences between the Dominion and provincial governments should be had at the earliest possible moment in order that the best mode of action in the premises may be adopted. —Hon. Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I moved the adjournment of this debate for the purpose of enabling the hon. gentleman from Russell to make a few remarks on the question.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (Windsor)—The hon. member for Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) is entitled to the great thanks of this honourable House for the eloquent, instructive and able manner in which he has addressed this House on the important question of tuberculosis. No member of this honourable House could have done it more effectively, as the hon. gentleman has made a special study of the disease, and has taken a great interest in the subject of tuberculosis, and has done a great deal, not only in giving substantial aid, but also by educating the people. I would like to make a few remarks on this question of tuberculosis, which has of late attracted the attention of the people of this country, who are anxiously waiting for future developments for the cure of the so-called white plague. But, hon. gentlemen, the subject has been so thoroughly discussed that I am afraid that it would be only a repetition of what has already been so well expressed in this honourable House. The discussion has certainly been very interesting, and will have a good effect in educating the people of the country. The death rate from tuberculosis has been very alarming in the past, but the knowledge that the disease is not hereditary and the information that we have acquired as to the best methods of fighting the disease, have given confidence to the afflicted, so that the percentage of deaths is getting smaller every year. There is no such thing as hereditary consumption; that theory is a nightmare used to scare us. It has never been inherited, either from the father or the mother. The mother may give the disease to her child in nursing, by coughing, or by kissing her children. The father may spread the disease by careless spitting about the floor of a house; and these are the real sources of danger. I believe, hon. gentlemen, that just as much good could be obtained by educating the people and putting before the public the real causes of tuberculosis as any aid from the government could effect. People generally have no idea of hygiene. They do not seem to understand that the conditions in which they live are very often injurious; that pure fresh air is essential for the maintenance of animal life; that ill-ventilated tenements, crowded school-rooms and stuffy, over-heated dwellings, have an important influence on tuberculosis; and that the disease is more prevalent in damp, ill-drained districts. Food, hon. gentlemen, plays also an important part in the disease—milk, which is so much used by old and young, carries the disease, and is capable of communicating tuberculosis if the milk is from an animal suffering from tuberculosis, because in such cases it contains the virus of the disease, as shown by Professors Gorlachn, Bang and Bollinger. It is an interesting fact that an owner of a herd known to be tuberculous withdrew the milk from market and used it, without boiling, to feed his pigs. The latter, almost without exception, became tuberculous, so that the whole stock had to be slaughtered. There is no reason to believe that young children or even adults are less susceptible to the virus than calves or pigs; so that the danger of the disease from this source is real and serious.

The question of marriage in the case of persons suffering from tuberculosis is a very important one and most difficult to decide.

In a male, the personal risk is not so great—and when the health and strength are good, and the family history is not extremely bad, the experiment is often successful, and many healthy and happy families have been begotten under these circumstances. But in women the question is complicated with that of child-bearing, which increases the risk enormously. With a localized lesion, absence of hereditary taint and good physique, marriage might be permitted. In a girl whose family history is bad, whose chest expansion is slight and whose physique is below the standard, the physician should, if possible, place his veto upon marriage. But where the disease actually exists marriage should be absolutely prohibited, because pregnancy and parturition hasten its progress in almost every case. There is much truth in the remarks of the famous French professor, Dr. Dubois : 'If a woman threatened with phthisis marries, she may bear the first accouchement well, the second with difficulty, a third never.' There is no remedy for consumption, no specifics. Drugs are practically useless, patent medicines, with their testimonials, are cruel swindles, and in many cases criminally harmful. Tuberculosis is curable, but not by patent drugs, quacks, Christian Scientists, or faith curists. It is curable solely by the unstinted use of God's fresh air and plenty of good water used inside and outside, by a good diet, and the use now and then, of a little medicine as the family physician may direct. Alcohol never has cured and it never will cure consumption. On the contrary, it is among the predisposing factors. Every city where there are hospitals, should have a special ward for its own tuberculous people, to which all consumptives, who cannot obtain proper treatment at home, may be taken, and also for advanced cases.

Of course, there are sanitaria, where persons afflicted with the disease are admitted, but they are not free institutions. Those who can afford to pay are taken in, but the poor, the labouring class, are prevented from sharing in the benefits to be derived. In my opinion the government should come to the assistance of that class of people, by granting aid for their relief. Hon. gentlemen, I am glad to see that this very important question of tuberculosis, which is at present attracting the attention of the people of this country, and, I may say, of other countries also, has been thoroughly, and generally discussed in this honourable House, not only by the members of the medical profession, but also by other members of this honourable House. It is a strong indication of the interest that the members of the Senate of the Dominion of Canada take in the welfare of the country.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I take it that no other hon. gentleman desires to speak on this question, and I should like to say a few words in concluding the discussion upon it. I am very much gratified at the manner in which this motion has been received in the House, and the manner in which it has been responded to by the several hon. gentlemen who have spoken upon it. The subject is an educational one, and I am very sure that as a result of this discussion the education of our people upon the subject has been very much enlarged. True, some diversity of opinion has been expressed, dealing with the subject in an academic way, but in so far as the main question is concerned—the education of the people, the responsibility of individuals, of municipalities, of the provincial governments and also now of the Dominion government—there seems to be no dissension whatever. All seem to agree that the question is one of such paramount importance to the welfare and well-being of Canada, that the time has arrived when the Dominion government should take some action upon the matter. And this really is the great question. Discussing it in an academic way, of course disseminates information as to the disease, but the great question requiring attention to-day is to make known the extent of the ravages which this dread disease is making among the inhabitants of Canada, and to point out the desirability of the Dominion government taking some action thereon. Some years ago it would not have been supposed possible to do that which is now very well known to be possible, and responsibility would not seem to have rested upon the Dominion government in the past to a great extent ; but to-day the origin of the disease is well understood. The disease is a preventable one, and it is in a large measure a curable one. In view of these facts, if action is delayed until private philanthropy or some such instrumentality shall take hold of the disease and deal with it, the loss to Canada would be enormous, and I submit that the government should be held responsible for any failure to act. In so far as my opinion is concerned, I think enough has now been said to show that it is desirable in the highest and best interest of Canada that the Dominion government shall take the matter up, and I for one sincerely hope that they will do so. It has been held that the matter of health is purely a provincial and municipal one. I stated in the short speech made when introducing this subject, that it is believed that the question may be one of divided jurisdiction, but in so far as the British North America Act is concerned, it would not be trespassing in any way on the domain of the local legislature for the Dominion government to move in the matter. If it should be the case that the British North America Act is found to require amendment in this respect, it is highly desirable in the best interests of Canada, that such amendment should be made at as early a date as possible. But in my humble opinion this is not necessary. No province will find fault with the Dominion government for aiding in this matter, and the aid may be given direct to the provinces. There is no doubt that the great and important question is to educate the people thoroughly upon the subject. That would be a great step. There are those who contend that education is the only necessary thing, and that home treatment should be the only treatment; but every measure of treatment and prevention is necessary. I simply throw out the suggestion that if education is one of the greatest factors in successfully coping with the difficulty—and I believe it is—there is no means whereby education can be better carried on than by the Dominion government aiding in the construction of one illustrative sanitarium in each province of the Dominion. While a great deal of information has been disseminated, there are millions yet in Canada who believe that the disease is hereditary, that it is incurable, and that when unfortunately any one contracts it, there is no hope for him. I should like to ask hon. gentlemen could there be any better system of education than would be afforded if there was an illustrative sanitarium in each province, and the sufferers sent there for treatment were to return to their homes and tell their neighbours their experience. It would be one of the very best modes of education we could have.

I stated in the speech I made when introducing this subject, something as to what has been done in the United States and other countries. The government of the United States, while not dealing with the subject generally as a national one, has at the same time erected very large sanitaria for their army and navy. So far as sanitaria are concerned, I may say that there are thousands who believe that permanent structures are not necessary, that only cheap buildings are required, and that it is a very simple matter to provide suitable accommodation for patients; but there are cases where there should be at least a central building for the purpose of administration, while smaller cheap cottages would do for housing very many of the patients. It is not necessary that a very large sum of money should be expended. The undertaking in that repect is not so great as many anticipate. I do not desire to occupy your time longer upon any of these branches of the subject, but simply to say this: In my humble opinion this should be made a national question and that at the nearest possible moment. I think perhaps the time will come when it will go beyond that and become an international question, because, bordering as we do for 4,000 miles on the United States, with the intercourse that takes place between the two countries, it is desirable that an understanding shall exist between us so that the best results may accrue. Take our railways. Travelling on a railway is one of the most productive means of spreading this unfortunate disease; and as our railways go from one province to another and connect with the railways of the United States, it is something more than a national question, and assumes an international character. To illustrate this in a very, very short way, I may mention that while going down to the Adirondacks last spring to see what was being done there, and returning through a portion of the United States, I could not go into any car without finding sufferers from this disease lying in almost the last stages of consumption, so much so that it appeared to me to be perfectly unsafe to travel on one of those cars under the conditions which existed. For these reasons I believe that this great question should become, and will become at a later period, not only a national, but also very possibly an international question.

Hon. gentlemen have been very patient in listening to my remarks in introducing this subject, and I anticipate with pleasure the fact that this motion will pass this House unanimously. My own desire is that it shall not then become a dead letter. I sincerely hope that the legislators of Canada have been sufficiently roused upon this subject that some means will be taken of going further than simply passing a resolution or a motion in this House. It is my intention to consult with some of those gentlemen who are interested and who feel keenly upon this subject, as to some means of appointing a committee for the purpose of dealing further with the question, and at a later date after I have consulted some of my friends upon it, I hope that this will be done. I sincerely hope in the interests of humanity and in the interests of Canada that this important matter shall not be allowed to drop, but that active measures shall be taken, and that at the earliest day, upon a question which in my humble opinion, in so far, at least, as our temporal affairs are concerned, is of more importance to the welfare and well-being of Canada than any subject which could be brought before this honourable House.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—My hon. friend says that he does not want this resolution to be a dead letter. If the hon. gentleman does not move for a committee to-day he will have to go over these proceedings again. I understand that he is not prepared to give the names of the members of the committee at present, but he might move that a committee be called for such a purpose, and that the members be named at the next sitting of the House. Otherwise it will take some time to proceed with the matter after the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I quite appreciate what my hon. friend says. I hope I shall be able to take the means of bringing the matter before the House in the manner I intended to do, so that it will not occupy much time. Several of my friends have discussed this matter with me, and there seems to be a little diversity of opinion as to how the committee will be formed, but I really have not had time to get the matter into shape. However, I think I shall be able to carry out the views of my hon. friend at a later date.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman might move for a committee in this matter and might state that the members would be named by the House at a later date. I suppose the hon. gentleman desires to have the majority of the committee medical men. The House will not object to that. This will be a move in advance, and if he does not do this now he will have to commence de novo. I approve entirely of the hon. gentleman's object in bringing up this matter. It will do a great deal of good to the unfortunate people who are suffering.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I am not quite in a position to ask for a committee and to be able to say just what powers I should like such a committee to have. I should prefer to allow the matter to stand until a later date.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire to join with my hon. colleagues in the expression of the thanks which are due to the hon. senator who has brought this important subject before the Senate. His opening and closing addresses have been not only interesting but instructive. It is quite evident he has given a great deal of thought and attention to this subject. I was also gratified to hear the opinions of many medical men and laymen. I was particularly struck with the very sensible remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Windsor (Hon. Mr. Casgrain). His views, and the views expressed by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas (Hon. Mr. Wilson) were more in accord with my own than any others that have been expressed during this debate. It is probably pretty well known that I have strong individual views on this and kindred subjects, and while I recognize the very great value there would be in saving the eight thousand lives which my hon. friend stated were sacrificed and lost by want of care and want of sanitaria, still if we were to save the eight thousand lives in one year there would be eight thousand lives to take their places in the following year. It would go on increasing ad infinitum. We shall have to change the conditions of life very largely before we can hope to stamp out this particular disease. It is due to the complex conditions under which we live. That is proven not only in this country, probably in a minor degree, but also in other countries of the world, where most careful statistics have been taken of the proportion of persons who in particular callings go into consumption. Happily in Canada, I am glad to say, the proportion is very much less. Our factories are perhaps not as crowded as they are in other countries. We have in the provinces inspectors of factories, and we have an improved condition over that which prevails in most countries, on the other side of the Atlantic at all events. But even in Canada there is a very great opening for the benefactor of the human race to point out where lives are being constantly sacrificed by forcing men to work under improper conditions. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in what they said and probably I would go a little further, in speaking of the proportion of those who might be saved. The opportunities for saving people are abundant; they exist everywhere. As my hon. friend from Windsor (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) very well said, it is the oxygen of the air that practically is the only means by which consumptives can be cured, and that is obtainable all over the world. Although men in various ways may foul the atmosphere they are breathing, still nature is constantly readjusting the proportion as it was originally intended to be; that is, 20 per cent oxygen and 80 per cent nitrogen. I will give hon. gentlemen a few figures which have been compiled from official sources, showing that in certain particular callings a fixed number as a rule are certain to die of consumption. Of course something may depend on the proportion of persons of great vitality or of weaker constitutions, and to that degree only is the table of mortality correct. But making due allowances, we still find the death rate in some callings is exceedingly high. And that has been going on year after year for very many years, more so probably in our own days than in earlier periods, because our methods of manufacturing are different from what they were in earlier years. We crowd operatives into smaller space, and less importance is attached to providing the proper proportion of air. We do not provide the methods of ventilation for them that we ought to furnish. The desire to make the most out of the human life is perhaps the cause of it. Human life is not highly valued when compared with the value set upon gold. Since Tom Hood wrote that celebrated song which created such a sensation in England, describing the condition of the poor women who earn a living by their needles, philanthropists have been calling attention to the importance of doing something for the operatives of factories, giving them more air where they are confined in buildings, but still the employment of labour under unsanitary conditions has been going on—less, I am glad to say, in Canada than in other countries—and I may say here that it is a matter of notoriety that in many countries as a rule boys follow the calling of their fathers. Take the manufacturing towns of England, such as Birmingham and Manchester, in the cotton industry as a rule the boys and the girls fall in line and follow the calling of their parents; and the evidence is abundant that they only work a limited number of years. The larger proportion of them are carried off by tuberculosis. I have under my hand some statistics bearing on this subject. Take the linen factories of Belfast where they employ about 30,000 persons; we find five-sixths of them are women. Deaths from pulmonary tuberculosis and other diseases of the respiratory organs exceed the number of deaths from other causes by two to one. In tables that have been recently compiled it is found that among the workers in trades subject to mineral, metallic, vegetable, animal and mixed dust, compared with those of the non-dusty trades, the mortality is more than double. For each one hundred workmen in dusty trades the cases of pneumonia varied from six to seventeen; pulmonary tuberculosis 13 to 28; while for the non-dusty trades pneumonia only averaged 4½ and tuberculosis 11 per hundred. I might observe here that the most fatal kind of dust is the metallic dust and then comes stone dust. Stonecutters often carelsssly omit to cover the mouth so that the dust is inhaled. Men working on stone-cutting in the open air are not exposed to the same danger. In Berlin, taking a recent return from the mortality tables of a number of the Berlin Mutual Aid associations it was found that there was among engravers a mortality from tuberculosis of 40 per cent, among waiters 45 per cent, painters 47 per cent, polishers 54 per cent, bookbinders 63 per cent, cabinet and piano manufacturers 55 per cent, upholsterers 61 per cent. No such figures are obtainable in this country. The conditions in which workmen live here, although not of the best and not certainly what we would all like to see, still are a great improvement on many factories of the old countries of Europe where they have gone on from century to century making very few changes, crowding people in narrow spaces and ignoring altogether the resulting loss of life.

These figures are all much in the same line. There is a return from Munich, prepared in 1903, where very much the same figures appear, and I have also examined the table prepared by Miss Brandt, the statistician of the Charity Organization Society of the city of New York. She has a table of fifty-three columns. The greatest mortality is with the marble and stonecutters; the next with the cigarmakers. The irritating effect of tobacco on the surface of the mucous membrane causes the death rate to be very high, but badly ventilated buildings are also largely responsible. Then come the plasterers and whitewashers, who suffer from the dust of the plaster. There are fifty-three different callings, of which the longest lived are the bankers and brokers, and the farmers and farm labourers. Then come miners and quarrymen working in the open air; then clergymen. It shows practically that if we want to begin to improve, we must improve the condition of the unfortunate people who are exposed in this way. I desire to say here that probably there is no disease that is as easily controlled as tuberculosis. There is no ailment of the human body that is so easily combated, because Providence has surrounded the earth with pure air. You need not go up to Muskoka. It is everywhere; it abounds all over the continent. My hon. friend referred to sanitariums that the American government have placed at several points for the benefit of the soldiers. I happened to come across a very recent case, that of a sanitarium erected by the United States government at Fort Bayard, near Silver City, New Mexico, in the meridian of Charleston, South Carolina. It is erected on a considerable elevation, about 2,000 feet, if I remember rightly, and enjoys the advantage of a temperature which is nearly the same all the year round. It is in charge of Major Appel, who is a surgeon of the United States army. His report is really worth quoting, as showing the conditions under which the disease yields so readily to cure. He says:

> We have demonstrated at the Fort Bayard Sanitarium for soldiers, that we can cure consumption in any stage. I do not mean to say that if people come to us with lungs so far gone as to destroy their breathing power we can cure them, but do say that we can cure what has long been regarded as hopeless—the third stage of the disease. I have never made that statement publicly before. I have not been ready to make it.
> We have been working for results since the establishment of the sanitarium three years ago, and we have been doing a great deal of original investigation regarding the treatment of tuberculosis. Our hopes have been realized, and now you may inform the public that under the conditions which prevail in this territory, the dread disease has been robbed of its terrors.

The cure means, not only pure air, but it means hygienic treatment; it means a proper diet. I was glad to hear an authority so good as my hon. friend from Windsor say that drugs were of no use. I was delighted to hear that, coming from a medical man. Some doctors who took part in the earlier stages of the debate did not refer to that. We heard a great deal about Doctor Koch and the Medical Association, and their difference of opinion as to whether tuberculosis could be transferred from the animal to the human being, and that Doctor Koch and the Association differed widely. I have found medical men differ very widely, not only on that, but on other subjects; but during the last fifty-five years, during which I have been giving a great deal of attention to medical subjects, I have found the medical men, and particularly the younger ones coming forward, have changed very materially for the better, that they now rely more upon natural agencies for the treatment, not only of consumption, but of all diseases. Now, I hold that it is not necessary to go abroad to be cured. There is no better place than along the Laurentian range, on the north bank of the Ottawa, for the cure of consumption. You do not want a sanitarium from the present date until November—all you want is a tent and plenty of good blankets and nutritious simple food.

Speaking of breathing, we ought to begin at the beginning if we want to stamp out consumption. The child in the school ought to be taught to breathe properly. The Almighty, when He first gave us life, breathed it into man's nostrils. Men nowadays, and women also, many of them, breathe through the mouth, which is, of course, absolutely wrong. Breath ought to be introduced into the lungs through the nostrils, because there is a filtering apparatus provided for the express purpose of protecting the lungs from dust and to prepare the air for its reception in the lungs. If a man goes into the open air and opens his mouth wide, allowing the cold air to strike the delicate surface of the mucous membrane of the lungs, he is likely to suffer from it. Therefore, we should teach the children to breathe properly and deeply. I venture to say that not ten per cent of the community breathe properly or to the extent they should. They are simply satisfied with inhaling air enough to fill the upper lobes of the lungs without filling the lungs as they should by inhaling deep breaths. From this time of year until November no better sanitarium can be found than a tent on the hillside, away from the dusty roads, in the neighbourhood of a wood, where plenty of water is available to keep the body clean inside and out, and where simple nutritious food can be obtained. From November until March we have in this climate, particularly during the last winter, more sunlight than they are blessed with in most countries. If one could live with the window open, getting the benefit of the pure air and sunshine, great benefit would result, because in winter our air, even in cities and towns, is pure. As a rule, in ninety per cent of the buildings in our cities and towns, one could get abundance of pure air in winter, if it be allowed to enter the building, but of course if you hermetically seal the houses and heat them with hot air or steam, and give no opportunity for the air once breathed to escape or the fresh air, which gives life to the human body, to enter, one must suffer the consequences. During the winter months almost anywhere in Canada you can get all the advantages required for the proper treatment of the consumptive; and in summer an out-door life is practicable in every part of the Dominion. There is no part of the Dominion where there are not hill-sides with adjoining woods and running streams, where simple food can be had, costing very little indeed. Nothing can be better than living in a tent during those months and sleeping on cedar boughs. These are the views I would like to see disseminated over this country. I have quoted one statement—I could have quoted others, but that is the most recent that has come to my hands—of the cure of consumption, even in what is called the third degree, where it has heretofore been considered absolutely hopeless; and this, be it remembered, is from a high authority, a surgeon major in the American army. In New Mexico, they have the advantage, as I have said, of a very equable temperature. In Canada we can only live in the open air during seven or eight months of the year. The other four months would have to be lived indoors, where the advantages could not be considered equivalent to life in the open air. But the main thing is to breathe deeply, and to breathe air which contains its full proportion of oxygen. As I said just now, such air can be had everywhere. We may poison it and destroy it, as we will, but kind Providence is continually at work readjusting the conditions and proportions. It is only when we defile the air and make it noxious that harm results, but the readjusting of it is constantly taking place. So that by relying on natural conditions I have indicated, I conceive that tuberculosis is a curable disease, and that the means of cure are within the reach of all. Of course I do not mean in any way to minimize the advantage of acting upon the advice of men who are in a position to speak wisely on the subject. No doubt there are very many persons who will not act unless under advice. They have not thought out the subject themselves, and consequently need the judgment and influence of the mind of another in order to prompt them to adopt even simple remedies. As a rule people have not any faith in simple remedies. That has been my experience in the past, and I dare say it has been the experience of medical men. If fifteen or twenty years ago my hon. friend opposite had been called to see a patient who had been living too high, smoking too many cigars and drinking brandy and water every night, and he had told him to live on oatmeal for two or three weeks, the patient would very probably have replied, 'I did not call you in to give me such advice. I called you in to give me a prescription.' It had to be in the form of either pills or powders or in a phial —it had to be done up scientifically. The advice however, would have been the only really beneficial service my hon. friend could have rendered him.

Coming more particularly to the crucial point, while I feel all the sympathy I could possible express for the motion of my hon. friend, yet there is the recognized position of the government that cannot be departed from, that this subject, at all events under our constitution, is beyond their control to the extent that my hon. friend would like them to go. These views have been expressed in the other chamber where a number of my colleagues were present, and more particularly the minister who had charge of those branches, where it was pointed out that to the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures are relegated the establishment and maintenance of hospitals, charities, asylums and eleemosynary institutions in the province, other than marine hospitals.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is nothing in the constitution preventing this government making an appropriation to carry on this work.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Strictly speaking, I presume there is, because the powers of parliament are limited on these particular subjects to the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals. The exclusive powers which the provinces possess are those to which I first referred. I am not one of those who like to draw the line very closely, on the contrary, my desire and my sympathies would be to err on the right side in a matter of this kind. How far my colleagues may be disposed to go I am quite unable to say. I shall be glad indeed if I can enlist them in any movement that my hon. friend has in view in bringing this important subject before the House. How far they would feel justified in going I do not know, but he will admit, I am quite sure, that the matter more particularly belongs to the provinces. They have control of the education—because after all in our schools if we had in the elementary books something to instruct children to sit up straight, to throw the shoulders back, to enlarge the breathing capacity, to breathe deeply and properly and to comply with the laws of health—that would be one of the best methods of accomplishing the result. Speaking of this, I am very much reminded of the first school I went to, considerably over seventy years ago. I have a vivid recollection of that school. It was a room with probably thirty or thirty-five boys in it, although probably it would properly have afforded air for ten. The windows were kept closed, particularly in the winter season, and a stove stood in the centre. The room was so heated and the air so fetid that we had difficulty in keeping awake. That was before the days when buildings were heated with warm air coming from the outside. The great object was to keep out the cold and save the wood-pile.

I shall be glad indeed to express to my colleagues—and I am sure my hon. friend beside me will join in doing so—the strong views expressed by my hon. friend in this chamber, and I hope that perhaps something more than a sympathetic expression will be given. There is now, I believe, some $2,000 allotted to some society—I do not know what society it is.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—It is the Canadian Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If $2,000 can be given, it follows that a good deal more could be given, because if the rule is broken it might as well be broken to give something more, and to do something more than can be accomplished by an expenditure of $2,000.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—There are other things also relegated to the provinces, for instance education, in which the Dominion government is actively engaged. In the matter of agriculture, there is a series of educational movements going on continually. The method of making cheese is a branch of education and yet the government are helping in that direction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is trade.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—But it is pure education. Further, I should like to ask my hon. friend if the provinces would object to being aided by contribution ? The government can give a contribution ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—With regard to the constitutionality of it, this is a national affair. It is a condition which does not confine itself to any particular province. The government should take at least as much interest in the mass of the people as they do in the raising of bullocks, and therefore they should look upon this as a national matter.

The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF FARMERS TO INSTITUTE STAFF OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

1. If at any time in the month of January last, a list of names of farmers in Prince Edward Island was submitted to the Minister of Agriculture or any officer of his department, by the Department of Agriculture of Prince Edward Island, for the purpose of making a selection of ten farmers to form the institute staff of the province ?
2. If so, what were the names so submitted ?
3. What are the names of the persons selected to constitute the said institute staff ?
4. Was the selection of the aforesaid institute staff made by the Provincial Department of Agriculture of Prince Edward Island, or by the Department of Agriculture of Canada, or by both jointly ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The following is the reply received from the department :

1. On January 24th, 1905, Mr. J. C. Readey, Secretary of Agriculture for Prince Edward Island, submitted to the Dominion Live Stock Commissioner at Ottawa a list of names of proposed institute workers, requesting him to select ten, who when selected would proceed to Truro to take the short course in stock judging, to be held at the agricultural college there. On the 25th January the Live Stock Commissioner replied to Mr. Readey, declining to select the men to be sent to Truro. He did this because he felt he did not know enough about the island men to select institute workers, and thought it could be better done by the officers of the provincial department.

2. The names submitted were as follows :

Robert Agnew, Wilmot Valley ;
Thos. Linklitter, St. Eleanors ;
W. J. Montgomery, Port Hill ;
J. A. Annear, Lower Montague ;
John Moore, Crapaud ;
C. B. Clay, Bridgetown ;
Artemas Moffat, New Glasgow ;
Alex. Hamilton, New Perth ;

J. Albert Brennan, Tignish ;

A. D. McDonald, Durell;
Gordon McMillan, New Haven;
T. U. Fowler, North Bedeque;
P. J. D. Edmonds, Summerville;
Vernon Webster, Morell.

3 and 4. The Minister of Agriculture has not been advised as to what steps have been taken by the provincial authorities of Prince Edward Island in the matter of the selection of a provincial staff of institute workers.

THE SANITARIA AT GRAVENHURST.

Hon. Mr SULLIVAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make an explanation of some words which fell from me in the discussion a few days ago on tuberculosis. Following the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I said that he had inaccurate information with reference to the hospital at Gravenhurst being free. It appears there are two hospitals at Gravenhurst, one of which charges $2 a day, while the other takes money from those who can pay and treats all others free. The hon. gentleman has since showed me a letter from the secretary of that institution, containing this information, of which I was not aware at the time. Had I been so, I would not have spoken so strongly on the matter. I desire to make this explanation to satisfy the sensibilities of my hon. friend —had I known it I certainly would not have used the words I did.

THE LATE HON. JAMES SUTHERLAND.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, it is my sad duty to announce the death of a colleague. A member of the government, the Hon. James Sutherland, died less than an hour ago. He has for many years been recognized as one of the leading public men of this country, having been in parliament since 1880. For very many years, when the members of the party at present in power were in opposition, he filled the very important position of whip, and continued as such for some time after the change of government. Those who personally knew him will recognize the kindly manner he always exhibited, and the friendship he seemed to entertain not only for his own political friends, but for all with whom he came in contact. Years of intercourse matured very warm friendships, not alone among his political friends but among the public men of this country generally. He had been elected usually by acclamation, for he stood in very high esteem in the locality in which he lived. In the town of Woodstock he had filled a number of important positions locally. His death will create a very great gap, in the county of Oxford where he was so well known, and it will be felt throughout the province of Ontario, as Mr. Sutherland was, during a great part of his parliamentary term, recognized as the agent of the political party to which he belonged, so far as the province of Ontario was concerned. I am quite sure that I echo the sentiments of every gentleman who had the pleasure of knowing the late Mr. Sutherland, when I say that he was held in high estimation, and was regarded as a kind, fair-minded gentleman. Although it is not usual, except on the death of a minister of the Crown, for this House to follow the example of the House of Commons in adjourning, I shall on the present occasion, following precedents which have, I believe, prevailed in the past, move that this House do adjourn until to-morrow, out of respect to the memory of the late Mr. Sutherland.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was my good fortune to have been on somewhat intimate terms with the late Mr. Sutherland for many years. I was in the Lower House when he was first elected, and from my long personal acquaintance with him I think I may fairly say that there were very few men in the House of Commons who had fewer enemies than he. I deeply regret the loss of Mr. Sutherland to the country and it must be equally regrettable to his own party. We are constantly having these reminders that our days are numbered, and it comes home very forcibly to us when we find those with whom we have been for many years so intimately associated thus creating a vacancy among the living. This sad event is to the party to which Mr. Sutherland belonged, and of which he was a very energetic, active and useful member, a very great loss indeed. To the country at large, the loss of men of high character, who are generally esteemed and who take an active and useful part in public affairs, is necessarily a matter of deep regret. I desire for myself personally—and I think I may say on behalf also of everyone on this side of the House with whom I act politically—to extend an expression of deepest sympathy to his family in their bereavement and also to the members of the government, who have sustained this very great loss. Personally I deplore very much the loss of any of our members, more particularly those occupying prominent positions. I repeat, I deeply regret the loss to his family, to his associates, and to the country generally, occasioned by the death of Mr. Sutherland. We can ill afford to lose men who have occupied such prominent public positions as he has filled.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend the Secretary of State and the hon. member from Belleville, have left but very little for me to add to the sentiments of regret which they have so well and feelingly expressed at the loss the country generally has sustained by the death of the late Minister of Public Works. It has been my own good fortune to be very closely associated with Mr. Sutherland, not merely from the fact of having been members of the same House for upwards of twenty years, and colleagues in the government for a very considerable period, but because, sitting for different divisions of the same county, we were brought into unusually close connection on various occasions; and I can therefore with very peculiar reason endorse all that has been said by my hon. friends as to the position which Mr. Sutherland occupied, both in that House and in the country at large. Mr. Sutherland, as has been said, for a great many years was the principal whip of the Liberal party, and there are many members of this body, representatives from the province of Ontario in particular, who can bear me out in saying that very few men indeed have discharged the onerous and difficult duties of principal whip of the party with such efficiency and with such acceptance to both sides of politics as Mr. Sutherland did. As every hon. gentleman knows, the position of whip is one of those important posts which is not perhaps entirely appreciated by the public at large, but on the due discharge of the duties of which the efficiency of a party very greatly depends; and I can speak with particular knowledge of the facts when I say that very few men indeed on either side of politics have discharged those duties better than Mr. Sutherland; and very few men in discharging them have contrived to retain to such an extent as he did the good will and respect of both parties. There is no doubt whatever that the Liberal party, and I think I may say the people of Canada in general, have sustained a grave loss in the death of Mr. Sutherland. For many months past he has been the victim of a painful disease, and his death therefore was not unexpected by his colleagues and by the members of the two Houses; but if anything can soften the regret which his friends must experience, it is the knowledge that members of both parties unite so cordially with us in deploring the loss which Canada has sustained by the removal of the Hon. Minister of Public Works.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

CANADA ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (46) An Act respecting the Canada Atlantic Railway Company.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Bills (46) and (45) are what might be termed twin Bills, both dealing with the same matter. One is for the purpose of empowering the Grand Trunk Railway Company to purchase, and the other is to empower the Canada Atlantic Railway Company to sell. It is very desirable that these Bills should go before the Railway Committee together, and I ask the indulgence of the House to permit this Bill to be read the second time to-day so that it can be referred to the Railway Committee at the same time as the other Bill on the order paper. I therefore move that Rule 41 be suspended in so far as it relates to this Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I move that the Bill be now read a second time.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Is it the intention of the House to facilitate the passage of Bills which should have been read a second time yesterday, but which were not read owing to the fact that the House adjourned without dealing with the order paper. Is there any objection to suspending rule 60 ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Does the hon. gentleman desire the suspension of the rule for all Bills which may come before us to-day.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No, my motion is to suspend the rule so that this Bill may be considered by the Railway Committee to-morrow. Our rule requires twenty-four hours' interval to elapse between the second reading and the consideration in committee of Bills originating in the House of Commons; and it is to avoid this delay that I make the motion.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The hon. gentleman wishes to have the rule suspended simply as regards this one Bill.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I make the motion on the understanding that other Bills may be dealt with on the same basis.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move the suspension of the 60th rule in so far as it relates to Bills set down on the order paper for second reading yesterday and also to Bills read the second time to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion is limited to Bills which are being referred to the Railway Committee ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Is it the intention to suspend the rules in regard to all Bills which are to be referred to the Railway Committee ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, only the Bills that are read a second time to-day. The only exception is the Bill relating to the Canada Atlantic Railway. I am not aware of any others.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—So far the hon. gentleman is not aware of any others.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The motion that I propose submitting to the House is that the Bills at present on the order paper and any others which will be read a second time to-day may be considered by the Railway Committee to-morrow. A number of Bills have been on the order paper for three weeks, so that there has been ample notice to all parties ; and I understand it will be a great convenience to many members that those Bills be taken up by the Railway Committee to-morrow. I understood there was a unanimous feeling with regard to the matter.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—This is to dispense with the twenty-four hours interval as regards to the Bills already on the order paper ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it understood that the suspension of rules to which the House is asked to agree covers only the Bills coming from the House of Commons ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It includes the Bills that have been on our order paper for second reading for three weeks past.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There are Bills on the order paper which originated in the Senate, which require eight days notice. I suppose the suspension simply refers to Bills coming from the House of Commons, the rule in regard to which requires 24 hours to elapse between the second reading and the committee stage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was no qualification of the motion. It included the Bills on the order paper.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It would not include Bills originating in this House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I think it was the understanding of the House that it was to include Bills coming from the House of Commons, where an interval of 24 hours is required to elapse. I think that is clear.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC HOUSE TRUSTS IN ENGLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE rose to :

Call the attention of the Senate to the British Gothenburg, experiments and the Public House Trusts in England.

That in the opinion of the Senate the British Gotherburg experiments and the establishment of public house trusts in England have materially advanced the solution of the temperance question and of the social reform problem, and that the time has arrived when like experiments should be made and like public house trusts should be established in Canada.

He said : A few weeks ago the hon. gentleman from Russell drew our attention to the necessity of adopting measures to check the progress of a natural disease—tuberculosis. I desire to-day to draw the attention of the honourable House to a disease of another kind, a social disease, which impairs the lives of the persons affected and is a source of great trouble and misery for themselves and their families, a disease which is seriously subversive of economic and social progress, not only in this country but I may say in every country of the world—intemperance. I read very recently an article published and signed by a French gentleman giving what is in my humble opinion, a good account—it is the best account that I have seen—of the effects of alcoholism generally. I will take the liberty of quoting from that article, which I have translated into English. It says :

Look upon the habitual user of alcohol, look upon him from all points of view, and see what miserable fate his intemperance has brought on him.

In the first place, consider his health. Far from sustaining him, alcohol exercises on his whole system a weakening and degenerating influence, paralyzing the vital organs, fostering all sorts of diseases, particularly tuberculosis, and carrying with it a hideous train of accidents and disorders, a precocious impairment of strength, and very often untimely death.

Consider also his mental faculties. You can follow how his understanding is gradually becoming clouded, his memory gradually extinguished ; and oftentimes you will see him sink down to total loss of sense, to complete madness.

Consider, above all, his moral character. See how alcohol impairs his energies and depresses his power of will, to the extent of making him absolutely incapable of offering the least resistance to bad temptations. See how it perverts his moral sense, how it checks the natural impulses of the heart, the fatherly or motherly love and the feeling of the child for the parents. See what aversion and disgust it brings him for religion, even to the extent of destroying in his soul the noblest and most comforting belief.

Go on with your examination, enter his home, and you will ascertain that alcohol, by leading the parents to laziness and carelessness, begets misery and abjection to the household, provokes dissension and strife in the midst of the family, brings about separation and divorce, and sometimes scandalous and infamous revenge. You will ascertain that the children are soon prompted to disgust and hatred of their home, contempt of their parents, forsaking of the old people, to bad habits, dissoluteness and precocious crime. And all this is not fancy. Does not every one of those features revive the remembrance of some lamentable tragedy ?

If you now leave the drunkard himself to look at his children—it is yet worse—you will see that alcoholism is imprinted upon his issue, that the drunkard transmits to his sons the blemish, the physical, intellectual and moral deterioration which alcohol has inflicted upon him, and particularly diseases of a convulsive type, as epilepsy for instance ; and that the children are often born only to be mowed down in the prime of life and thus make home emptier and more desolate. And whilst home is being emptied, by a fearful contrast, the tribunals and prisons are being filled, the insane asylums overflow.

The writer, after speaking of the effect of alcoholism upon the life of the nations closes his article by the following citation from Dr. Legrain :

The nation which uses alcohol has lost its strength, and alcoholism will inevitably tend to the downfall of a race.

We may be divided as to the remedy which should be applied. Some are no doubt in favour of prohibition. Others may be contented with controlling the sale and consumption of intoxicants, but everybody is agreed that action of some kind should be taken to combat intemperance. In the few remarks which I propose to offer I shall not dwell at length on the question of prohibition, but will confine myself mainly to the question of control, and more especially to that known as the Gothenburg system.

The total suppression of the drink traffic under legislative enactments has been tried in the United States, and I have here a valuable paper containing an able address made by Sir Charles Bruce in November last, from which I desire to make a few quotations. He says in this address :

All measures for the solution of the drink problem may be classed under the two heads—prohibition and control. The policy of a large and influential section of temperance reformers has ever been in favour of the total suppression of the drink traffic, but only in the United States of America has this policy been carried out under legislative enactments on a scale large enough to be considered a satisfactory test of the value of the system. The first prohibitory Act was passed in the state of Maine in 1846, and similar Acts were subsequently passed in fourteen other states. In each case the legislation provided for the complete suppression of the liquor trade throughout the particular state. At the present time, however, prohibition is the law in only five states. In the other states it has been abandoned in favour of a system of local option exercised within special localities or districts either directly by the popular vote, or indirectly through the discretionary powers vested in popularly elected local bodies.

The working of prohibition and local option in the United States has been the subject of exhaustive personal inquiry and research by Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell. As regards prohibition, they have arrived at the conclusion that it has succeeded only in very thinly populated rural districts; that it has failed and been abandoned in the more densely populated states.

Then Sir Chas. Bruce goes on to speak of similar attempts having been made with success in rural districts in Sweden and Norway, and also in Canada.

Measures of control may be subdivided as control by the state and control by local authorities or companies. As to the control by the state, referring to the same address I find this :

The experiment of control by the state has been made on a most extensive scale in Russia where the spirit traffic is a government monopoly.

'The government has taken complete control of the manufacture and sale of vodka in all the provinces east of the Urals ; has closed all the private drinking saloons (kabaks) ; has opened shops of its own, where liquor is sold only in sealed packages to be taken away for consumption ; has established official temperance bureaus in all the provinces to which its monopoly extends ; has opened, through the medium of those bureaus, hundreds of tea shops, libraries, reading rooms, and 'people's houses'; and will spend, in the course of the coming year, no less than 4,000,000 roubles (£400,000) in establishing places of resort and entertainment for peasants who have hitherto been accustomed to go to the town and village barrooms or kabaks. ('Results of the Russian Liquor Reform,' by Mr. George Kennan in the 'Outlook.' New York.)'

By taking control of the liquor traffic, the Russian government hoped to attain the following objects :

To convey into its own treasury the profits derived from the manufacture and sale of intoxicants.

To substitute pure liquor for the adulterated and injurious compounds often sold by private dealers.

To break up the saloon habit and lessen the temptation to drink by forcing consumers to carry their vodka home.

To discourage intemperance by opening tea shops, people's houses, libraries, summer gardens, and cheap theatres, where the common people might find diversion and entertainment without liquor.

The result of the working of the system is shown in a report issued by the Russian Minister of Finance, from which the following extract is taken :

'It is claimed that the reports addressed to Your Majesty by the governors of the provinces where the new system is in force, and the accounts communicated to the Minister of Finance by the highest ecclesiastical authorities, by the officials of the nobility, by the zemstvos, and by the municipalities, are almost unanimous in bearing evidence to the salutary effects of the reform. . . . Drunkenness has perceptibly diminished, debauchery, with its inevitable consequences, has given place to a more regular use of alcohol ; offences and crimes provoked by drunkenness have become rarer. Nor has the usefulness of the reform been limited to the preservation of health and good morals ; it exercises a salutary effect upon the material resources of the people.'

According to a statement in the 'Times' of 15th November last, the net profit accruing to the government of Russia from the state sale of alcoholic liquors during the year 1903 amounted to £40,000,000. It is estimated that the excess of revenue under the new system as compared with the licensing system, amounted to about £8,500,000. In other words, this amount has been transferred from private profit to public uses.

I have no intention of expressing an opinion on the question of control by the state, but I thought that I would take this occasion to draw attention to the different systems which have been tried in different countries.

Control by local authorities or companies has been applied under what is known as the Gothenburg system, first in the Scandinavian countries during the last forty years, and lately in the British Islands. This system consists in entrusting the management of public houses and the sale of liquor to companies whose profits are applied to paying a maximum of 5 per cent in dividends on the capital invested and the balance to the reduction of taxes or to objects of public utility. That kind of company was first established in Sweden, where the profits go to reduce the city taxes. About one-third of the total municipal revenue is derived annually from that source, and it will be seen that the ratepayers of the municipality have a direct interest in encouraging the sale of liquor. In order to guard against that danger, the Norwegian law of 1871, under which the trust companies were established, expressly provided that the profits should be devoted to objects of public utility, and not to the reduction of taxes as in Sweden. It is claimed that the effect of the introduction of that system in Sweden and Norway has been to transform these countries from the most drunken to the most sober of nations. I take my statistics from this address of Sir Chas. Bruce from which I observe that the consumption of liquor per capita in the United Kingdom, the United States, Russia and Norway and Sweden—(the three latter countries presenting typical methods of temperance legislation)—to be as follows :

	Per head.
United Kingdom..	2·08 gallons.
United States..	1· "
Russia..	·61 "
Norway and Sweden	·52 "

I have also in a book published by Mr. Shadwell, statistics showing how the consumption, has gone on decreasing in Norway and Sweden. In 1875 the per capita consumption was 27·04 litres (about 6 gallons) in 1887 it had fallen to 16·09 litres, and in 1897 to 13·06 litres. You can see that from 1875 to 1897 it had fallen from 27 to 13 litres—to one-half.

One of the first who attempted an experiment on the Gothenburg system in Great Britain, was the Rev. Mr. Mordaunt, in 1877; but the license which he applied for and which he obtained excluded the sale of spirit. The system received a much more extensive application in England by the organization of the People's Refreshment Houses Association in 1896 by the Bishop of Chester and Major (now Colonel) Craufurd, and by the establishment of the Public House Trust Companies, which were organized in 1901 by, or at the suggestion and under the direction and inspiring influence of His Excellency the Governor General, Lord Grey. In July, 1901, the People's Refreshment House Association had 18 houses under its management. In a letter published in the 'Times' of the 30th November, 1903, His Excellency, speaking of that association, says :

The experience accumulated from the houses under their management suggested in 1901 that the time had arrived when an organized effort should be made to 'Gothenburg' all new licenses. Accordingly a public house trust company was formed for the county of Northumberland in May, 1901. Kent and Durham and North Yorkshire followed the example of Northumberland in July, 1901 ; and in August, 1901, was formed the Central Public House Trust Association to promote the establishment of separate county trust companies, with the object of providing an organization for the taking over and managing, in the interest of the community, every new license which might be created in any part of the United Kingdom, and of thus building a ring fence round the public houses and beer shops which, according to the figures published by Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell, and never yet disputed, realized during the year 1899 a net profit of £19,400,000.

If the building of this ring fence had been commenced fifty or even thirty years ago, thousands of licenses which have been given to private individuals would now have been under public control, and millions of pounds, representing the capital value of these licenses, would have been held for the public benefit.

Although the Central Public House Trust Association is barely more than two years old, it has been able, during that short time, to cover nearly the whole of England with trust companies. The only counties whose Lord Lieutenants and other leading gentlemen have refused to give me any support, and in which a trust company is not yet in existence or in the process of formation, are Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Leicestershire and Oxfordshire.

After speaking of the work done in England, Ireland and Scotland, His Excellency proceeds :—

The total result of our propagandist work, which has cost the Central Public House Trust Association up to date £4,300, has been to bring the number of houses under trust management up to a total of 114, and to ensure the application of trust principles to over 100 additional houses on the termination of current leases. Up to the present time the rate of growth has given an average of one public house per week to be added to those already under trust management, and this rate of growth is likely to increase, several landowners having expressed their intention to hand over to trust companies the public houses on their estates on the expiration of existing leases.

I believe I am correct in saying that never in the history of social reform has any movement fixed its roots so firmly in so wide an area in so short a time.

The reason for this widespread acceptance of the trust principle arises from a general recognition :

First, that a public house as a social institution is a public necessity, and that consequently it is desirable to convert it as far as possible from a mere drinking bar into something more closely resembling a well-conducted club.

Secondly, that under the present system : (1) the interest of the publican is to press his neighbourhood to drink as much as possible ; (2) the customer's choice is frequently limited to the liquors, good or bad, manufactured by the brewery or distillery company to whom the house belonged ; (3) the high profits resulting from monopoly rights are diverted from the pockets of the community, to whom they belong, to those of privileged individuals ; and

Thirdly, that it is right that monopoly houses should be brought wherever possible, under a system of management which will discontinue the exhibition of liquor advertisements, which will push the sale of food and non-alcoholics rather than of drink, which will study the tastes and wants of customers, and sell only the purest and most wholesome drinks that can be obtained, and which will secure for the public the profits to which they are entitled from the monopoly they have created.

At the end of September, 1904, there were in the United Kingdom 145 licenses under trust management. If we notice the names of the persons who have taken the lead in originating and establishing that system so firmly in England, it is no wonder that they have attained such great success, having introduced or having established, within three or four years, some 145 public houses. I have here a pamphlet issued by the Central Public House Trust Association and I find that the following are the officers :—

President.—Earl Grey.

Vice-Presidents.—The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Chester, the Right Hon. J. Chamberlain, M.P.

Executive Committee.—Earl Grey (chairman), Major General Lord Cheylesmore, Lieut-Colonel H. J. Craufurd (chairman of the Committee of Management of the People's Refreshment House Association), W. Cecil Harris, Esq., Colonel Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff, K.C.M.G. (chairman of the Executive Council of the People's Refreshment House Association), Hon. A. Stanley, M.P., and E. Tennant, Esq.

Hon. Treasurer.—W. Cecil Harris, Esq.

Secretary, Oliver Williams; assistant secretary, Hugh Paget.

From the pamphlet in question I find the objects of the Central Public House Trust Association are the following:—

1. To promote temperance.
2. To secure that all new licenses, with their enormous monopoly values, shall be held as trusts for the community, and not given to private gain.

For the purpose of carrying out these objects the association is establishing in each county and large town a local trust company, whose aim it will be to acquire existing licensed houses, or to offer to manage them for their owners, and also, whenever the magistrates decide that it is advisable to create a new license, to ask that, on public grounds, it shall be granted to the trust company.

The leading principle on which a trust company is constituted is the limitation of the dividend to a maximum of five per cent, thus giving the shareholders only a nominal monetary interest in the trade. All surplus profits are handed to a council to be applied to objects of public benefit other than those properly chargeable to the rates, the provision of counter attractions to public houses being especially kept in view. Should the trust company be wound up, the assets after repayment of the shareholders' capital at par, would be handed to the council for appropriation to public objects.

The administration of a trust company, as of other limited liability companies, is in the hands of directors, who are responsible to the shareholders for the conduct of the business. A main feature in the constitution of the company, is the council, composed partly of members holding official positions in the county, e.g., the Lord Lieutenant, the chairman of the county council, &c., and partly of members elected by the first directors. The powers of the council are secured by the allotment to them of twenty deferred shares of 1 shilling each in which are vested one-half the voting power of the company. By this means they are able to ensure that the original policy of the trust company shall be permanently maintained in its integrity.

The houses under trust management are conducted as refreshment houses rather than as mere drinking bars, non-intoxicating drinks, including tea, coffee, and cocoa, as well as food, are readily served to customers as beer or spirits, and the food and drink supplied are of the best quality obtainable. The managers are paid a fixed salary. They have no interest whatever in the profits arising from the sale of intoxicants, and are, in consequence, under no inducement to push this part of the trade. On the other hand, they are encouraged to promote the sale of food and non-intoxicants.

I have here an article which I believe was published the other day in the 'Witness' showing the decrease in the consumption of alcohol in Great Britain from 1900 to 1904 inclusive, which decrease is no doubt due in great measure, if not entirely, to the establishment of those companies. In 1900 the decrease amounted to $5,230,155 as compared with the previous year 1899. In 1901, it amounted to $15,714,765. In 1902, $11,192,130. In 1903, $25,272,730, and in 1904, $25,458,106.

These public house trusts associations as I have stated apply their profits to objects of public utility, and I have here the amounts which have been thus applied by one of those companies. It is the Cowdenbeath Trust House. Up to the end of 1903, they had applied £366 13s. 4d. and at the annual meeting in February, 1904, they applied a further amount of £726 5s. to like objects. These objects are mainly the following:—

Towards fund for building recreation rooms, baths, &c..	306	5	0
House for ambulance waggon..	30	0	0
Towards providing Saturday evening concerts..	150	0	0
Soup kitchen..	20	0	0
Ambulance class..	5	0	0
Dunfermline Cottage Hospital..	50	0	0
Cowdenbeath Brass Band..	10	0	0
Salvation Army..	5	0	0
Contribution to cost of building hall..	100	0	0

—leaving a balance of £50 to be applied as the committee desired.

To my mind, one of the best elements in this system is the elimination of private profits. It is well known that when a person is interested in earning his living by the sale of liquor, oftentimes he must be tempted to induce people to drink, and I think that as a general rule the owners of taverns have their regular clientele who go occasionally to the place for the purpose or enjoying themselves with their friends. If that element of private profit be removed, and if the manager of the institution is interested, not in the sale of intoxicants, but in the sale of temperance drinks, a great source of danger is removed.

They sell everything in those establishments, food and drinks of all kinds, but the manager is paid a premium or a commission on temperance drinks only. He does not get any compensation for the sale of intoxicants and therefore his interest is to push the sale of temperance drinks. All those in favour of prohibition should favour the establishment of a system of that kind as the best means of preparing the way for prohibition, because a certain amount of the profits can be applied towards a sinking fund for the purpose of covering within a certain period the capital invested, and at the expiration of a certain number of years those companies would be prepared to favour the abolition of the sale of liquor under ordinary licenses. The abolition of licenses would then entail no compensation or indemnity.

In bringing this question before the Senate I do not lose sight of the fact that legislation on the matter belongs to the provincial legislatures, but it is incumbent upon us to try to educate the people towards the establishment of some such system in this country. The system may easily be introduced not only in the large towns of the several provinces, but especially in the new sections of the Dominion about to be opened up by the construction of the new Transcontinental Railway. It would be an easy thing at the outset, instead of permitting the establishment of ordinary licensed houses in these large areas of new country, to entrust the sale of liquor or the management of all houses of that kind to trust companies under the Gothenburg system. I am sure that the government, the National Transcontinental Railway Commission, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and contractors generally connected with the building of that railway will find it to their advantage to encourage the adoption of a system of that kind. It would make for peace and good order in those new territories not only during the construction but after the completion of the road.

These are the only remarks I intend to offer on this question, and I have only to close by saying that I hope men imbued with philanthropic and public spirit will be found who, taking example from high quarters, will devote some of their means, their time, and their energy, towards establishing in this country public houses under the Gothenburg system.

I have therefore the honour to move:

That in the opinion of the Senate the British Gothenburg experiments and the establishment of public house trusts in England have materially advanced the solution of the temperance question and of the social reform problem, and that the time has arrived when like experiments should be made and like public house trusts should be established in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I hope I may be excused for saying a few words upon a subject that has not been immediately under my attention, but a long life and long experience in this country has given me a right to express an opinion in respect to the matter now before the House. The hon. gentleman who has drawn attention to the Gothenburg system, deserves a great deal of credit for all the facts he has brought out, and amongst them the paper he quoted from by an expert, a man of high standing, showing that alcohol is in no shape beneficial to mankind. It shortens life instead of prolonging it, and is in no way conducive to the health or to the happiness of mankind. My friends the teetotallers are, I think, in a certain sense logical. They desire to do away entirely with the manufacture and sale of intoxicants. I think that that is more logical than even the Gothenburg' system, which only professes to diminish the existing evil, and it has not a disadvantage which may possibly, in the minds of some, flow from the adoption of the Gothenburg system in a country like Canada. The Gothenburg system will to a large extent, if adopted in this country, make drinking respectable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—And in that sense it may do a certain amount of good, but it does not strike at the root of the evil. My friends the teetotallers, while aiming at prohibition, look to the logical end, that is, changing the habits of the people. Habits are particularly difficult to overcome. Legislation has been tried in vain—it has utterly failed. The great remedy is to educate the people, to teach them that alcohol will not prolong their life, and will not add to their happiness, that intemperance in the use of liquor in all cases is fraught with evil of every kind. Any one familiar with the administration of justice knows the number of crimes that occur from excessive drinking, the unhappiness it has produced in families, the poverty that results from it; but that has been known for ages, and those who aim to make a reformation, must, if they are to meet with success, continue in their endeavour to shape public opinion. In a speech which I made some years ago in the Senate I showed how utterly powerless we are to repress an evil unless we can influence public opinion to change the habits and customs of the people. I was alluding at the time to the matter of smuggling. Smuggling no doubt is an offence against the law, but there was a time in England and in many other countries—and I am not sure that it does not prevail to a certain extent now—when if a man could evade the law and avoid paying duty upon imported articles, his conscience was not wounded. There was a time in England when the peer smuggled his expensive wines and the poor man his tobacco, and public opinion did not pronounce such smuggling any great evil. It was an offence against the law certainly, but public opinion was not sufficiently educated to frown it down. Nothing but a complete change in public opinion will cure the drinking habit in Canada or in any other country. In this country especially, I have noticed an immense improvement in public opinion and I think it is due largely to the efforts of the temperance people. No doubt they have been helped a great deal by the authorities compelling those who have licenses for the sale of liquor to keep decent houses, and surrounding them by certain safeguards, calculated to prevent excessive drinking and so on, but it has not produced any great effect in that way. It is upon the general opinion of the people of Canada that we must depend for reformation, and there is far less drinking in Canada now. It is now considered a disgrace to be seen drunk in public, but fifty or sixty years ago the best men in the country did not consider themselves disgraced if they were seen staggering about the town half drunk. It is the same with regard to duelling. Under the Common Statute Law, if a man shoots another in a duel, he is guilty of murder. It is within my memory, and probably in the memory of many other members of this House, that there was a time when no man dared to refuse to accept a challenge. I recollect a very sad occurrence in Ireland, my native land, caused by public opinion requiring a man to accept a challenge, but public opinion has been completely changed, and any one who would challenge a man to a duel at the present day would be merely laughed at. Public opinion does not expect any one to risk his life in that way, and certainly would not consider it a settlement of any question on which parties differed. But so strong was public opinion on that point in my native country years ago, that a very respectable and worthy man who had been out once or twice yielded, as all his contemporaries had to yield, to the strength of that public opinion, and killed his opponent in a duel; and he was brought up on a charge of murder. The judge in charging the jury said, 'Gentlemen of the jury, I am bound to tell you that everything was conducted with perfect fairness; the seconds were men of experience in these matters and saw that everything was right, and I certainly think I never heard of anything conducted with greater propriety, but I am bound to tell you that according to the law of the land, it amounts to murder; but so help me, gentlemen, a fairer thing I never saw.' The jury naturally acquitted him, so I think we have ample proof in the history of the British Islands, that public opinion and habits particularly are not to be put down by law. In my own experience I have had to deal with cases of drunkenness; and in reading the evidence before me I could see the names of many most respectable men who gave their evidence in such a way as to show that they had a strong desire to screen the offenders, and that feeling was because they had been drinking themselves. The law of the land really conduces to immorality in that way. Then came the change in public opinion, to which I have already referred.

Reverting to what I said in the first place, the Gothenburg system, so far as I know anything about it, aims to make the liquor trade respectable and to conduct it in a very business-like way indeed, and holds out the inducement that all profits derived from it are to be devoted to some useful purpose. The whole business is to be conducted very respectably and honestly, and I have no doubt it will be found that, failing all other remedies, it might perhaps have a very good effect, but I must say that I do not think it will be entirely successful. To conclude, in one word, I think there is nothing but the proper education of men to make them know and feel and act from the conviction that drinking is injurious to the person who drinks, is injurious to morality, and leads to crime. To educate them in that way is the true principle, but every other scheme deserves fair consideration. For my part I cannot say at present that I have any faith in the scheme which has been outlined to-day. I have more faith in the efforts of those men who have worked so diligently and have been in such a large measure successful during past years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. This motion conflicts with rule 14 of this House which is as follows:

No motion prefaced by a written preamble is received by the Senate.

This motion commences by this preamble:

That in connection with the drink question, he will call the attention of the Senate to the British Gothenburg experiments and the public house trusts in England.

And then comes the motion:

That in the opinion of the Senate the British Gothenburg' experiments and the establishment of public house trusts in England have materially advanced the solution of the temperance question and of the social reform problem, and that the time has arrived when like experiments should be made and like public house trusts should be established in Canada.

When we want to ask a question of the government, we may call the attention of the House to certain facts, but that is in regard to an inquiry asking what is the policy of the government on any question. But when we come to deal with a motion like this, calling for the opinion of the House upon a certain question, we cannot preface that motion by a preamble, and this is a direct violation of our rule. I call the attention of the Speaker to a precedent; it will be found on page 440 of the Senate Debates, for 1877. A Bill was before the House which the Acting Speaker (Mr. Power) opposed, and Mr. Trudel moved an amendment:

That inasmuch as the very essence of the Bill before the House has been changed so that the original Bill has disappeared and that a new Bill on a matter essentially different from the first has been put in its stead that this House has before it a new Bill altogether, that this Bill has never been preceded by a petition.

And he moved that the said Bill be not read the third time. The Speaker said:

In my opinion the motion is not in order. It is prefaced by a preamble, which is contrary to the 15th rule of this House.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN.

It was rule 15 at the time. It is rule 14 now. I ask the decision of the chair on that question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In my humble opinion the point of order is badly taken. The precedent which the hon. gentleman has cited does not bear at all on the question. There the preamble was in the motion, but I respectfully submit there is no preamble in the present motion. The motion is contained in the second paragraph of the notice. The other is merely an intimation bearing on the fact that in connection with the drink question I would call the attention of the Senate to the Gothenburg experiments and the Public House Trusts in England. This is apart from the motion—it is a notice that I have given to the House in order that hon. members who might desire to speak on the question might have an indication as to the lines on which I proposed to address the honourable House; but the motion is contained exclusively in the second paragraph. All that the point of order can lead to would be merely to strike out the first paragraph, which would not impair the motion in any shape or form. The motion would remain complete as it is, and therefore it is plain that the motion itself does not contain any preamble. It is merely an expression of opinion. I refer the honourable House to the Journals of the Senate for 1900, page 70, where the following motion is made:

The Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Ferguson,

1. That the establishment of a telegraph cable across the Pacific to connect Canada with the Australasian colonies has been long regarded as of high importance to the empire; it having been recognized to be of imperial importance at the Colonial Conferences of 1887 and 1894, affirmed by an agreement between the home government and the governments of Canada, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland and New Zealand, and ratified by the Canadian parliament last session; this House, therefore, regrets that serious delays have occurred in the prosecution of the undertaking, manifestly through the hostility of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which company is now demanding concessions from the Australasian colonies which, if granted, will imperil the success of the Pacific cable.

2. That this House is of opinion that any further delay in proceeding with the actual construction of the undertaking would be inimical to the interests of the empire, and strongly deprecates granting any further concessions to the Eastern Extension, or any other company.

3. That it is expedient, in granting permission hereafter to private companies to lay cables between British possessions, it be on the express condition that the state may assume ownership whenever in the general public interest it is advisable to do so.

I refer to this as a precedent, to show that the reasons mentioned in the motion itself——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was there any objection taken to that motion ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No I do not think there was.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was there a ruling given on that point ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, I do not think there was. But I could find any number——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, I made some motions like that myself.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In the Journals of 1896, page 14, I find another motion by the Hon. Mr. Boulton. I may say that for the short time that I have had the honour to sit in this House, it has been almost the universal practice to do as I have done. I might refer to the motion which was moved by Sir George Drummond with reference to the postage question. It was framed exactly on the lines of my own motion. I repeat that the objection of my hon. friend bears merely on the first paragraph. I say that the first paragraph of the notice is altogether apart from the motion and that the motion contained in the second paragraph is complete in itself, and does not in any way refer to the first paragraph ; and I submit it is in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The difference between my hon. friend and myself in the present instance is that he cites what has taken place in one, two or three instances where no objection was taken, but I give as a precedent a decision which was rendered, and I have the rule. The rule is there and speaks for itself. The hon. gentleman says 'if you take my motion alone it is complete.' Now it is because it is complete when it is taken alone that I object to the preamble to the motion. Every motion may be complete by itself if you take out the part which is objected to, but the rule says that such a motion with a preamble cannot be put. The preamble is there and it is avowed by the hon. gentleman himself that there is a preamble.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The Speaker has been asked for a ruling. Meantime, I want to call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that in the instance he has quoted the objection which was taken, and the reason for that objection, was that the Bill was entirely at variance with the measure as introduced in the first instance. The motion of my hon. friend is exactly as it was when first brought to the notice of the House, and no change has been made.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not the point.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—In the other case the Bill was entirely at variance with the notice.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Does the hon. gentleman contend that there is a preamble to this notice ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In what words ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have read it. It is in the first two lines.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The first paragraph reads :

That in connection with the drink question he will call the attention of the Senate to the British Gothenburg experiments and the public house trusts in England.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the part I refer to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I scarcely think that is a preamble.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the hon. gentleman's opinion—not mine.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman places his motion before the House for a certain purpose, and he states his purpose in the first four lines, and it is contained in the first four lines.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All preambles are for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I think my hon. friend could have found dozens of resolutions that have been brought before this House, that certainly went a long way further than this resolution goes in the way of having a preamble preceding the motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But two blacks do not make a white.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That may be very true but we have in our rules a provision—in which we differ from other representative bodies—under which a member may call attention to certain things. An hon. gentleman must distinguish between merely calling attention to facts and moving a resolution. Where he desires to point out facts he must do it in certain words. He must either place these words before his resolution or after. The practice here has been to place them at the beginning of the question which the member desires to raise.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The question—not the motion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman can call it a question if he likes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is the same thing. What would constitute a preamble ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is a very broad question, and would take a long while to answer, because there are so many things that might constitute a preamble,—'whereas this' and 'whereas that.' That is what constitutes a preamble in my opinion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing the word 'whereas' was inserted in this case ? Would that make it a preamble ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It would not make sense, unfortunately.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not talking about sense.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am not saying it jokingly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE Bowell—There are many preambles that have no sense in them.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The object could not be attained if the word 'whereas' were used. It would not accomplish the direct object which the hon. gentleman has in view. He desires to call the attention of the House to certain facts and therefore the word 'whereas' would not be applicable. It shows it is merely a formal notice to the House that he is going to do a certain thing, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, that is certainly a preamble.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—And it does not form part of the subject matter at all. The preamble would pave the way to the subject matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That paves the way.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It merely makes a statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The preamble rather presupposes that it contains an averment of certain statements, while this does not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly it does.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The statements might be open to question. I do not consider this would be open to question, because it is for the purpose of calling attention to a subject. It does not aver certain facts. It does not aver that so-and-so exists. I think my hon. friend has pushed this point rather too far. I really do not think it could be sustained, because the objection to the preamble is that you at once give an opportunity to challenge the facts. You state facts that are open to controversy. I presume the two lines which are regarded merely as a notice to the Chamber, can scarcely be called a matter of controversy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In that case you will find the controverted facts in the second paragraph.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are not in the first.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Well, they might be controverted and we are asked to accept those facts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The whole subject is open to challenge, no doubt.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is or it is not a preamble. That is what we want to know.

The ACTING SPEAKER—(Hon. Mr. Power). I think the hon. gentleman from Killarney has indicated the proper criterion to ascertain whether or not a preface to a resolution is a preamble. He suggests that in the case of a preamble you could use the word 'whereas.' I do not think that this is a preamble. You could not use the word 'whereas' and then base the resolution which follows on that preamble. At the same time I must say that I think that the motion is in a way irregular. We have a practice in this House, introduced in the session of 1877, of calling attention to a matter, and then asking a question ; but I think it is slightly irregular to call attention to a matter, and then to move a resolution upon the matter to which you have called attention. I do not mean to say that a member has not the right to do it, but I think it is an unusual practice and somewhat irregular. I may say in connection with this matter that it struck me that the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) had omitted certain words. After the first three lines, if he had said 'and will move,' it would have put the matter perhaps in a little better form. As a matter of fact, the motion which I put from the chair was the latter part of this notice. I did not put the first part at all. As I understood him the hon. gentleman simply moved the latter part as a resolution, and that was the question which I put from the chair. I treated the first two lines and a half as mere surplusage ; and while I think the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, is in a way justified in contending that the motion is slightly irregular, still the irregularity is of so small a character that I should hardly be disposed to rule that the resolution which was moved was out of order because of this preliminary observation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand the decision of the Chair, there is no preamble.

The SPEAKER—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because the Chair took upon itself to strike out the first three lines, that is the case.

The SPEAKER—I stated that the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Mr. Béique), in making the motion, only moved the second part—'that the opinion of the Senate,' and so on.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman moved in one way and the Chair moved in the other.

The SPEAKER—I think there is one rule of this House which the hon. gentleman might observe, and that is not to reflect on the decision of the Chair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, I am simply stating facts.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This matter might well be considered in the revision of the rules.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We would want a little more light.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In regard to the merits of this motion, I as one desiring to see provincial rights respected in this parliament, would have liked a more formal declaration. If the hon. gentleman is prepared to tell this House that we are taking out of the hands of the provincial legislature, subjects that distinctly and completely belong to their control, we should know it. He alluded to the matter in his remarks. He said he felt that it did touch on provincial rights, getting into the domain of provincial jurisdiction, but did not state so emphatically, and I, for one, think this resolution deals with a matter that comes solely and simply under provincial control.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman can scarcely have read the motion. It does not call upon this government to take any action in the matter, but merely asks that an opinion be expressed by this House that the time has arrived when private companies of the same kind as have been established in England should be established in this country. It does not call for any action on the part of the government in this matter. It suggests merely that philanthropic people should take action and establish proper companies, which are private companies ; and therefore there is no encroachment on either federal or provincial power. Surely it is open for this honourable House to express a theoretical opinion on any given point in order to aid in the formation of public opinion on any given question, and that is the only object which I had in view in moving this resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That explanation is quite satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I do not think it is necessary to speak at any length on the question of the evils which arise from the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. I think there is only one opinion as to the disastrous effects of strong liquors on the mind and on the body. In the great struggle which is going on in this world between good and evil there is no doubt that alcohol is one of the principal agents and principal lieutenants of the wrongdoer, and the great enemy of humanity. It is a source of crime and of political and moral disorganization. I may say that it is also a terrible grave-digger, and a liberal patron of cemeteries. How many men of talent have I known, how many brilliant intellects have I known to be demoralized by the use of alcohol. How many talents which otherwise would have been destined to contribute to the strength and glory of the world, have been destroyed before having accomplished what society had a right to expect from them. If all the graves of the victims of alcohol were to be marked with black stones, our cemeteries would have a great many of them. We all agree as to the existence of the evil, but many of us disagree considerably as to the remedies to be applied. Very respectable people are in favour of prohibition and think that probibition alone can destroy that great enemy. Although I respect the opinion of those people, and especially of the honourable and venerable gentleman who has spoken before me, I think that prohibition is not always a good thing. I think it is not wise sometimes to prohibit, to try to destroy completely certain things which are not bad in themselves, but which are bad only on account of the evils which they produce. If we were to do away with the very thing which produces abuses, I think that the best institutions themselves, and even religion itself, could not escape destruction. I think the wisest thing we can do is to try to limit the evil, and one of the reasons which may be alleged is that prohibition, to be effective, should be absolute, and if it is absolute it is necessary that it must be unjust, because wine is a food. There are many people in this country and in all countries for whom wine is considered proper food, and even recommended by doctors under certain circumstances as a remedy. There are many circumstances in a country like this, where a moderate use of alcohol is prescribed by certain doctors, and no one can deny that wine is used for the celebration of Mass, and it is absolutely necessary in that case. I propose to advance a theory which perhaps will not be approved of by all the hon. members of this House, but I have no hesitation in saying, relying upon certain eminent men who have written articles on the question, that in cold countries the use of alcohol is sometimes almost a necessity. The colder a country is, the more the people living in that country feel the need of substantial food and of a beverage which warms and stimulates. Mr. Buckle, in his celebrated work on Civilization in Europe, has established that fact and explained it by reference to physical conditions which are very interesting. He says that in a cold country there is an excess of oxygen in the air. That excess of oxygen must be compensated by the introduction into the human system of a carbonic acid ; and a carbonic acid may be produced by the food and by the beverage which is consumed by people in those countries. Why do the Esquimaux, living on the shores of Hudson bay, drink oil ? Is it because oil is good and agreeable to the taste ? No ; but because the people in those cold regions feel the need of eating a substantial food, of eating fat meat and of drinking something which gives them the warmth and the stimulation which they require ; so that I conclude that Buckle and many other eminent writers and philosophers are right when they say that in a country like ours it is almost impossible to prohibit entirely the use of alcohol, and that the best means which can be taken are to restrict as far as possible the disastrous effects of the use of alcohol. That is the reason why I am in favour of the motion of the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry. I think that the trust system which he has mentioned is one of the means which can be taken to limit and restrict the abuse of the use of alcohol. It has been tried, so that we know what it has done in other countries, and we have no reason to think that it will not produce in Canada the good results that it has produced elsewhere. The effect of the system is to replace the use of intoxicating liquors by the introduction of more wholesome liquors, such as light wines and beer. I think, for the reasons which I have given, that the most we can do in a country like Canada, is to substitute light wines and beer, which would not have the same effect as strong liquors upon the moral and physical condition of men. Nobody can deny that the countries where wine is drunk, and where strong liquors are not used to any great extent, have the most sober population in the world. I think the statistics are published to prove that fact, and nobody can deny that in the provinces of France where wine is produced in great quantities, the people are sober compared with the people of other countries. Those who drink wine do not care about using strong liquors, in fact when they get accustomed to wine they cannot drink strong liquors. I am therefore of opinion that the government of this country and all the public men of this country should endeavour to devise a means, not of establishing prohibition, but of inducing the people to replace the use of strong liquor by the use of wines or light beers, and to attain that object I think that the local governments should introduce the system which has been established in the United States, and which has produced a beneficial result there, the high license system, the effect of which will be to do away with all those taverns and shebeens which exist on the four corners of the principal streets of the cities in Canada. What is the greatest danger to the labourer coming home from his workshop ? It is that he has to pass thirty, or forty, or fifty of these shebeens and taverns. When he is walking along, carrying his dinner pail, and wearing his working clothes, do you think he would go to the Windsor hotel, in Montreal, or the King Edward in Toronto ? No, he would not go there to drink. In those places he would not meet the companions with whom he is accustomed to drink. And do you think that in the evening he would go to the trouble of dressing himself to go to the Windsor in Montreal, or the Queen's in Toronto, to drink a glass of liquor ? I think that the high license system, which has been tried in England and in the United States, would have a very good effect in Canada. The best means to fight this terrible evil is not to try to destroy it, but to endeavour to limit and restrict its pernicious effect. I think the provincial legislatures should not only have recourse to the license system, but that they should adopt the means indicated in the motion of the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, and should try to introduce the use of light wines and beer by establishing a system of low licenses for the establishment of restaurants, where they would sell only light wines and beer. I do not believe in mixing strong liquors and wine or beer. Make the law so severe that people will not dare to violate it. Impose a heavy a fine on those which violate the law, and in this way you would succeed in preventing frauds. I think that the federal government should do its share in this good work by imposing very high duties on all strong liquors imported from foreign countries, or manufactured in this country, and very light duties on wine and beer. I think that moral suasion should be used as much as possible. The ministers of this country who preach the gospel have a great field before them in which to exert their influence. They might intervene, and go as far as they liked, and nobody would blame them for their intervention. They might preach as much as they liked and the effect would be beneficial to the country, and no complaint will be made of their intervention on that ground, although complaint may be made in regard to intervention in other matters.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—To sum up in a few words what I have said, I am under the impression, relying on the opinion expressed by great philosophers, that we cannot hope that prohibition will have the effect which is anticipated by so many respectable and well-meaning people, and that the only remedy is to restrict the disastrous effect of the abuse of the use of alcohol, by the means suggested by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, and by the means which I have just mentioned. I do not pretend to say that I have indicated all the ways and means which could be employed, in curing the evil, but I think I have indicated enough to enable hon. members to supply what I have not said. It is one of those questions which is worthy of the consideration of this House. I agree with the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry when he says that the Senate is the place where all those great questions which concern the welfare of our country should be discussed, and no effort should be made to close the door to such discussions.

Hon. Mr. WILSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

ONTARIO AND MINNESOTA POWER COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the second reading of Bill (86) An Act respecting the Ontario and Minnesota Power Company, Limited.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In permitting this Bill to be read the second time without discussion, it must be distinctly understood that the Senate does not commit itself to the principle involved in the Bill. There are very many objections to the measure, as it interferes materially with provincial rights and with certain agreements made with the locality and the town interested. I am not going to oppose the second reading now, because it can be discussed and if necessary amended in committee; but I wish it understood that in allowing the second reading to take place without discussion we do not commit ourselves to the Bill as a whole.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

INTERNATIONAL BRIDGE AND TERMINAL COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) moved the second reading of Bill (87) An Act to incorporate the International Bridge and Terminal Company.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (P.E.I.)—Explain.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—The Bill explains itself. It is to incorporate a company to construct a bridge over the Rainy river from a point in or near the town of Fort Francis, in the province of Ontario, to a point in or near the town of International Falls in Minnesota. A deputation from Fort Francis will appear before the Railway Committee, to-morrow possibly, to oppose the measure. They will throw light on the subject. The Senate in consenting to the second reading reserve, I suppose, the right to take whatever course they may see fit after full light is shed upon the measure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is in much the same position as the Bill which we have just read the second time.

Hon. Mr. WILSON.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. It may be necessary for the government to take action in regard to both these Bills, as it is necessary for the plans to be approved by the government; and I am very glad the hon. member from Belleville has indicated to the House that in allowing the second reading of these two Bills we in no way commit ourselves to the principle, and that we will be quite free at any future stage of the Bill to take such action as we think proper.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The government must have examined these Bills, because they come from the House of Commons. Surely if there had been anything wrong in them the Minister of Justice would have called attention to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may say that the attention of the government was not called to the Bills in the House of Commons. The opposition to the Bills has arisen since they have passed the other House. It would not be proper for me to set forth the reasons for the objections to the Bills, but there is this peculiar feature about them, that they passed without attracting notice in the House of Commons.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

TORONTO AND HAMILTON RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto) moved the second reading of Bill (110) An Act respecting the Toronto and Hamilton Railway Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does this affect either of the present railways, from Toronto to Hamilton, or does it deal with a new line?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is an amendment to a charter that has already been granted by this parliament. The Bill is quite simple, but is a little formidable in this way; it is a Bill to authorize the construction of a railway across a certain tract of land at Burlington Bay, and this is to enable the company to do the work without the consent of the municipalities that are named, and whose consent would be required under the general law. The Bill is being passed with the consent of the municipalities.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The municipalities I understand have objected to the building of the road, and this Bill is to enable them to build it without their consent.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—They have given their consent to its being done in this way.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

TESTS OF THE EFFICIENCY OF THE ROSS RIFLE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government :

1. Has the government submitted the Ross rifle to tests to establish its efficiency ?
2. What were these tests ?
3. What were the results of them ?
4. What changes have been made in the manufacture of this rifle since the government entered into a contract with the Ross Rifle Company ?
5. Does the government know whether this rifle has undergone tests in England, and if such is the case, what report has the government obtained on this subject ?
6. How many rifles have been manufactured since the date of the aforesaid contract ?
7. How many containing the latest improvements have been received by the government?
8. What number of rifles is the government bound to accept ?
9. At what cost?
10. Has the government distributed any of these rifles to military corps ?
11. What regiments have been provided with them ?
12. If no distribution has yet been made, when does the government intend to commence it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :

1. Yes.

2. Test for rapidity and accuracy; test for endurance; test for dust; test for defective cartridges; test for excessive charges; test for rust.

3. Satisfactory in every case.

4. The receiver or body, and the bolt action have been strengthened to take higher velocity ammunition. In doing so more perfect loading and feeding and a freer extraction has been secured.

A backsight containing the latest ideas has been adopted instead of that of the first pattern.

5. The rifle which it is proposed to adopt and issue has not undergone tests in England, consequently no report has been received.

6. About 10,000 except placing of new sight.

7. None.

8. 12,000, for the first year, and not less than 10,000 a year afterwards, as may be necessary to meet the requirements of the government, subject to conditions as to modification of pattern and price.

9. $25.

10. No.

11. None.

12. Impossible to say yet. Probably 1st September.

DIVISION OF MILITARY FORCES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government:

1. Have the military authorities divided the forces into five army corps?
2. Who are the commanding officers of each of these corps?
3. Who are the chief staff officers of each of these commanding officers?
4. What is the salary of these commanding officers?
5. What is the salary of these chief staff officers?
6. What is the nationality of each of the commanding officers?
7. Where will the headquarters of each of these commanding officers be?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. No, but to institute four higher commands, viz.:

(a) Eastern Ontario; (b) western Ontario; (c) Quebec, and (d) maritime provinces.

2. (a) Brigadier-General W. D. Otter, C.B., A.D.C.

(b) Colonel W. D. Gordon,

(c) Colonel L. Buchan, C.M.G.

(d) Colonel C. W. Drury, C.B.

3. (a) Lieut.-Col. S. J. A. Denison, C.M.G.

(b) Lieut.-Col. V. A. S. Williams.

(c) Lieut.-Colonel O. C. C. Pelletier.

(d) Lieut.-Col. J. D. Irving.

4 and 5. Not yet decided.

6. All four are Canadian.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I know now that Canada is a nation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the seventh question is:

7. (a) Toronto; (b) Kingston; (c) Montreal, and (d) Halifax. Those are the only four.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose there will be headquarters for the corps for the west.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those I named were eastern Ontario, western Ontario, Quebec, and the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the answer of the hon. minister is that there are five higher commands.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I named only four.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understood the hon. minister to say in answer to the first question, that there were five.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I said there were only four higher appointments.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the hon. gentleman leaves that question, I understood him to say that there were to be 12,000 of these rifles presented in one year, and ten thousand the year afterwards. For how long period is that to continue?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—For ever and ever.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Whatever may be necessary for the requirements of the service—whatever may be necessary to equip the force. That was the arrangement.

FRENCH REPRESENTATION IN THE SENATE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government:

Does the government know that, under the three administrations which preceded its own, the French element in the country was represented in the Senate by a member of the executive?

Is it the intention of the government to break completely with this tradition, and is the elimination of a French representative member of the cabinet from a House which already counts three English members of the executive, to be considered as the realization of the promise which was made that the Senate should be reformed ?

Does the government intend to give the Senate, in the near future, a French minister ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—1. I accept the hon. gentleman's assumption of the fact as being correct.

2. I am unable to foreshadow the policy of the government on the subject. The absence of a representative of the government in the Senate from the province of Quebec is due to other causes than those suggested in the hon. gentleman's inquiry.

3. I am unable to express a positive opinion on the subject.

ICE-BREAKER 'MONTCALM'.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government :

1. How much has the ice-breaker 'Montcalm' cost the government up to this date, for purchase, repairs, equipment and provisions ?
2. What is the number of men employed on this vessel ?
3. Of how many is the crew, properly so called, composed?
4. What is its daily consumption of coal when it is in use ?
5. How much a ton is paid for this coal ?
6. How many tons of coal have been expended on board the 'Montcalm' since this vessel has been in the government's service?
7. What is the amount of daily wages and salaries paid to all those who are employed in the service of this vessel ?
8. What is the number of days, and what is the number of hours (on the average) daily, during which the 'Montcalm' has been specially employed in breaking the icebridge at Cap Rouge ?
9. Has it succeeded in this work ?
10. Was it the 'Montcalm' which brought about the breakup or was it stranded when the breakup came about ?
11. When did the breakup take place, and when did the 'Montcalm' return to Quebec ?
12. Has it suffered any damage, and what?
13. Does the government intend to renew next year the experiences which it has undergone this year?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :

1. $295,509.79.

2. Forty-seven (47) men.

3. Captain, three mates, steward, two assistant stewards and waiters, cook, two assistant cooks, four quarter-masters, one carpenter and boatswain, twelve A.B., four engineers, four oilers and twelve firemen.

4. When running under two boilers about forty tons per day ; when running under four boilers, full power, about seventy-two tons per day.

5. $3, $4.50, $5 and $5.25, according to where obtained and cartage included.

6. 2,182 tons.

7. The amount of daily wages and salaries paid is $54 per day.

8. Forty days, or 207 hours work at the ice bridge.

9. The 'Montcalm' rendered valuable services.

10. The 'Montcalm' was engaged in breaking up the ice when the bridge gave way ; she was put into a place of safety until the crush was over, then came out with a great portion of the body of the ice.

11. The breakup took place on the 12th April last, then jammed again until the 20th April when it started again ; the 'Montcalm' returned to Quebec at 12.45 on the 21st April last.

12. The 'Montcalm' has suffered damage by breaking several blades off her starboard side propellor ; she has also lost a few rivets and slightly opened some seams in the bow due to the heavy work she was doing in the ice ; it is rare that any new vessel after some months service does not require overhauling and caulking ; the 'Montcalm' is no exception to the rule.

13. It is the intention of the government to endeavour to keep the ice bridge at Cap Rouge from forming next year.

FREE CANADIAN PORTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government :

1. Does the government intend to make Montreal, Quebec, St. John, N.B., and Halifax free ports ?
2. Which of the Canadian ports are free at the present time ?
3. Which of the Canadian ports does the government wish to declare free ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are as follows :

1. The subject has not been considered.

2. Not any one of the cities can be called an absolutely free port.

3. The government has not expressed any opinion on the subject. It has never been discussed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is there any free port besides those named ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware of any free port.

PACKING AND SALE OF CERTAIN STAPLE COMMODITIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT introduced Bill (DD) An Act respecting the administration of an Act respecting the packing and sale of certain staple commodities.

He said : This is a very small alteration intended to facilitate the working of the Act, only introducing two or three words.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it to amend the Act passed this session.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—A question was raised whether the Governor in Council could properly subdivide the Act and allow one department to administer one portion and another department to administer another portion.

The Bill was read the first time.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he can give me any information about a return to an address which was passed by this House on the 14th June, 1904, calling for a statement showing the names, ages, &c., of the members of the crew of the ship sent in 1903 to explore Hudson bay? In the month of August I asked why the return to the address had been delayed, and the hon. gentleman promised that I should get it in a few days. Later I repeated my question, and also again at the beginning of this session. I do not know if the answer is on board the ship or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What is the name of the steamer ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The 'Neptune.' As I am on my feet, I would also inquire for the return which I moved for on the 11th of April last, of copies of all despatches, letters, communications, &c., received by the Department of Public Works, or any officer thereof, from the Hon. Senator Choquette relative to the sale of land made to him by the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will inquire.

BRANTFORD AND WOODSTOCK RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the third reading of Bill (63) An Act to incorporate the Brantford and Woodstock Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Before this Bill is read the third time, I desire to call attention to the fact that what is proposed here is to incorporate a company for the construction of a line of railway from Brantford to Woodstock, a distance of twenty-eight miles, over a level section of country, and within the boundaries of two adjoining counties of the province of Ontario. It appears to me that the introduction and passing of this Bill is not a true appreciation of the spirit of the constitution under which we are legislating. This is a purely local work, which should be authorized only by the province of Ontario, in which it is wholly situated. Nothing has been shown, either in the Bill or outside of the Bill, to indicate that it is not a local work, or a work which should be authorized by the legislature of Ontario. It is time we should call a halt about legislation in respect of small works or unimportant railways, or at all events works which, whether important or unimportant, are within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature. This line of railway is not defined in the Bill except in very general terms. The eighth clause provides that :

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches from a point at or near the city of Brantford, through the townships of Brantford, Burford East, Oxford and Blandford, to a point at or near the city of Woodstock.

There is no further definition of the line of railway than that, but a map was produced, when the Bill was under consideration in committee, on which was indicated —and, so far as I understand, it cannot be disputed—that the course of the railway will be almost due west from Brantford, fourteen or fifteen miles, practically paralleling the Grand Trunk Railway for that distance, and for the remainder of the twenty-eight miles in a northwesterly direction to the city of Woodstock. There is already railway communication, as was shown on the same map, between Brantford and Woodstock by way of Paris, so that the necessity for a railway between the two cities does not exist. There is no necessity for it unless it be to furnish further and better means of transit and transportation between the two places; but if that is the only reason, then it is open to the Ontario legislature to provide, on proper application made, for the construction of such a line of local railway as would connect the two places. As I say, there is nothing in the Act to define anything more than that, but that itself prima facie excludes the possibility of its being a work of any more general importance than is implied in a line of railway connecting those two points, a distance of twenty-eight miles. It was stated that it was to connect the line of the Toronto, Hamilton and Brantford Railway at Brantford with either the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway at Woodstock, but there is nothing in this Bill to indicate that there is any such intention, or that either of these two railways is in any sense a party to any arrangement of this nature, or that legislation should be obtained for the purpose of enabling it to be done. There was no person appearing to represent either of those companies to indicate to parliament or the committee that there was any intention of making such connection. The Bill does not describe the proposed line as connecting the two railways in any way, so I think we may fairly exclude the idea of this legislation having any such object or intention, unless it may be done by an independent company as a local enterprise. It is said that the line is to be operated by steam. We all know that under the Railway Act a company which is incorporated may be operated either by electricity or by steam. It is not provided in this Bill—although it has been said outside for the purpose of influencing members of the committee in dealing with the matter—that it is the intention to operate this road by steam ; therefore, it is quite open to this company to operate the line as it may choose. Its line is not defined to be its own distinct right of way ; it is not defined that it is to be built on the company's own land ; and, therefore, it is quite open to conclude, the power being given by this Bill, that the road may be nothing more or less than an electric tramway, built on the public highways, with the assent of the municipalities through which it will pass, and operated as an electric tramway. There is nothing in this Bill to prevent such or to show that the contrary is intended. There is nothing in the Bill to make it appear that the line will be anything but an electric tramway, operated by electricity, built on the public highways, or partly on public highways and partly on its own property. Under the circumstances, there is no justification for saying that this road is in any sense a work which ought fairly to be declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, or which should, for any reason, be taken away from the legislative control of the province of Ontario and be incorporated under the control and authority and with the powers conferred by an Act of this parliament. It seems to me that it is trespassing to a very great extent upon the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, and that it is entirely contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act, that parliament should be called upon to legislate in this way, ousting, as I have pointed out, the authority, control and jurisdiction of the legislature of the province in which this work is wholly situated.

Under these circumstances, what should be done ? Should not parliament now take a stand on this question ? We have been for three years past speaking on this subject. Two years ago, when the Railway Act was under consideration, provision was made in that measure that a provincial railway which crossed another line of railway should not necessarily be called a work for the advantage of Canada, nor should it pass under the control of parliament by reason of that crossing, but, on the contrary, that control of the crossing alone should be vested in parliament, while the railway itself should continue under the control of the province—that is, if incorporated by the province. There is no reason, therefore, why this road should not have been incorporated by the province. It would then have had all the power that is in any way claimed for it. Formerly, when application was made to parliament for an Act of incorporation for the construction of a railway wholly within the province, the excuse was offered that it was going either to connect with or to cross a railway already under the legislative authority of parliament. That is no longer a reason for anything of the kind being done, and the crossing cannot now be fairly urged as an excuse.

It has been said here that it was intended that this road should cross the Grand Trunk at a point near Eastwood, but there is nothing in the Act to show that there will be such a crossing. Even if that were to be the case, the Railway Act would apply, and the line would continue under the legislative control of the province of Ontario, the railway crossing itself and that only, being under the control of the Dominion parliament. Under these circumstances I say that the present legislation is a misuse of the provision authorizing a work to be declared for the general advantage of Canada. That is an expression which ought not to be lightly used in an Act of parliament. The constitution did not contemplate that it should be used lightly, or used at all in cases of a purely local character, where the work itself had no extended influence, where it was not connected with any kind of Dominion work, and where the people at large, outside of the province, would have no interest in it. I submit that no case has been made out either for incorporating this company as a Dominion railway or for declaring it to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. Under these circumstances we should take a stand, and take it now. This question has been raised before, and it has been declared that a stand should be taken in the future and that we should adopt a rule; but the rule will never be adopted unless it is adopted at the time objection is taken. If parties are to be encouraged by this course to apply to parliament for authorization to construct local works, they can come next year and say 'we have a precedent. You have conferred this right before, and therefore, you should confer it again'; and that will go on for all time. The time has come to put a stop to this procedure. The argument is advanced that we should not interfere with the rights of these people, having in the past given similar rights to others. There is no right to claim such legislation. There could be no right until parliament had passed the Bill, and it is now open to parliament to say: 'The proper course for you is to apply to the local legislature which is vested with authority to confer these privileges.'

Now there is a very strong reason why this Bill should not be passed and why the promoters should be left to apply to the legislature. The local legislature has the control of the municipalities concerned. These municipalities and their local circumstances are better known to the representatives of the districts affected in the local legislature than they can well be known in the Dominion parliament; and therefore they can legislate in such a way as the circumstances may call for, which circumstances are not presented to parliament here in dealing with such cases. I maintain, therefore, that when a Bill is clearly within the powers of the local legislature, parliament should hesitate —nay, more, should refuse to interfere, and should refuse to confer the legislative authority which is sought by a Bill of this kind. There is nothing fairer than to say that a railway such as this, situated wholly within the province, is one within the legislative authority of the province of Ontario, under the provisions of section 92 of the British North America Act. Hon. gentlemen will bear with me while I read the section I refer to. Section 92 reads:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say;—
> 10. Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:
> (a) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraph and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the provinces.

Those are the cases in which the legislatures cannot pass laws. They can legislate in all works other than those I have named. This is not one coming within the class excepted from local authority and it is a work which comes within the class mentioned in subsection 10. Instead of going through the farce half a dozen times in the year of objecting to this exercise of legislative function, which is admitted to be an interference with the legislative authority of the province, I think we should now take a stand and say that in future such applications must be made to the province, and that this application must be referred to the local legislature to be dealt with there.

Therefore, I for one, am opposed to the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the hon. gentleman concludes his remarks, I should like to ask him whether in the construction of this road from Brantford to Woodstock, it is possible to construct it upon any line, no matter how crooked, without connecting with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway or the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo? Must it not necessarily connect with one or other of those three lines?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I am glad the hon. gentleman has called my attention to the point, and I ask him to look at what the Bill really is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not disputing his statement as to what the Bill contains, but I am asking whether the line could be constructed between those points without connecting with the three lines mentioned.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto).—Certainly it could. Connecting with a line of railway is very different from going to one side of a town and connecting with a line of railway on the opposite side of the town. For instance, the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo, runs through the city of Brantford, but the western side of Brantford is not touched by the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo at all. The Grand Trunk Railway runs through the city of Brantford, but this Bill does not provide that the line is to commence at the city of Brantford at a point which will connect it with either of these railways. It does not provide either, that the line is to pass through the city of Woodstock so as to connect with either of the railways there. In other words, it may start at a point in or near the city of Brantford, a mile away from either of these other railways, and run to the city of Woodstock to a point a mile or more distant from any of the railways in the city of Woodstock, and it need not cross any line of railway whatever. It is perfectly true, as I pointed out, that the map which was produced for the purpose of promoting the Bill showed that it was proposed to cross the line of the Grand Trunk Railway at Eastwood, near Woodstock, but there is nothing obligatory about that being done. We do not know how far that map portrays what is to be done or what is not to be done, or even if it is the intention at present to construct in that way. There is nothing committing the company constructing this line of railway to build it at all on that line, and it is quite open to them to start at a point a mile or two away from any railway, at a point in or near Brantford and carry it, without crossing any line of railway, to Woodstock, and there have its terminus a mile or more distant from any line of railway in that city. I think, under these circumstances, it is the height of folly to say that this work is one for the general advantage of Canada.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—I do not rise to object to what the hon. gentleman has said; on the contrary, I think that he is perfectly right, but it seems to me that it is useless to make a speech without presenting a motion. He should move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months. I think that is the only practical solution of the matter.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I was contemplating a motion, and with the permission of the House. I now move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Béique, that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to make that motion, because he had made his speech and another hon. member had spoken before he presented his motion.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I only made the motion because I was asked to do so. It is quite open to reject the Bill by a vote on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I think I have a right to explain. I did not make a speech, but merely made a suggestion to the hon. gentleman, and I think that my hon. friend ought not to insist that the hon. gentleman is debarred from making the motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He can find another hon. gentleman who will make it for him.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman from Toronto was interrupted in his speech. A question was put to him if he moved the six months' hoist, and I consider his motion is in order.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. gentleman sat down.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Has the hon. Speaker decided that the hon. gentleman is in order in rising the second time after he had resumed his seat ?

The SPEAKER—Yes, as the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) was only interrupted by a question from the honourable senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. De Boucherville).

Hon. Mr. WILSON—While perhaps in some particulars I might agree with the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr), yet we have been going on for some length of time in our present practice, and it seems very strange that the hon. gentleman on this occasion should make objection to the Bill. If my hon. friend had always taken the same view, and had pursued this course in bygone days, if he had always maintained that the legislatures of the provinces should have absolute jurisdiction and control over measures of this kind, I could understand his course on this occasion. If my hon. friend has become converted, if he has abandoned his former ways of sin and wrong-doing, and if he now considers it necessary to offer this motion as a peace-offering for his previous conduct, we would expect to hear him state that he had been wrong in the past, and that he has become converted to the principles of provincial rights. We know that my hon. friend has a record in reference to provincial rights. We are well aware that not many years ago, not only here, but in the Railway Committee, he uttered strong and unrestrained language in reference to the rights of the province in regard to a certain Bill being passed, authorizing the construction of a road from Toronto to Hamilton. He held forth, as he always does when he advocates any measure, in strong and forcible language, maintaining that it was right on that occasion that a charter should be granted to the Toronto and Hamilton Railway. We all know full well that the course he took did not meet with the approbation of the people of Toronto. We know that the government organ at that time proclaimed that he was sacrificing instead of representing the just interests of the people of Toronto and of the muncipalities between Toronto and Hamilton. Has that anything to do with his conversion on this occasion ? Does he wish to make amends to the government organ, and let that organ know that the views he entertained previously are not the views he now holds ? Perhaps he fears that the lash or the whip that was used on that occasion might be brought into play at the present time, and he dreads its application. He has given us no reason why he has changed his view, and given us no just cause why he should oppose this measure. What is the position of this road ? It is certainly more intimately connected with the railroads between Woodstock and Brantford than was the case with the railroad between Toronto and Hamilton. We know that at both Brantford and Woodstock the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and also another road from Port Burwell are connected, and this road must of necessity —and it is a steam road, too—make more or less connection with these various roads. Can he pretend to say that it is not in the interests of the Dominion of Canada that this road be enabled to make connection with those other lines ? If there ever was a road to which it is in the interest of the Dominion of Canada to grant a charter, I maintain this is one that really is entitled to that distinction. Has the hon. gentleman shown you that it is not entitled to that distinction ? I think he has not.

Let us turn to the road which he advocated in August and September, 1903. He fathered that road and advocated its construction—and, of course, he would do nothing which was not just and fair and in the interests of the province. The Act is intituled :

An Act to incorporate the Toronto and Hamilton Railway.

And it provides :

The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and a half inches from a point in or near the city of Toronto.

The hon. gentleman objects to the expression ' In or near Brantford.' He claims that it is not right to use that expression ; but it was perfectly right to use the words ' in or near Toronto in the county of York, to some point in or near the city of Hamilton.'

Mark you, to some point 'in or near the city of Hamilton'—the very words he now objects to. This Bill was a virtuous Bill, it had a foster-parent who really considered it drawn to perfection; and no doubt his fatherly care over the Bill rendered it fit to pass the House on that occasion. The Act continues:

In the county of Wentworth, passing through the counties of York, Peel, Halton and Wentworth, in the province of Ontario, but nothing in this Act shall authorize or empower the company to lay out or construct any railway track upon or along any portion of Burlington Beach in the said county of Wentworth without the consent of the municipal corporations of the townships of Saltfleet and Nelson.

What was this road? Was it a steam road? Was it a road in the interest and for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada? No, nothing of the kind. They had the right to use steam only for the construction of the road, and after that it was to be an electrical road, —an electrical road, mark you, not a steam road as this road is, but an electrical road, to be operated entirely by electricity. Would not hon. gentlemen agree with me in saying that the use of electricity should pertain more especially to the jurisdiction of provincial authorities, because the company intended to draw their power from the Niagara Power Company. Yet that road was then declared to be for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada. The road now applying for a charter is a steam road, but it is not, according to the hon. gentleman's opinion, a work for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen will see that the Act in regard to the Toronto and Hamilton Railway provides that steam may be used for the purposes of constructing the said railway, but shall not be used as a motive power for its operation. Here we had a clause inserted whereby this road could not be run by steam but must be run in future by electricity. The Bill in question was introduced—no doubt by the hon. gentleman—in the latter part of September; it was read the first time on the 27th of September, on the motion of my hon. friend. The second reading of this measure—Bill (147) 'An Act to incorporate the Toronto and Hamilton Railway Company,' was moved by the hon. gentleman for Toronto (Mr. Kerr); and we find that the hon. Mr. McMullen, ever watchful, ever careful of the interests of the province of Ontario, according to my hon. friend's idea, raised objection and stated that were it not for the adjournment, which might delay the Bill, he would object to it altogether. He said that the Bill was absolutely and entirely local in its character and should be dealt with by the province. Where was my hon. friend, who now appeals so strongly for provincial rights, on that occasion? Was he expressing the views on that occasion that he gives utterance to now? He has been, as I said before, converted from the views which he entertained in 1903 to the views that he expresses now, in 1905. Which of those are the correct view? Which view will he be found to advocate to-morrow? I know not if I am to judge by what I read in the debates. The hon. leader of the opposition made some remarks pertaining to the question when it came up in 1903, and we find that some other members also spoke on that occasion. We find the hon. gentleman from Kingston objecting to the Bill. We find the hon. gentleman who is now in the chair (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) saying:

It seems to me the view expressed by the hon. gentleman from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) does not cover the whole doctrine.

My hon. friend from Belleville took the view that it was right and proper that the provinces should have control of this matter. We also find the Hon. Mr. Béique speaking in reference to this very Bill. He said:

Will the hon. member from Belleville permit me to ask him if this is a railway crossing the Grand Trunk Railway?

The hon. mover of this motion (Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto) did not allow the hon. gentleman to answer the question. He said distinctly 'yes.' Will he tell me what line the railway as laid out in this case crosses. He, for instance, tells us in 1903 that the road from Toronto to Hamilton was to cross the Grand Trunk Railway. He objects to-day to making any statement as to crossings because the road is not built yet. He says: 'How do we know that it will cross either the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific Railway?' How did he know in 1903 that the road which he was contending for was going to cross any other roads? He knew nothing of the kind, yet he insisted upon the passing of the Bill. Further on in the debate the hon. gentleman from Toronto said (page 1022, 'Hansard,' 1903):

Perhaps it is due to this House that I should say a word or two with reference to this Bill.

I did not anticipate there would be any opposition.

Neither did the mover of this Bill to-day expect there would be any opposition. He did not for a moment suppose that the opposition would come from the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr). But surprises will never cease. We are surprised on this occasion, and no doubt he was surprised on that occasion. He said :

The Bill is an important one. I did not understand the hon. member from Belleville to say that by giving the Bill a second reading the principle of it was adopted.

He was anxious that the Bill should be rushed through and sent to the committee, and he doubtless hoped he would get it through the committee in the same manner. He continues :

On the contrary my understanding of what he said was that it was not a recognition of the principle of the Bill and that the committee was quite able to deal with that matter when we sent it to the committee, or the House could, on its return, deal with the principle of the Bill. That being so, I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Kingston to the fact that the Bill is, after all, only a very short one.

It was a short one and could not do much harm—such a little Bill, and therefore the suggestion was made this honourable body should let the Bill pass, it being such a little Bill. It appears he thought more of the size of the Bill than he did of the violation of the constitutional principle he is advocating to-day. He adds :

There is very little in it—

A Bill depriving the province of its rights, depriving the municipalities of their rights, a Bill trenching upon the constitutional right and prerogative of the province of Ontario, is a little Bill, has very little in it, and therefore it should be permitted to pass.

There is very little in it,—permission to build a railway—and I am quite sure from what I know of the hon. member for Kingston, it would not take him very many minutes to see all that there is in it.

No doubt he expected to influence the hon. member from Kingston by saying it was to give 'permission to build a railway.' Why did he want to emphasize the word railway ? Because he wanted the Senate to understand it was a steam railway, in the interest and for the benefit of Canada, when he knew perfectly well that it was an electric road, and that they could not use steam at all except merely for the purpose of constructing the road. Further on he says :

I want to emphasize the word 'railway'—To build a railway from Toronto to Hamilton.

He says to-day there is ample railway accommodation from Brantford to Woodstock. Was there no railway accommodation from Toronto to Hamilton ? Were they such benighted people in that locality that they were obliged to transport all their freight by wagons, and people had to travel on foot ? I have always understood that the country between Hamilton and Toronto is a gridiron of railways ; and that it possesses every facility for transportation. He says :

It is designed to be a main through railway from Toronto to Hamilton, crossing the Grand Trunk Railway near Burlington Beach.

Had he a right to say that they would cross the Grand Trunk Railway near Burlington Beach ? Did they not have a proviso in the Bill that they should not run across Burlington Beach unless they got permission from the corporation ? It was only on that condition they could cross into the city of Hamilton. He says :

The impression is that it is an electric tramway.

Read the Bill and ascertain what it says. Was not the fact stated distinctly that it was to be an electric railway and not a steam railway. He says :

It is designed to be a main through railway from Toronto to Hamilton, crossing the Grand Trunk Railway near Burlington Beach, and crossing at Burlington Beach with the permission of the municipality, if that can be obtained, and which no doubt can be obtained of the townships of Saltfleet and Nelson, and to a point connecting with the other two roads leading from there to Niagara Falls.

Now, to-day, we find the people of Brantford and Woodstock both desiring and asking for this road. I ask my hon. friend where was the mayor and the corporation of the city of Toronto at the time he was introducing his Bill. They were bitterly opposed to it, and did everything in their power to prevent it passing. The 'Globe', the leading newspaper of Toronto, denounced his scheme in the strongest terms. Was it the opposition of the 'Globe' on that occasion which converted him ? It is an old saying that people may be converted—may change their mind, and even the hymns convey the impression that it is never to late to mend. The city of Toronto, through its mayor opposing the Bill, ought to have brought to my hon. friend's mind the fact that it was a Bill entirely within the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario ; and I might say here in passing, that I am favourable to the protection of provincial rights and strongly a believer in making application to the local legislatures for such powers as are now being asked. Yet on this occasion, after going on as we have been going, and with the precedent established by my hon. friend from Toronto in 1903, when by his eloquence he converted this honourable House to his views, why should we not say that we have a right to pass this Bill and that it would be an injustice to the people concerned if we did not pass it. On the occasion to which I have referred he says :

I may add, all the opposition to this Bill was excited by the action taken by the city council of Toronto.

There was no other opposition—when nearly every municipality between Toronto and Hamilton raised objections, and sent their delegates here to oppose that Bill. I would here say that I am surprised that we should, on this occasion, have this opposition to contend with. I might refer also to what the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) said on that occasion, as well as my hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen). Nearly every hon. gentleman who spoke on that occasion very strongly condemned the passing of that Bill. Now is it right, are we justified on this occasion, when it is desired to construct a road from Brantford to Woodstock, through one of the finest sections of Canada, where prosperity prevails on every hand, and people are progressive and enterprising, to suddenly check the construction of a railway which would do so much good and be for the general benefit of the Dominion of Canada. While I am in favour of provincial rights, I hope this honourable House will not hesitate a moment in saying we have a right to grant this charter, because the people require the road. The only opposition to it is from my hon. friend from Toronto ; nobody else has raised any objection. He raised the objection in committee, and he is raising it again on the floor of this House. He says the people of Brantford and Woodstock shall not have the road, if he can prevent it, and he has moved the six months hoist with a view to slaughtering the Bill. Is that fair treatment? Like himself, when the opposition arose to his Bill, I may say this opposition was entirely unexpected. Had the people of Woodstock and Brantford known it was coming they would have had representatives here to meet the objection. I hope this honourable House will see its way clearly to giving this Bill its third reading and placing it upon the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—My hon. friend from St. Thomas is entirely mistaken when he says that only my hon. friend from Toronto is opposed to the passage of this Bill. He has administered quite a castigation to my hon. friend from Toronto, but he has not made any statement as to the wrong principle upon which this Bill will be passed if it is granted. His speech has been simply on these lines. that parliament has sinned for many years, and that my hon. friend from Toronto sinned once. He wants him to sin again because he has sinned once, and he wants parliament to sin again because parliament has sinned on many occasions. A refusal to pass this Bill today would not at all hinder the company obtaining a charter ; but there is a proper place for the promoters to apply for legislation and that is the legislature of the province in which the railway is to be constructed. I have always been opposed to legislation of this kind, and I hold firmly to the view that parliament should lay down some principle as to its legislation in regard to railways and all other matters, and adhere strictly to that principle. In my judgment it is entirely wrong to come to this parliament for a charter to construct a small local railway, when legislation can be obtained at Toronto, which is much nearer to the locality interested. Supposing an application should come from British Columbia, for the construction of a small local line there, how many members of parliament would know anything about the locality through which it would be constructed? We should simply have to pass the Bill on the general principle which we have been following. It is time for parliament to call a halt. These insignificant Bills should be left to the local legislatures and shoud not be dealt with by this parliament on the ground that they are for the general advantage of Canada. My hon.

friend from St. Thomas says that this is a work for the benefit of Canada. All Bills passed are for the benefit of Canada ; every man who works in this country is working for the benefit of Canada, but the principle involved in this declaration that the work is for the advantage of Canada is quite another matter. It means that everything pertaining to that railway comes within the jurisdiction of the central government and not of the provincial government. The principle is absolutely wrong, and I for one protest strongly against it and will protest against every such Bill that may be introduced here.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I desire to say a few words in answer to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas. I must say at first it did not appeal to me as a reason why we should pass this Bill, that a Bill which should not have become law had been passed in a previous session ; but in answer to the attack which has just been made on the hon. gentleman from Toronto, I may say I have a distinct recollection that the reason assigned why the Toronto and Hamilton Railway should be regarded as being within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, was that they were to use electricity from Niagara Falls, and it would be the means of testing, in the public interest and for the general advantage of Canada, the use of electricty on a large scale for railway purposes, and also of the practicability of transmitting electricity for that purpose from the Falls to Toronto. That reason, when it was assigned, appealed to my mind to a very considerable extent. It was a reason why the work should be declared a work for the general advantage of Canada. Then there was another reason why that Bill, as the law then stood, should be declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, because it was intended to cross the Grand Trunk Railway. At the time the new Railway Act had not been passed, and under the operation of the old Railway Act from 1888 to 1903, it was provided that all railways crossing or connecting with the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other railway, declared to be under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, were ipso facto declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada. Therefore this was a peremptory reason, from the fact that it was intended to connect with or cross the Grand Trunk Railway, for making the declaration. But it is not the question now as to whether the Bill passed in 1903 should have been passed or not ; the question before us is whether this Bill comes within the jurisdiction of this parliament. Now let me call your attention to what I believe to be the proper view which should be taken of this question. Section 92 of the British North America Act defines the classes of subjects respecting which the local legislatures may exclusively make laws, and enumerates them. In subsection 10, the local legislatures are given exclusive jurisdiction to legislate for local works and undertakings, with certain exceptions. It will not be denied that this is a local work. It is a local work from the fact that it is situated entirely within the province, and therefore we have to see whether it can be brought within any of the exceptions. The first exception is 'lines of railway connecting the province with any other province or extending beyond the limits of the province.' It cannot be claimed that it is such a railway. Then 'such works as, although wholly situate within the province are, before or after their execution'—and I draw your attention to the words—'declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.' The imperial parliament, when enacting this constitutional Act, had to pass an Act for perpetual application, and they felt it was unfair to deny the parliament of Canada the right of asserting its jurisdiction, and therefore limited the jurisdiction of the provinces when the interest was declared to be an interest for the general advantage of Canada. What shows the intention very clearly to my mind is that they provided that this declaration might be made, not necessarily when the company was incorporated, but after the works had been commenced, at any time when it was shown that it was to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. Now it is not for the hon. member from Toronto to show that it is not a work for the general advantage of Canada; it would have been for the hon. member from St. Thomas, or for the promoter of the Bill to give us a sound reason why this parliament should assert its jurisdiction over this railway and oust the province of Ontario from its exclusive jurisdiction under section 92 of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Might I ask the hon. member was it shown in the case of the Toronto and Hamilton Railway Bill, that it was for the benefit of Canada ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As far as that Bill was concerned, I myself raised the objection, but I was satisfied for the two reasons which I have mentioned, first, because at that time, under the law as it stood, from the fact that it was intented to cross the Grand Trunk Railway, it was declared a work for the general advantage of Canada, and second, because of the test which was intended to be made of the transmission of electric power. Therefore, in my humble judgment it is unbecoming on the part of this parliament, to assume jurisdiction when that jurisdiction is not intended to apply under the terms and spirit of the British North America Act. If we do it in this case, we may do it in all cases. We may be asked to incorporate companies for manufacturing shoes, or supplying electric light. This parliament has done so in the case of the city of Quebec, has incorporated a local company exclusively for the purpose of vending electric light in the city of Quebec, declaring it to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. To my mind it is a gross abuse of power. Let me call attention to an additional point. I have shown that it is an assumption of power contrary to the letter and spirit of the British North America Act, but I go further; I say it is contrary to the Railway Act of 1903, section 7 of which is as follows :

> Every railway, steam or electric street railway or tramway, the construction or operation of which is authorized by a special Act passed by the legislature of any province, now or hereafter connecting with or crossing a railway which at the time of such connection or crossing, is subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada in respect only to such connection or crossing or to through traffic thereon or anything appertaining thereto, and also to the provisions set forth in this Act relating to offences and penalties, navigable waters and criminal matters, and this Act shall apply to that extent only.
> 2. This section shall not, however, operate as regards through traffic on railways owned by any provincial government, without the consent of such government.

When we considered this Railway Act, the Senate came into conflict with the House of Commons. We came to the conclusion that it was advisable to go back as far as 1888 and adopt a new principle, and to disregard the principle which had been applied up to that time, and to treat those railways merely as local railways—to treat the connection or crossing and that part only, as a work for the general advantage of Canada, and for the purpose of dealing with through traffic. This is the principle. We did revert on that occasion to the true principle of the Constitutional Act, and now, if we were to pass this Bill as well as other Bills, we would be again departing from the principle which we applied in 1903, and reverting again to the old Act of 1888. For my part, I am perfectly indifferent to this Bill. I do not doubt that it is a railway which should be constructed, but if it should be constructed, the proper authority to grant a charter is not the parliament of Canada, but the legislature of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the constitutional aspect of the Bill. I have no doubt we all fully appreciate the position taken by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) that he has always been consistent on every occasion, on the question of provincial rights and matters pertaining to the local legislatures, and the same remark applies to the hon. gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards), but some other hon. gentlemen are not consistent in that regard. What I do object to is the selecting of a Bill near the end of the term during which Bills are introduced in this House to demonstrate the great principle that underlies the legislation of this House. We have had numerous Bills before us this session, providing for undertakings which are just as much provincial works as this proposed railway is, and no objection has been taken. In fact the gentlemen who are opposing this Bill on high and lofty principles, supported similar Bills. We passed the Niagara-Welland Power Company Bill, and it was supported by the hon. gentleman who moved the six-months hoist to-day. We gave these people power to build an electrical railway seven miles in length. The hon. gentleman thought it was all right to give it at that time, but now, because the applicants are asking authority to build a line of railway crossing the Grand Trunk Railway, as shown in the plan, which I think has something to do with the——

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—What Bill does the hon. gentleman refer to ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The Niagara Power Company Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I absolutely opposed that Bill in the committee on the very ground I have taken to-day.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I will not repeat a private conversation. I say there was no motion made in this House on those grounds, and that Bill was passed this session. I might go back to numerous Bills passed this session as much provincial in their character as this very Bill. There is a Bill passed this session—if the measure I have referred to does not suit the hon. gentleman —local in its character and introduced by the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr)—Bill (39) giving power to build a line of railway, 'An Act respecting the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company,' which gives them power to build a few miles along the beach—additional powers to build along the Burlington Beach.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That Bill was relating to a company already within the jurisdiction of parliament.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes, and giving them power to build along the beach.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To which the municipalities were all opposed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes. I say it is not fair at this stage of the Bill to raise the objection that has been urged. I know a number of gentlemen who are paying attention to this Bill, who are in business in Brantford and Woodstock, who are bona fide applying for the charter and intend to build the road; and I say it would not be fair to throw out the Bill. It has been taken for granted that as similar charters have been granted by this Parliament, these people were perfectly justified in coming and asking for this legislation so far as the rights of the province are concerned. If the hon. gentlemen who speak so strongly in favour of this proposition will rise in this House and move a resolution laying down a strict rule that only certain legislation shall be passed here, and that Bills that are entirely within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature shall not be considered here, I shall support the resolution ; but I decidedly object to any gentleman, for any particular reason he may have of his own, rising here and seeking to obstruct legislation of this character. For that reason I ask the House to give this Bill the third reading as well as any other Bills similarly situated that may come before us.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I think I am entitled to answer the hon. gentleman for a few moments——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to speak. He moved an amendment and exhausted his right.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I have no special interest in the matter now under consideration, but I think this discussion is going to lead to some good in the end. I have frequently stood up here in years gone by to oppose the system of placing in Bills providing for works of a local character the statement that such are for the general advantage of Canada, and I think we are quite justified now in opposing this Bill on that account. How can we say that works of such a character as this are for the general advantage of Canada ? The road is confined to a very small section of the province and does not extend beyond some 30 or 40 miles. It may be of local advantage to the people in that particular section, but cannot be said to be for the general advantage of Canada. I believe this parliament and this Senate ought to pass a resolution against applying that expression to works of a local character. We find Bills which are for works of a purely local character containing that clause, and the object of placing such a clause in the Act is that the promoters may have a claim on the government of Canada for a subsidy which they would not perhaps be otherwise entitled to if the work were incorporated by the provincial legislature and not by the parliament of Canada. The subsidy which they acquire in that way is oftener for the benefit of the promoters themselves than for the general interest of the Dominion. The present discussion has shown that there is some desire to do away with that abuse, as I may call it, of legislation, and that if a motion of that kind were now made to do away with the use of the expression in Bills of this nature, it would now receive more support than when in the past I ventured to give expression to such views. Under these circumstances I shall give my support to the motion which has been made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, and I hope that it may lead to something more than is embraced in the motion which the hon. gentleman has now moved—that it may be the means of doing away with the abuse which the parliament of Canada is led into by giving its sanction to that declaration in the case of a work of a purely local nature.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume it will require no argument to establish the fact that this Bill would be quite within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, and if the motion were made in the beginning of the session it would certainly have my hearty concurrence, and I am quite sure probably the concurrence of many hon. gentlemen who may feel inclined, under the circumstances in which this question is now presented to us, to vote contrary to what their judgment would have been had the course been adopted at the beginning of the session. Parliament has been availing itself of a right under the British North America Act to declare any work for the general advantage of Canada, in that way securing jurisdiction over the undertaking. It is not wise to carry the principle to the extreme length it has been carried in the past, but we ought at least to be consistent in our proceedings and therefore it seems rather singular that this particular Bill should be singled out as a sacrifice to the principle when other Bills of a similar character have been allowed to pass. This measure has passed the House of Commons, and possibly the same question was asked there. However, it came to the Senate and in the early stages no objection was taken to it on that ground. It went to committee and the question was raised there, but it was claimed that as there were other similar Bills which had already been passed by the committee it would be simply a mark of caprice for the committee to single out this particular Bill for sacrifice. That is the only justification, that we ought at least to be consistent in our legislation. I feel that it would be noted as a mark of very extraordinary caprice to change our practice in this instance after passing other Bills of this kind—and probably we will later on pass others also—I think there are two others on the order paper for to-day. It would seem unfair after the parties have gone to some expense, as no doubt they have, in obtaining the legislation, for the Senate to capriciously say 'we will throw out those Bills.' I do not think it would be dignified or proper to do so. This is not the time to take exception. It should be taken after the initiative stage of the Bill. When the Bill passes its second reading we concede that the principle of the Bill has been adopted by the chamber, and it would be an extremely unusual thing to adopt a proposition of this kind at the final stage unless we are prepared to adopt it in all other cases. It is too late, however, in my judgment, to rectify our—I won't say errors, but our impropriety in allowing measures of this kind to pass. I hope most sincerely that the Senate at the beginning of the next session will adopt a resolution to rigorously exclude from consideration any provincial Act—any Act that fairly comes within the jurisdiction of the province. It will have my hearty support, as I am quite sure it will have the unanimous support of the House, but I think it would be a mark of caprice and would be regrettable if at this particular stage, when the Bill is on the order paper for third reading, we should offer it as a sacrifice to this feeling.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I do not want to vote on this Bill without knowing what I am voting for. I have strong opinions about incorporated companies and the powers which they should and should not have. I would give no powers to any company that I would not give to an individual. I have no objection to any clause in the Bill except the 8th, and I wish to understand what that clause means. The clause reads as follows :

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one half inches from a point at or near the city of Brantford, through the townships of Brantford, Burford East, Oxford and Blandford, to a point at or near the city of Woodstock.

What I want to know is, have they the power without going to the city of Brantford, to lay out the road either on public or private property? Does the Bill give them the power of expropriation?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not expropriation of a public highway. They cannot intrude on a public highway, although they can cross it.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—Can they expropriate private property?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is in the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, all railways have the same power.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—If it is in the Railway Act there is no objection. They have no power except what is given them in the Railway Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT. No.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—If there was no declaration in this Bill that the work is an undertaking for the general advantage of Canada, nobody would deny that the other provisions of the measure are provincial and that the Bill is essentially a provincial Bill, and the question is whether this declaration will make it a Dominion measure. If that declaration on the face of the Bill is false and bears the mark of fraud, and is contradicted by all the other provisions of the Bill, then I think we should not be deceived by it. If I am convinced in my conscience and judgment that this declaration is false and is contradicted by all the other provisions of the Bill, then it would appear that this clause has been put in expressly for the purpose of making this Bill a federal measure, that it is contradicted by clause 8, which reads:

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches from a point at or near the city of Brantford, through the townships of Brantford, Burford East, Oxford and Blandford, or a point at or near the city of Woodstock.

Does this clause not contradict clause 2 and show that it is a provincial railway? If so, I do not see how the Senate can consent to be deceived by a false and fraudulent declaration. If we pass this Bill what is the result? I attach some importance to what has been said by the hon. Secretary of State. If I were convinced I would do harm to those who are interested in this Bill, and that I would do an injustice by voting against it, I do not know what course I should take. I would not wish to do harm to anybody, but at the same time the parties interested have been notified and they know very well the position the Senate has taken.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—They must have lawyers who know the constitution. For the past two years, since I have had the honour of a seat in this Chamber, it cannot be stated that I have not protested on each occasion when a measure of this kind came before the House. I do not, however, pretend to be strong enough to have my opinion prevail in this House, and I have said many times that if the members of the province of Ontario do not deem it proper to protect their own interests, it is not necessary that I should show more zeal than they, but when such measures come from Quebec I have been in the habit of moving amendments. But now some hon. members from Ontario have decided to put an end to such legislation, and I intend to vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman from Toronto. It is said that it is too late to take such action because other Bills of a like nature have been passed; but if we must vote for this Bill because other Bills of the same kind have been adopted, the argument next year or two years hence will be much stronger. If we must vote for the Bill on account of that argument this year, we will be still more obliged to vote for such measures next year, because the argument will have more application, so that every year there will be less reason to oppose such Bills. I think the time has come for the Senate to take action now, and for that reason I will vote for the motion.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I claim the right to reply which the rule give me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to reply.

The SPEAKER—I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to rule 21.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I know the rule, but this is not a substantive motion. He has no right to reply where he moves an amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman will refer to page 470 of Bourinot, he will see that it is stated distinctly that an hon. member who has moved an amendment cannot reply. The hon. gentleman claimed the right but he has no right. If he asks it as a favour, it is a different matter. Bourinot says :

A member who has already spoken to a question has no right to rise again and propose an amendment or the adjournment of the House, or of the debate, though he may speak again to those new questions, when they are moved by other members (u). For the same reason a member who has moved the adjournment of the debate which has been negatived cannot speak to the original question (v). A member who has moved or seconded the adjournment of the debate can afterwards rise to move the adjournment of the House (w). And as a member who moves an adjournment cannot speak again, so a member who speaks in seconding an amendment, is equally unable to speak again upon the original question, after the amendment has been withdrawn, or otherwise disposed of.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And at page 469, Bourinot says :

No member may speak twice to a question, except in explanation of a material part of the speech, in which he may have been misconceived, but then he is not allowed to introduce new matter. A reply is allowed to a member who has made a substantive motion to the House, but not to any member who has moved an order of the day, an amendment, the previous question, or an instruction to a committee.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I will withdraw the reply so as to have no question about it. There is another way of getting at it.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote :

The Bill was then read the third time.

On the passing,

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I desire to take this opportunity to say a word or two in furtherance of the view I have that this Bill should not now pass, and by way of clearing the atmosphere, perhaps I may be permitted to say that it does not appear to me to be a matter of any moment at all in dealing with this Bill, whether I was or was not inconsistent in the course I have pursued here as compared with the course I pursued on a former occasion. But the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas failed to appreciate the difference between the two cases, and I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman just wherein they differ. The Toronto and Hamilton Railway was an exceptional case which might fairly have been claimed to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, not only for the two reasons mentioned by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) a moment ago, but also for other reasons, one of which was that it crosses a Dominion canal. The Railway Act did not apply to such a case as that, and the province could give no authority or power to cross a canal which was a work vested in the Dominion and under Dominion control. In addition to that it crosses the Grand Trunk Railway, and as the law then stood it became, by virtue of that fact, a work for the general advantage of Canada. These are the two reasons, apart from the general consideration that it was a railway between two large and important cities and that it was a work which was of very great advantage from a scientific standpoint to the whole Dominion. In addition to that I may say that the power at Niagara Falls is being generated and other preparations are being made. The right of way for the road has been secured, but a difficulty in the way of the construction of the line existed in the fact that under the very clause read by the hon. gentleman the work could not be constructed across the Desjardins canal without the consent of the two townships named in the section of the Act, and the consent of both those townships was withheld until quite recently—within the last week or two—so that it interfered with the construction of the road. I may also call attention to the fact that although at one time the corporation of the city of Toronto——

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Does it state that it is to cross the canal ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I stated it could not cross the canal at that time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Did the Bill say so ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Certainly the Bill said so ; it provided that it could not be built without the consent of the two townships.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The point is, did the Bill state that it was to go from a certain point ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes, but it said more than that—it was not to cross Burlington Beach without the consent of the municipal corporations of Saltfleet and Nelson, one being the township on one side of the canal and the other the township on the other side of the canal. With that consent the Railway Department can give power to cross the canal, but the province could not give that power. Then again it was said that the mayor and corporation of Toronto opposed that Bill, and that I was on that occasion interfering with their rights. If the hon. gentleman had been candid enough to read the whole of the observations made there, he would have found it stated, as the fact was, that the Bill was consented to by the corporation of the city of Toronto at the conclusion of the contest in the committee room of the House of Commons, so that I was not acting in opposition to the mayor and corporation of Toronto, but in accordance with the agreement made between them and the promoters of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Will the hon. gentleman state when the consent of Mayor Urquhart was obtained sanctioning the Bill as passed through the House ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Before I made my observations in the Senate. It was done at the meeting of the committee in the other House, before the Bill came to this House at all. I may say in addition that there was another reason why legislation was sought here. By section 8 of that Act provision is made for the purchase and amalgamation of several other roads, two of which were within the jurisdiction of this parliament. This power could not have been given by the Ontario legislature, those railways having been incorporated by the Dominion and being within Dominion control; so that for these various reasons, as well as those mentioned by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) there is a distinction between that Bill and the Bill now before the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to a previous debate. He is seeking to answer arguments used in a previous debate. If he can give reasons why this Bill should not pass we will be glad to hear him, but so far he has not offered a single reason why this Bill should not pass. My point is, he is referring to a previous debate.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman has a right to try and convince the majority of the Senate. He wants to change their minds and persuade them to vote contrary to the way they did, and I suppose he is entitled to some latitude.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto). I was only endeavouring to point out that the reasons which were given by the hon. gentleman for the Bill passing——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not know that I can undertake to convince the hon. gentleman. I have said all I want to say from the personal point of view. I am endeavouring to give a reason why I thought I was not open to the charge of inconsistency and why I was consistent in saying that this Bill should not have been read the third time, and why it should not now pass. If the Bill is one which is within the authority of the provincial legislature, it is one that should be dealt with by that legislature. If the Bill is not one which should be declared to be one for the general advantage of Canada, then this Bill, which contains such a declaration, should not pass, and in discussing the subject it is a matter of no moment what action may have been taken with reference to a previous measure, although I think I have a right to assert that in dealing with that other measure, the position which I then took was for the reasons which I have stated, perfectly consistent. The case being totally different from the one we are now considering, I was perfectly right in taking the course I did.

The Bill passed.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (73) An Act to incorporate La Compagnie du Chemin de fer Montréal, Quebec et du Sud.—(Hon. Mr. Choquette.)

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading Bill (90) An Act respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This is a Bill which relates to the sale of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Two documents purporting to be petitions were presented to this House, one by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, praying to be authorized to purchase, and another purporting to be from the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, which the Standing Orders Committee felt they could not accept as a petition, inasmuch as it was not sealed by the corporation in question as the rules of the House require. Rule 37 provides:

No petition is received from any corporation aggregate unless it be duly authenticated by the seal of such corporation.

Upon examining this petition the Standing Orders Committee found that the seal of the corporation was not attached. Further, it was signed by the solicitor of the company, who had been instructed by wire to sign the petition and have it presented to the House. In looking at the authorities I find in Bourinot, page 347, that 'A petition forwarded by telegraph cannot be received, inasmuch as it has no real signature attached to it.' This Bill therefore, has had one petition presented to the House in proper order, the petition of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The other petition, or what purports to be one, was not passed upon by the Standing Orders Committee, because we considered it informal. The trouble arises from our practice here in not having some one to supervise these petitions when presented and see that they comply with the rules of the House. We took it, in the Standing Orders Committee that it was our duty, inasmuch as this did not seem to be a petition, not having the seal of the corporation, not to report upon it. Now I come to a further stage in our procedure. Under rule 59 the Senate is probably going to refer this Bill to the Standing Orders Committee. You can see that our committee would then be in a very unusual position. We have already the petition of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, praying for the purchase, which is in proper order, and I think it is for this House to decide whether that petition is sufficient to proceed with on this Bill. I do not see how the Standing Orders Committee can deal with the Bill when it cannot deal with the petition that preceded it. I would ask advice from this House whether the Standing Orders Committee would be justified in ignoring what occurred with reference to this other petition, simply taking the Bill and seeing whether it complies with the notices without reference to what has occurred in the past. We would not take any action on it unless we were advised by this House, after laying the matter before you for your consideration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose the Bill passed through the House of Commons ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes, but that will not help it. I have both petitions here and if any one wishes to see them, will be pleased to show them, so that the House may know exactly the circumstances of the case.

The SPEAKER—Has the Chairman reported upon those petitions ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We have reported on one, but not on the other.

The SPEAKER—But there is no Bill passed upon that petition ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes, this is what you might call a double-barrelled Bill. The practice in this case is somewhat different from what has arisen in the case of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canada Atlantic Bills. In that case there were two Bills introduced, one on each petition, one empowering one company to buy, and the other empowering the other company to sell, but in this case it is intended that one Bill shall serve both objects.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—If it will meet the case I will move that the Order of the Day be discharged. As the hon. gentleman from Killarney has explained, this is a Bill authorizing the Canadian Pacific Railway to buy and the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway to sell. As I understood, they both sent down petitions. They started to obtain this legislation late in the session, and the matter was arranged by wire. This is not the Bill originally presented under those petitions, but is one which was substituted for it in the House of Commons. It is an entirely different Bill, and is to remove an objection in case of an infringement of a provincial right to taxation of lands, and it was found necessary to substitute these clauses for the clauses in the former Bill. I am not seized of the facts referred to by my hon. friend, but if it will facilitate matters we can postpone the Order of the Day until to-morrow. If the objection which has been raised is fatal, it would be quite easy to procure from Victoria a properly authenticated petition of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway in the course of a few days. There would be no difficulty whatever in obtaining the petition and no harm would be done, if the Senate takes the view that the petition already presented is not a proper one.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is just possible a regular petition may be on its way, because the parties interested were notified that this petition was not according to the rules of the House.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday the sixteenth May.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWARD NORMAN LEWIS RELIEF BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (142) An Act for the relief of Edward Norman Lewis, a member of the House of Commons.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

He said: Mr. Lewis represents the riding of West Huron. After he was elected and had taken his seat in the House of Commons it was discovered that he was on the bond of one Thomas Gunby, a contractor for carrying the mails between the post office and the Grand Trunk depot at Goderich. The amount received daily for carrying the mails was 7¾ cents for the double trip, not a very large financial transaction; nevertheless, it came within the purview of an Act of parliament, which imposes very heavy penalties on a member who becomes elected and takes a seat while he holds a contract or acts as security in connection with a contract with the government. Many instances of this kind have occurred, when parties inadvertently have forgotten about the signing of a contract which is of a very insignificant character, and, as a rule, parliament has relieved the party of the consequences.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DOMINION ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (106) An Act respecting the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

He said: The Dominion Atlantic Railway Company have recently arranged to purchase a railway in Nova Scotia known as the Midland Railway Company, which connects the Dominion Atlantic Railway, at Windsor, with the Intercolonial Railway, at Truro, and the principal object of this Bill is to authorize the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company to acquire the property of the other company. The Dominion Atlantic Railway Company are also authorized to extend this road from Truro to a point on the Straits of Northumberland.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to ask the hon. the Secretary of State when the return to the address passed by the House on my motion with reference to the withdrawal of naval forces from Canada, will be brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make inquiry and inform the hon. gentleman.

THIRD READING.

Bill (104) An Act respecting the Northern Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

PETITION PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It will be remembered that, yesterday, exception was taken by the chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, that the petition presented by the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company was not properly authenticated, having simply been authorized by wire from Victoria. The petition presented by the Canadian Pacific Railway, who are interested together with the other company, was in proper form, and I asked that this Bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for next Tuesday in order that I might communicate with the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, and obtain a petition bearing the seal of the company. It seems that such a petition has been in the possession of the solicitors of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it was presented to me to-day to be placed before the House. I, therefore, beg to move that rules 17 and 52 be suspended in so far as they relate to the petition of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, and that the said petition be received. The petition is properly signed and sealed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The difficulty I see in connection with the motion is that the House yesterday postponed this matter until Tuesday next, and we cannot pass a resolution to-day contradicting a resolution passed yesterday, unless yesterday's resolution is rescinded.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There seems to be a little misunderstanding with reference to the proceedings which have taken place. The hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Templeman) has presented a petition to the House, and he asks that rules 17 and 52 be suspended, because of the fact that the time for presenting petitions has expired. He simply asks that the petition be now read and received, so that it may be dealt with promptly by the Standing Orders Committee at their first meeting, which takes place to-morrow. The second reading of the Bill was deferred until the House should have the proper petition presented and considered by the Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I sit corrected.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We have just got that corrected now, and with the consent of the House, which can very properly be given, the petition can be taken into consideration, and at the time the second reading is reached it will be in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand rightly, there is a motion to suspend the rule.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Merely for leave to present a petition because of the fact that the time has expired.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What are the rules which the hon. gentleman asks to have suspended ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Rules 17 and 52.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Rule 17 reads :

No motion to suspend, modify or amend any rule or part thereof shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule proposed to be suspended, modified or amended, and the purpose of such suspension. But any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate ; and the rule proposed to be suspended shall be precisely and distinctly stated; and no motion for the suspension of the rules upon any petition for a Private Bill shall be in order, unless the same shall have been recommended by the Committee on Standing Orders.

We cannot suspend that rule unless we have a report of the Committee on Standing Orders.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend is perfectly correct in his reading, but in the past we have followed two different practices here—so I am informed. One is to present a petition for leave to present a petition, the other, which has been adopted in some cases, is to obtain the consent of the House to present the original petition in the first instance. It is, of course, a matter for the House to deal with, but I think it has already been threshed out to such an extent that hon. gentlemen are seized of the facts. The Committee on Standing Orders having reported on the petition of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which relates equally to this Bill, it is only for the protection of the House that this other petition has been presented.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there is no urgency we should follow the rules.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—But there is urgency.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We do not see it.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I understand both parties to this agreement, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, would like to have this Bill passed as soon as possible, as there is an agreement between them which has a time limitation—I think the first of June.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it the intention of the government to ask the Governor General to come here to sanction this Bill ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—When he comes to sanction other important Bills he will sanction this also.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When ?

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Before the end of the session.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When will that be ?

The motion was agreed to.

FORM OF PRAYER.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to know from the chairman of the committee struck some time ago to consider the question of the form of the prayer used at the opening of the House, if they have made any progress, and if they will soon report to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—A very proper question.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Perhaps the chairman will rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I have been waiting for my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Domville) to take some action, as he was placed on the committee at his own request.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have never been placed in such a mixed association before, and therefore I am paralyzed to know what action to take in conformity with what is required to be done.

McDERMOT RELIEF BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN moved the adoption of the twenty-fifth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce on Bill (C) An Act for the relief of Clara Bidwell McDermot.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a rule, I do not take any part in discussions on divorce Bills, although I think it is my duty as a member of the House to read the evidence. And while perhaps the weight of evidence in this case as printed is rather in favour of the report, I cannot say that it is perfectly conclusive, and I think it would be desirable to have a further expression of opinion from the acting chairman or some other member of the committee, to satisfy the House that the case has been clearly proven.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If the hon. members of this honourable House had taken the trouble to read the evidence which has been printed and circulated during the last week or two——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I took that trouble.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I mean the other hon. members. Very many hon. members of this House do not take the trouble to do so, but if they have I think there will be none—outside of the hon. gentleman who has spoken—who will not be of the opinion that the evidence in this case is altogether irrefutable. The fact of the matter is that the defence was conducted by the respondent himself, and under those conditions the committee allowed him latitude in the way of introducing all sorts of evidence, which they would hardly have done if he had been represented by counsel, so that he had an opportunity of stating his case fully. He went into the box and made a statement in a way that did not carry conviction to any member of the committee who was there. I do not think it is necessary for me to recapitulate the evidence in this House, but if any hon. member had been there and had listened to the evidence of the respondent to the effect that for sixteen years he had lived apart from his wife, and that for four or five years he had been in the habit of going daily to different houses of ill-fame and taking all sorts of liberties with the women who were there, as he himself said he had done, they would, I think, be convinced. The respondent's claim that he had not committed any crime is more than human nature would be disposed to stand, I think. At the same time his evidence was contradicted by two of the keepers of the houses of ill-fame which he frequented. They came on subpœnas, without any reason whatever except the fact that they were subpœnaed, all across the continent to give their evidence. The fact that they were immoral women does not in any way detract from the value of their oath, unless there is some reason shown to controvert the evidence they have given. They are entitled to as much credence as the respondent, who certainly, according to our idea, led an immoral life, and there was nothing to show these people had any interest in coming across the continent. They admitted connection with this man—they were asked the question and answered it: and one of these women said she had frequently gone and served drinks to him when he was in bed with these women. In the face of that, I cannot see how my hon. friend can pretend to say due proof was not given.

The motion was agreed to, on a division, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

BRITISH CANADIAN EMPIRE LEAGUE BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Bill (P) An Act to incorporate the British Canadian Empire League.—(Hon. Mr. Domville.)

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—This is a very important Bill, but I have been in communication with two or three gentlemen who think the empire is in their pockets, and I have tried to point out to them that a matter of such importance as this should not be confined to any one or two persons, but that the whole of Canada has an interest in it. I have made them an offer on behalf of the existing association—which is doing good work in Canada—as they have not proceeded very far themselves, to amalgamate with us and share in this great national work. Pending the issue of these negotiations, I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FREE TRANSPORTATION OF SENATORS AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS BILL.

House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (D) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, as regards the free transportation of senators and members of the House of Commons.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and be placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask if there is any intention to proceed with this Bill or are we just playing with it and postponing it from day to day ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is not my Bill, and the hon. gentleman who has charge of it is not here. He should be present when the matter is disposed of, and it is out of courtesy to him that I make this motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PACKING AND SALE OF CERTAIN STAPLE COMMODITIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (DD) An Act respecting the administration of an Act respecting the Packing and Sale of certain Staple Commodities.

He said : It has been found that under the law which at present gives the Governor in Council the right to assign to any single department the administration of this Act, a little practical inconvenience has arisen. We desire to employ two departments sometimes in the working of this Act—to assign one portion to one department and another portion to another department—and we propose to introduce two or three words which will enable that to be done.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE TRELAWNEY DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KRICHHOFFER, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their 28th report, recommending that Agnes Hedevig Helga Salusbury Trelawney be allowed to present a petition for leave to petition for a Bill of divorce from her husband, and moved that the report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman might state what led the committee to make this recommendation.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The original notice was given in the month of September of last year, but the advertising was not completed until a comparatively recent date, and there is no great object in the House carrying over proceedings, which are partly completed, to another year.

PACKING AND SALE OF CERTAIN STAPLE COMMODITIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on Bill (DD) An Act respecting the administration of an Act respecting the Packing and Sale of certain Staple Commodities.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The reason for the change effected by this clause is that this particular Act deals with a very large number of commodities, and it is found in practice that it is expedient for the Governor in Council to divide the administration, assigning one portion to one particular department and one portion to another. These words have been inserted to give that power to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. gentleman inform the House which department has been administering this Act ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It was recently assigned to my own department and a part of it has been retained there, but it is found in practice that the Department of Agriculture can more conveniently administer certain sections of the Act, and we wish to divide the administration accordingly.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

THE DEATH OF MRS. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—As the House is no doubt aware, our honourable colleague, the Secretary of State, has been absent from this chamber for several days in consequence of the very serious illness of his wife. That very serious illness has resulted in the death of Mrs. Scott since this House last met. It has been suggested to me by some hon. gentlemen that it would be a mark of courtesy and respect to our colleague if this House should adjourn. I therefore move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Ferguson, that as a mark of sympathy to the hon. Secretary of State in his bereavement, this House do now adjourn.

THE CLAIM OF HENRY F. COOMBS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to lay upon the Table of the Senate copies of all correspondence between Henry F. Coombs, of Sydney, C.B., and the Department of Agriculture of Canada, or any officer thereof, relating to articles forwarded by the said Henry F. Coombs to the Paris Exhibition, in 1900, and his claim for expenses in connection therewith and for payment to him for articles damaged or not returned.

THE TRAIN SERVICE ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY BETWEEN MONTREAL AND HALIFAX.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Does the government intend to give orders that the Intercolonial Railway Maritime Express, between Montreal and Halifax and between Halifax and Montreal, shall make every day a regular journey between these two cities ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is intended that the Maritime Express between Montreal and Halifax and vice versa shall continue to make regular journeys between these cities every day except Saturdays from Montreal and on Sundays from Halifax.

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS AT COMMONS COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER—Before calling the Orders of the Day, I wish to give an opinion which was asked for on the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). A special committee of the House of Commons, appointed to consider the Telephone question, wrote lately a circular letter to all the members of the Senate, requesting their attendance before that committee, so as to get the benefit of their experience upon the matter inquired into.

The hon. member for Halifax has raised the point that no member of this chamber could accept an invitation to appear before a committee of the Commons without leave from the Senate, according to the terms of our 91st rule which reads as follows :

When the attendance of a senator, or any of the officers, clerks or servants of the Senate is desired, to be examined by the Commons or to appear before any committee thereof, a message is sent by the Commons, to request that the Senate will give leave to such senator, officer, clerk, or servant to attend; and if the Senate grant leave to such senator, he may go if he think fit, but it is not optional for such officer, clerk or servant to refuse. Without such leave, no senator, officer, clerk or servant of the Senate shall, on any account, either go down to the House of Commons, or send his answer in writing or appear by counsel to answer any accusation there, upon penalty of being committed to the Black Rod or to prison, during the pleasure of the Senate.

It is claimed that this rule can only be applied or enforced when a summons is issued in a regular way to a senator to appear as a witness, and that a simple invitation, as in this case, does not fall under its prescriptions.

Bourinot (Flint's edition) page 557, makes no such distinction.

He gives his interpretation of the rule in the following general terms :

Whenever either House desires the attendance of a senator or a member before a select committee, a message must be sent to that effect. Leave must be given by the House to which the member belongs, and it is optional for him to attend. In case the attendance of one of the officers or servants of either House is required, the same course will be pursued ; but it is not optional for them to refuse to attend.

The distinction sought to be made as between a voluntary appearance upon a simple invitation and the issuing of a coercive process has no possible raison d'être, inasmuch as there can never be a summoning of a senator as in the case of other witnesses. A senator may be authorized by this chamber to appear before a committee of the Commons, but such authorization must always contain these words : 'If he thinks fit.' He is the sole judge as to the propriety of his appearance after he has thus been authorized.

May, page 402, lays down the same principle as governing the members of the British parliament based on the uniform practice of both branches of parliament :

If the attendance of a peer should be desired, to give evidence before the House, or any committee of the House of Commons, the House sends a message 'to the Lords, to request that their Lordships will give leave to' the peer in question to attend, in order to his being examined' before the House or a committee, as the case may be, and stating the matter in relation to which his attendance is required. If the peer should be in his place when this message is received and he consents, leave is immediately given for him to be examined, if he think fit. If not present, a message is returned on a future day, when the peer has, in his place, consented to go. Exactly the same form is observed by the Lords when they desire the attendance of a member of the House of Commons.

A great number of cases are reported in 'Hatsell's Precedents' on this very question. I quote the following :—

1. On the 16th of March, 1620, Lords send a message desiring certain members, whom they name, may attend and be sworn, and give their information on an inquiry in which the Lords were engaged concerning grievances. After debate it is resolved, That as many of the gentlemen as will, may, without derogation to the House, or blame to themselves, be sworn. There are further messages passed between the two Houses on the 17th and 19th; and on the 20th of March the Lords send word, 'That they have no intention to violate any' of the Privileges of this House, but desire that any other 'Members, whose testimony shall be needful, may, by private motion, without further message, attend.' To which the House of Commons send for answer, 'That if their Lordships shall have cause to examine any member upon oath (in the business then depending) the House giveth them leave, as private men, and as voluntarily, to go unto them, upon private notice ,to be examined.

2. On the 1st of December, 1669, Colonel Birch, informing the House that he and some other members of the House had received a note, desiring them to attend a committee of the House of Lords concerning Trade, moved for leave of the House to attend the said committee. The question being put, that Colonel Birch, and the rest of the members, have leave of this House to attend the committee, it passed in the negative.

3. On the 18th of May, 1675, it is resolved, that it is the undoubted right of the House of Commons that none of their members be summoned to attend the House of Lords during the sitting or privilege of parliament.

4. On the 9th of January, 1705, the Lords desire that Sir Cloudesly Scovell, and several other sea officers, members, may have leave to attend the Lords committees appointed to consider of proper measures of more effectually manning the fleet ; and leave is accordingly granted.

5. On the 26th November, 1707, the Lords desire that Sir J. Jennings may come to a committee, appointed for encouragement of Trade with the West Indies ; which leave is granted, if he thinks fit.

6. On the 5th of July, 1714, the Lords having under consideration matters relating to the Trade of this Kingdom, desire that such members as are Commissioners for Trade may attend them ; and this is granted, if the members think fit.

7. On the 8th of July, 1714, the Lords desire that such members as are of the Committee of the South Sea Company, and also William Lowndes, Esq., may have leave to attend them. On the question being put for leave, it is carried in the negative ; and a message is sent to acquaint the Lords that the Commons do not give leave, their Lordships not having specified the cause upon which they desire their attendance. The Lords immediately sends another message, that they having under their examination matters relating to the South Sea Company, which are of great consequence to the trade of the Kingdom, therefore desire the attendance of the said members , and on this message leave is granted.

A number of other similar precedents follow.

This procedure is uniformly continued up to the present date.

I find the following precedents in the English Common Journals of 1877 (pp. 99 and 261) :

1. The Lords request, that this House will be pleased to give leave to Joseph Chamberlain, Esquire, a member of this House, to attend in order to his being examined as a witness before the committee appointed by their Lordships, in the present session of parliament, on intemperance.

And Mr. Chamberlain being present in his place declared that he was willing, with leave of the House, to go to the House of Lords, as desired by their Lordships.

Resolved, that Joseph Chamberlain, Esquire, have leave to go to the House of Lords, as desired by their Lordships, if he thinks fit.

Ordered, that a message be sent to the Lords to acquaint them that this House hath given leave to Joseph Chamberlain, Esquire, to go to the House of Lords, as desired by their Lordships, if he think fit: and that the clerk do carry the said message.

2. The Lords request, that this House will be pleased to give leave to Joseph Whitwell Pease, Esquire, a member of this House, to attend, in order to his being examined as a witness before the Select Committee appointed by their Lordships in the present session of parliament, on intemperance.

And Mr. Pease being present in his place, declared that he was willing, with leave of the House, to go to the House of Lords as desired by their Lordships.

Resolved, that Joseph Whitwell Pease, Esquire, have leave to go the House of Lords, as desired by their Lordships, if he think fit.

Ordered, that a message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them that this House hath given leave to Joseph Whitwell Pease, Esquire, to go to the House of Lords as desired by their Lordships, if he think fit: and that the clerk do carry the said message.

Many other precedents could very likely be found, upon which May bases his own dictum.

I have cited a certain number of cases so as to explain the existence of our own rule 91 which is quite plain, but which, nevertheless, could well be redrafted by the special committee presently charged with the revision of our rules.

Both branches of our parliament seem to have interpreted and applied our rule as it is understood and followed by practice in England.

I will cite three precedents only, out of the six or seven cases I have under my hand.

1. Journals of the Senate, 1877, Vol. 11, page 163 :—

A message was brought from the House of Commons by their clerk in the following words:

House of Commons,
Monday, 26th March, 1877.

Resolved,—That a message be sent to the Senate, requesting their Honours will give leave to the hon. Messrs Sutherland and Girard, two of their members, to attend and give evidence before the Select Standing Committee of this House on Immigration and Colonization.

Ordered,—That the clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

Attest. ALFRED PATRICK,
Clerk of the House.

And then he withdrew.

The messenger was again called in and informed that the Senate will send an answer by a messenger of their own.

On motion of the Honourable Mr. Scott, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Pelletier, it was Resolved,—That this House doth give leave to the Honourable Messieurs Sutherland and Girard, two of its members, to attend and give evidence before the Select Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Immigration and Colonization as desired by that House in their message received this day, if they think fit.

Orderd,—That the foregoing resolution be communicated to the House of Commons by one of the Masters in Chancery.

2. The Debates of the Senate, 1883, page 158:—

A message wes received from the House of Commons that senators Haythorne, Carvell and Howlan be allowed to attend and give evidence before a committee of the House of Commons on the subject of steam communication with Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Sir ALEX. CAMPBELL moved that leave be given the senators mentioned to attend and give evidence, if they should see fit.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think it well to remark here, while this motion is before the House, that it seems not to be as well understood as it should be that a member of the Senate has no right—in fact, he renders himself liable to be taken into custody by the sergeant-at-arms and fined or imprisoned for going before a committee of the other House without the leave of the Senate. That has been done through inadvertence on several occasions, and it is just as well to call attention to the fact now, in order that it may not occur again, because it is a very important privilege of this House and should be strictly regarded.

Hon. Sir ALEXANDER CAMPBELL—Attention was drawn to the importance of the privilege by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, and he declined to go before the committee, and the result has been the message which has just been read to the House.

3. Journals of the Senate, 1891, p. 341 :—

On motion of Mr. Girouard, seconded by Mr. Stairs,

Resolved,—That a message be sent to the Senate, requesting that their Honours will give leave to the honourable Théodore Robitaille, one of their members, to attend and give evidence before the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, in the inquiry into certain circumstances and statements made in connection with the tenders and contracts respecting the Quebec Harbour works, Esquimalt graving dock, Baie des Chaleurs Railway, &c., &c., &c.

Ordered,—That the clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

It will be noticed that the two first are parallel cases to the one presently under review.

May adds at p. 403 : 'Whenever the attendance of a member of the other House is desired by a committee it is advisable to give him private intimation and to learn that he is willing to attend, before a formal message is sent to request his attendance.'

I take it that the circular letter sent to the members of this House had for its object to find who were the senators who were in a position to give useful information and who would express their willingness to be heard.

Instead of appearing forthwith before that committee, it would be the duty of such senators as were willing to appear, to wait, before so doing, for a message from the Commons, asking the Senate's leave for certain members to go and be heard.

I may add that in England, according to May, these formalities, though occasionally adopted, are not usual or necessary in the case of private Bills. I am not called upon to say if our rule, in its general terms, can admit of such exception.

THE TRELAWNEY DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WATSON presented a petition from Agnes Hedevig Helga Salusbury Trelawney for a Bill of divorce from her husband, and moved the suspension of rule 17.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that suspension of the rule recommended by the Committee on Standing Orders ? Rule 17 provides that no motion for the suspension of the rules upon any petition for a private Bill shall be in order unless recommended by the Committee on Standing Orders.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Read rule 52 which excepts Bills of divorce.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We are asked to suspend rule 17 which applies to petitions for all private Bills.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not the rule by me now, but I think the first of the divorce rules states substantially that the Committee on Standing Orders have nothing to do with divorce Bills.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Rule 52 is as follows :

No petition for any private Bill (except a Bill of divorce) is received by the Senate after the first three weeks of each session; nor may any private Bill be presented to the Senate after the first four weeks of each session ; nor may any report of any standing or special committee, upon a private Bill be received after the first six weeks of each session.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If the hon. gentleman will turn to rule 101 he will find that it provides that :

All petitions and Bills for divorce, and all matters arising out of such petitions and Bills, shall be referred to the Standing Committee on Divorce, and no reference to any committee other than the said committee shall be necessary with respect to such petitions, Bills and matters.

So that divorce Bills seem to be separate and distinct from all other Bills, and it would appear from that rule that my hon. friend did not require to suspend any rule at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If rule 101 deals with it, he cannot ask for a suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No, it is referred to the Divorce Committee.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I withdraw the motion, so far as the suspension of the rule is concerned, and present the petition.

BRANDON, SASKATCHEWAN AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

PETITION PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. WATSON presented a petition from the Brandon, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company praying for the passing of an Act extending the time for the commencement and completion of their railway and moved the suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That can only be done on the recommendation of the Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There are two courses open to the hon. gentleman ; one to present a petition praying for leave to present a petition, and the other to do as was done the other day, with the consent of the House, to move for the suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. Rule 17 gives us the right to suspend the rules, but there is a proviso that 'No motion for the suspension of the rules upon any petition for a private Bill shall be in order unless the same shall have been recommended by the Committee on Standing Orders.'

The SPEAKER—I think the point is well taken and that the petition should be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Does the hon. gentleman persist in his objection to the suspension of the rules ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, I do. This is not a divorce case.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, but it is important that this company should have the extension of time for which they petition. Of course if the hon. gentleman presses his objection, I shall have to take another course, but as the Bill originates here I am anxious to have it passed and referred to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there is no urgency claimed——

Hon. Mr. WATSON—But there is urgency.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We do not see it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Parliament has been in session now over four months, and I think it is important that there should be no delay which could be avoided in getting this Bill through the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want our rules to be observed. Every day we are asked to suspend the rules of this House, and they amount to nothing. I will let it pass for to-day.

A CORRECTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to our minutes of the last meeting of the House. It appears in this form :

The Honourable Mr. Templeman moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Ferguson, that as a mark of sympathy for the Honourable the Secretary of State in his present bereavement, the Senate do now adjourn.

The question of concurrence being put thereon, it was unanimously resolved in the affirmative.

Then on motion of the Right Honourable Sir Richard Cartwright, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Power, the Senate adjourned until Tuesday next, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

I never heard of that second motion.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may remark to my hon. friend that as I was not in the House on that occasion the motion could not have been made.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (AA) An Act respecting certain Patents of the Ideal Manufacturing Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (108) An Act to incorporate the Canadian West Life Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (Z) An Act respecting the Canadian Yukon Western Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Bill (75) An Act respecting the Battleford and Lake Lenore Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

OTTAWA RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved the third reading of Bill (81) An Act respecting the Ottawa River Railway Company, and to change its name to the Central Railway of Canada.

Hon. Mr. OWENS moved in amendment :

That section 4 be amended adding after the word 'substituting' in the 29th line, the words 'section 281 of the Railway Act of 1903,' for the words 'section 239 of the Railway Act.'

That section 7 be amended by adding the following words: 'and the charter and the rights of the company thereunder are hereby declared to be in full force as if the said section 13 had not been passed.'

He said : The first is to correct a clerical error. The object of the latter is to give to the clause the effect which the sub-committee intended.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like some further explanation from the hon. gentleman. He is proposing to amend two sections of the Bill by means of one motion. I do not understand the second amendment ; will it change any provision of the Bill as it passed the Railway Committee ?

Hon. Mr. OWENS—As hon. gentlemen will see if they will look at the Bill, the intention of the committee was to revive the section relating to the $25,000, which had practically, according to the views of some hon. gentlemen, lapsed ; but the clause does not show very clearly what the intention was, and the object of this amendment is to give the effect to clause 13 which the committee intended.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there is a slight error in the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman to clause 4. The clause in the Bill reads as follows :

The said section 9 is further amended by substituting the figures 281 for the figures 239 in subsection 2, and by adding thereto the following subsection.

What the hon. gentleman intends to do, I think, is to substitute in the 29th line, the words : 'Section 281 of the Railway Act of 1903' for the words : 'Section 239 of the Railway Act.'

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Yes. It might have been more clear if it had stated ; strike out section 281 of the Railway Act of 1903.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Let it go ; I think probably it is all right. It is merely a clerical error.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not quite conversant with the rules of this honourable House, as to matters of procedure, but should not my hon. friend move to refer this back to Committee of the Whole to amend in the manner he proposes.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—It is not necessary.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill as amended was read the third time and passed.

EDWARD NORMAN LEWIS RELIEF BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (142) An Act for the relief of Edward Norman Lewis, a member of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (99) An Act to incorporate the Title and Trust Company.—(Hon. Mr. McHugh.)

FREE TRANSPORTATION OF SENATORS AND MEMBERS OF THE COMMONS BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (D) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, as regards the free transportation of Senators and Members of the House of Commons.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I might inform this honourable House that, as ordered by the Senate when the measure was first before us, the clerk of the Senate has had proper credentials prepared and has communicated with the various railways. The certificates are being printed, and will be submitted for the approval of senators in a few days or a week at most ; and in the meantime I move that this Order of the Day be discharged, and placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if the suggestions made by the Senate met with the approval of the railway corporations ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I have very much pleasure in informing the Senate that the proposal has met with the approval of the railways with which the clerk has communicated, They have written in reply suggesting a few alterations in the form of the certificate, which alterations have been accepted. I hope that during the course of this week we will be able to present hon. members with proper credentials.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why not let this matter drop.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADA CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. FROST moved the second reading of Bill (EE) An Act respecting the Canada Central Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Bill is read the second time, I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that we have to-day passed the third reading of a Bill which gives to another railway the name of the Central Railway of Canada. The name of this company is the Canada Central. The names are too nearly identical to be at all useful, and I think it a pity that there should be a collision, as there will be, with regard to the names. The names are precisely the same, with the inversion of the words.

Hon. Mr. FROST—I might say that the company in question has had this name for a number of years, and if it is thought there will be any clashing in the names, the matter might be adjusted in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LABOUR UNION LABELS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved the second reading of Bill (10) An Act respecting Labour Union Labels.

He said : In moving the second reading of this Bill, I should like to say that the Bill has been placed in my name at the request of the gentlemen interested in it. In moving the second reading of this Bill, I do not consider that I am in any way pledged to the principle of the Bill, because I may say I am not in favour of the principle of the Bill at all, but I do recognize the right of any large portion of the people of this country to be heard before a committee of this House. The gentleman promoting the Bill asked me if I would see that it received a second reading and was laid before the committee. He said that the same legislation had been before the House on several occasions, but that they had never managed to have the Bill put through. He said they had some new arguments to present—I do not know what weight they will have with the committee—but he intimated they had some arguments they would like to place before the committee of the House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—What committee does the hon. gentleman propose to refer to ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not know what committee. We will take one motion at a time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not expect that this Bill would come up just at this stage, and I had no intention of entering upon the discussion of it ; but under the very doubtful way in which it has been presented to the House I do not think that we would be justified in going on with the second reading. I would be inclined to say, in the words of Shakespeare 'Thou comest in such a questionable shape that I would speak to thee.' The hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill tells us he is not in favour of its principle. That being so, I think it is only trifling with the matter to pass the second reading on any such motion. I think that this question has really been very thoroughly discussed and threshed out in the committee year after year ; and the opinion of members is so well known and so nearly unanimous on the question that it is not worth our while to pass the second reading ; therefore I shall vote against the motion.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am sorry my hon. friend decided to move the second reading of the Bill to-night, but of course if there is a distinct understanding that the House is not at all pledged to the principle of the Bill I have no desire to prevent the advocates of the measure having an opportunity of appearing before the committee and presenting any new arguments which they may desire to bring forward. We had this Bill before parliament two years ago, I think, when we gave it very full consideration. Every opportunity was afforded to discuss the provisions of the Bill, and after careful consideration and discussion, it was rejected by this chamber. In my humble opinion, Canada cannot afford to transplant into our soil vicious measures of this kind. This legislation has its origin in the United States, which was the first country in which any Act of this character was ever brought into force. It was adopted in 1874 for the purpose of enabling manufacturers of cigars in San Francisco to distinctly draw the line between cigars that were manufactured by white labour and cigars manufactured by Chinese. They employed the label to designate the cigars that were manufactured by white labour, and any that were not so labelled were thereby known to be the manufacture of Chinese labour and were boycotted. They commenced with that, and they succeeded fairly well. The next thing they undertook was to apply the principle to the hatters of the United States. There were about 58 or 60 hat manufacturers in the United States and the Union of Hat Manufacturers commenced to unionize every factory. They went so far as to unionize 46 or 48 factories, and then they addressed circulars to the remaining hat manufacturers in the United States demanding, virtually, the right to unionize the labour in their factories. Some of the employers refused, and were immediately boycotted. Circulars were sent out to all wholesale and retail dealers in hats in the United States, telling them that these hat manufacturers had refused to come into the union and to give their artisans reasonable and proper wages, that some of them were utilizing apprentices who had only been in their employ for a year, to do skilled men's work ; and they went so far as to boycott several dealers. The unions in the United States publish a journal, which has a very large circulation, the 'American Federationist," as it is called. That journal publishes each week and each month the names of all manufacturers who will not consent to bring their factories under the operation of union labour. Every manufacturer receives that paper, and of course carefully reads it, and there he finds the names of all the shops which will not consent to unionize their institutions.

All those who sympathize with union labour are desired to boycott those shops and to boycott every shop that handles their goods. A firm in Danbury—D. K. Loy & Company —was successfully boycotted in this way in connection with the manufacture of hats. The firm employed about 230 men and manufactured about 400,000 hats per year. They were one of the twelve who refused to unionize their factory, saying that they wanted the opportunity of employing free labour wherever they could get it. The result was that the unions made an effort to stop the sale of goods manufactured by those people, and they did. The firm was compelled to take action, and they issued a writ, and named in that writ every member of the union in Danbury. There was a number of hat manufacturers there who had become members of the union, and a committee was appointed to take charge of the matter. In the writ which was issued they mentioned 400 or 500 men who were the owners of property, in order to prevent the transfer of that property until such time as this question was settled. The case was fought out in the law courts most bitterly and determinedly. The result was that, having the power of the whole labour union of the United States opposed to them, that firm was ruined, simply because they would not consent to have their establishment brought into the union in the way proposed. Now, if there is one thing that we boast of it is the liberty and right of every man in Canada to sell his labour in the highest market and at the best price. Every man should have a right to do that. I do not believe in any person going around organizing shops and bringing men into one organized union in order to force employers of labour to place all their men upon the same footing, giving them the same wages all round, on penalty of being boycotted or having to submit to a strike.

I was in Detroit but a short time ago, and while waiting for the train I noticed some 40 or 50 men painting a boat. The man in charge was standing on the wharf, and I observed that there were one or two workmen pretty drunk and not able to paint very well.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—They were painting red.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They could not even paint the telegraph poles, and I said to the foreman: 'Why do you keep those men? What is the matter?' He said: 'I dare not discharge those men—if I discharged them all the rest would leave. I have to do the best I can with the crowd; I cannot make any choice, they are here along with the others, and if I made an attempt to dismiss them the whole crowd would strike at once.' That is a bad condition of affairs. Why should not a sober, industrious man, a man who makes a study of his business and who becomes an expert, who is capable of earning a good wage, be allowed to sell his own labour as he pleases, without being tied down and kept back by some miserable drone who is no good, but who has to be employed and paid at the same price because he belongs to the organization? That is the condition of affairs in the United States. If there is any country on the face of the earth to-day that is cursed with organizations of that kind, that is honeycombed with corruption and fraud, it is the United States; and we cannot afford to transplant into this country the miserable legislation appearing on the statute-book of the United States legalizing organizations of this kind. It is a curse to that country, and will be a curse to us if we permit that state of affairs to exist here. I have nothing to say against labour. I desire to encourage in every proper way all honest artisans and all honest mechanics. We should be in a position to say to every honest man who comes to Canada: 'You will get a fair opportunity to sell your labour in the highest market and to the best advantage. When you come to Canada you come to a country where British liberty exists, and where men are allowed to fight the battle of life untrammelled and unshackled by organizations which tend to keep him back and hold him in bondage.' I have no desire to stand in the way of permitting the advocates of this measure to present their arguments to the committee. It is a British privilege—a right which I have no desire to withhold. If it is the desire of the House I am willing to let the Bill go to committee in order that they may have the opportunity which they desire. My own idea is—I speak simply for myself—that unless they can produce better arguments than I have ever heard, more substantial arguments than those that have already been advanced, it would be imprudent on the part of this independent section of the legislature of the Dominion to enact such a law.

I do not know whether I am expressing the sentiments of others or not. I have not canvassed any one against the Bill; I simply speak the honest sentiments of my own mind. I read the United States newspapers very carefully, and from what I see in them, and from what I gather through institutions with which I am connected in the United States, I know something of what the public suffer from day to day and from year to year, through legislation of this kind in different states of the union. It is a curse to them and they themselves now acknowledge it. The best minds in the United States express openly their regret that they were ever unfortunate enough to permit such legislation to have a place in their laws. They regret it now, but they cannot withdraw it; there is no party powerful enough to remedy this unfortunate condition of things. Where it is going to end I do not know. I hope that Canada will so guard herself against the results of organizations of this kind that we will not permit legislation of that obnoxious character to be transplanted into our virgin soil, take root and grow up to become a curse and injury to our country.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I understand that this is a public Bill. If so I do not see how it could be, except by special motion of the Senate, referred to any standing committée. As I understand it, the Bill must be discussed in Committee of the Whole. If it is to be discussed in Committee of the Whole, I do not see how we could get any further information.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—There is no motion to refer the Bill to any committee yet. The hon. gentleman has only moved the second reading,

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I understood the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill to say that he was not yet in a position to state whether he was in favour of the principle of the Bill or not, that his only object was to have it referred to some standing committee of the House to receive further information; and if they could obtain better reasons than had been given before for this legislation, perhaps the Senate might reverse the decision it has given on similar measures several times in the past. However, I find on looking over the Bill that it is a public measure, and as such should be, according to our rules, discussed in Committee of the Whole, where we could not get any information further than could be afforded by members of this House.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Two years ago a similar Bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no question that this is a public Bill; but it has been the practice in both Houses for a number of years to refer such measures, and in some cases even government Bills, to some of the standing committees or to a special committee, to be discussed by those interested who are not members of parliament. The practice in the past, particularly with respect to this Bill, has been to send it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Whether it is advisable to send it again to that committee is a question for the House to decide. I do not think it is necessary for me to explain what my views are upon this measure. I have on every occasion opposed such measures, both in the Senate and in committee. My views upon the question are stronger to-day than they ever were in consequence of the events that are constantly occurring in every part of this country of which we read in the newspapers. The manner in which trades unions have been exercising their powers have, to my mind, placed them beyond favourable consideration by any portion of the community. But I said to the gentleman who is very much interested in this measure, when he spoke to me some little time ago, 'You know very well what my opinions are on these trades unions and the effect they are having on the investment of capital and trade generally; and, speaking for myself, anything I can do to defeat your Bill I shall most assuredly do; but I am not opposed to its going to a committee, if the Senate decide that it is well to hear the further arguments which you say you can advance in favour of the measure.' Having made that promise, if my hon. friend on my right insists on having a division on the second reading, in order to keep my word good, I shall have to vote against his motion although my sympathy is entirely against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Without committing myself to the principle of the Bill as is usually done upon the second reading, I desire to point out that the impression is not correct that this is the same Bill that was introduced in former sessions. An important element has been introduced into this Bill which gives rise to new considerations, and which possibly might affect the ultimate fate of the Bill in the Senate. It is limited to incorporated associations of workingmen; former Bills only related to aggregations of workingmen entirely irrespective of their having any corporate responsibility. This matter of corporate responsibility has been very much discussed, particularly in the English courts and in our own courts, with reference to unions of workingmen. It may be possible that the advocates of this Bill may be able to demonstrate to the Senate that where there is a corporate centre, so to speak, as distinguished from an aggregation of individuals without a corporate entity, this would furnish a better guarantee for the observance of public as well as private rights. We know that where there is a common centre of responsibility such as vests in a corporation, there is usually a much greater guarantee for the observance of law and order and of the private rights which pertain to individuals as well as to the public. I simply say this to disabuse the minds of hon. gentlemen of any misapprehension, and to show that this is not the same Bill that has been before the Senate on former occasions. I do not desire even yet to commit myself to the principles embodied in the Bill, but it seems to me that a discussion of this important element would certainly do no harm; and if it were sent to a special committee where the matter could be duly considered, we could not be said to be doing more than our public duty in giving proper consideration to the measure.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I would not have taken any part in this debate if the protest entered by the hon. member for Belleville, and the denunciation made by the hon. gentleman for North Wellington had not been so severe and drastic. I, for one, do not wish this country to understand that the Senate is opposed in principle to the rights of the workingmen of Canada to organize and form unions. They are entitled to organization and to union among themselves, quite as much as the medical or legal fraternity. They are as much entitled to organization as manufacturers or any other class of the community; and why such experienced men as the hon. member for Belleville and my hon. friend for North Wellington should undertake to tell the people of Canada that workingmen can have no place in this country if they belong to unions, is more than I can understand. Are these gentlemen not aware, in talking of British liberty, that there are in England, Scotland and Ireland the strongest and best unions in the world, under the law, along the law, and within the law; that these unions in Great Britain send to the British parliament some of the ablest and most intelligent members that represent British opinions on the floor of the House of Commons? We are asked to-day by these hon. gentlemen to put our foot down once and for all, and stamp out that right to organize, the right of self-preservation, the right of union, because in union is strength——

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C)—This is not a question of union.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am answering the arguments—not the arguments, but the denunciations, so heavy and so drastic, which have been levelled at the labour organizations of this country. Because in other countries crimes have been committed—not by the unions——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The result?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN——the same as crimes are committed in all professions, are we to denounce all organization because of the crimes or misdeeds of individuals? Why urge such drastic measures in the case of workingmen when you do not take the same course when dealing with manufacturers or other classes of people? It is not right that this should go abroad as being the unanimous opinion of the Senate, or even the opinion of the larger portion of this House, as against the rights of the workingmen of Canada. I will not discuss the merits of this Bill to-day, but as a matter of principle I say that our Canadian workingmen have a right to organize and form unions ; and the desire and effort of parliament should be to keep the unions along the line of the law and within the law. If that is done nothing wrong can come from them ; but if by law you should trample on their rights, then beware that they do not take improper means to get beyond the law. These people are law-abiding citizens ; they pay their taxes into the public treasury ; they are citizens equal with us on the floor of this House ; they are entitled to the protection of the law. Let the law be fair to them, and they will be fair to the laws which govern this country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I regret to say that I cannot quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Hawkesbury.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is not surprising.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I sometimes agree with the hon. gentleman, but I cannot agree with him on this occasion. The hon. gentleman speaks of the interests of the trades unions being identical with the interests of the workingmen of Canada, and he undertakes to say that any one who crosses the path of the unions is interfering with the rights of the workingmen of Canada. The truth is that the rights of the workingmen of Canada have been more interfered with by members of trades unions than by any other body of people in the country. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the number of members of labour unions in Canada is very small indeed as compared with the whole number of workingmen, and those who do not happen to agree with the hon. gentleman may be really looking at the interests of the vast majority of workingmen, even though they are not endorsing the actions of labour unions.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—How many of the men on any railroad in Canada do not belong to a union ? How many moulders, how many mechanics of any kind, are outside of the trades unions ? I know the agricultural population are not organized, but the artisans are.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have read the statistics within a comparatively short time, and I know that what I state is correct ;—that there is a very much larger number of workingmen who are not members of unions than there are in the unions.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Ordinary labourers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In this country we are pretty nearly all workingmen, in fact. The hon. gentleman said that the particular class of workingmen who are members of trades unions should have the same rights that doctors and lawyers have. There is just this difference, however. The lawyers are in a sense organized into a union, and the doctors are also. They are fenced around, no doubt ; but it is not the kind of fence which is around the labour unions. No man is allowed to practise law or medicine in this country who has not established, by examination, his fitness to do the work. Now the labour unions have no such tests. They do not as a general rule inquire into a man's fitness. A man, no matter how poor a mechanic he may be, is admitted as a member of a union, sometimes without having undergone any reasonable apprenticeship. The essential qualification for admission of a lawyer or doctor is that he shall have passed an examination to show his fitness to practice his profession. If the principal object of labour unions was to do that——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What about serving an apprenticeship? Is not that qualifying?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I happen to know that in a great many unions—I cannot speak of the whole of them—in my own province, there does not appear to be any preliminary apprenticeship. Any man who can drive a nail without hitting his thumb is admitted as a member of a carpenters' union. Then the hon. gentleman talks about the question of the right of workingmen to unite. I do not think any one questions that right. Their right to interfere with other people who do not choose to go into the unions has been questioned, but not their right to unite. I had intended saying—though not as well as he has done—what has just been said by the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed). This Bill is altogether different from the Bill which was sent to a committee two or three years ago, because the operation of this measure is limited to labour unions which have become incorporated.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The last Bill was not sent to a committee. It received the six months hoist.

Hon. Mr. POWER — It undoubtedly makes a difference that the Bill is to apply only to incorporated unions, because when a union becomes incorporated it can be made party to a lawsuit or prosecuted just as an individual might be who did anything improper or illegal. Further, this Bill, assuming that there is nothing in its provisions which does not appear on the surface, does not seem to contain anything which is open to serious objection. It merely confirms to the labour unions the right to use the label which they have registered. I do not say that I shall support the Bill, but I do not see anything very objectionable on the face of it. It was distinctly understood when the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan introduced the measure, that in sending it to a committee the House would not be committed to the principle of the Bill. The better course to take is to let it go to the committee, probably the Banking and Commerce Committee, which has dealt with a similar Bill, and is very well qualified to deal with this one. While it may be held that the members of the labour unions, or at any rate the persons who control them, are mistaken as to the course they should pursue, still the fact remains that they are a very large, important and valuable class of our population ; and whatever arguments they may have to propose in favour of this measure should be carefully and respectfully heard. The proper place for that hearing is before a standing committee of the Senate where the matter can be discussed in a calm, and good-tempered way. As has been very properly indicated by the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière, in a Committee of the whole House there would really be no opportunity for hearing what the advocates of the Bill have to say in its favour.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hon. gentlemen can see perfectly well the drift of this Bill ; its object is to boycott people who do not use the union label. Why should we put a bludgeon in the hands of these unions ? The hon. gentleman from Hawkesbury has spoken as though he were going to face an election—holding out a threat against members of this House because, as he says, we are trying to oppress labour. There is nothing of the kind intended. No one is opposed to labour or to labour unions so long as they behave themselves ; but if they are granted any concession by parliament, they ought to be bound by the strictest rules not to break the law.

We have an object lesson before us in what is occurring in Chicago to-day—labour unions guilty of arson, murder and almost every crime ; and those are the men who dictate to the unions in Canada. All the Canadian unions are affiliated with the United States unions, and the men who commit those crimes which we read about are the men who dictate to our trades unions here. I read not long ago in a California magazine an article by a gentleman who was travelling as a visitor through that country, a man who was perfectly disinterested and who observed the conditions throughout the state. He found that the prices of labour were so high that no work could go on. Plumbers and others were getting $10 a day, blacksmiths and carpenters $5 a day and hod-carriers $3.50. With wages so high building operations and improvements were at a standstill. A contractor who was erecting buildings in that city procured mantels made in Chicago, but when they were delivered in San Francisco the trades unions would not allow them to be touched. The building could not go on. Finally, after a time, they gave in, and said : 'We will forgive you this time ; we will put in the mantels, but do not do it again.' This writer described having seen non-union teamsters dragged from their wagons and their arms broken with iron bars on the streets. The police would give them no protection, because they were under the control of the mayor, who was himself a union man. In the face of such facts, are we justified in giving any class of people who are not oppressed, who are as free as others, this special power ? Are we justified in putting a bludgeon in their hands to strike down other people ? They talk about freedom ; where is the freedom that these people allow ? They are the most tyrannical men in the world ; and if you want proof of it, read the descriptions of incidents that are occurring every day in the neighbouring country.

This Bill has received consideration enough. I shall not move the six months hoist, as some hon. gentlemen wish to have it discussed to ascertain what arguments these men can advance why they should be permitted to put their label on goods. I think it is a piece of gross impertinence—nothing more or less. I pay men wages to do certain work; they get what I agree to give them, and that should satisfy them. They have nothing to do with my goods or the marks I put on them. If the Bill goes to a committee it ought to be amended to provide that all alliances with unions outside of Canada should be illegal. In that way our own people might control their own affairs and not be subject to the dictation of men who are continually breaking the law and are guilty of the grossest crimes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—It is greatly to be regretted that the hon. gentleman who launched this measure should have given it a black eye at the start, thereby awakening a certain amount of animosity and ill-feeling. Had he introduced it in a gentler manner, it might have been discussed more quietly. I congratulate the Senate on the more amicable spirit expressed to-day as compared with the last occasion. I suppose these gentlemen believe that by persistence and perseverance they will succeed. On the last occasion I remember it was summarily dealt with. There was not any discussion or special attention given to the Bill. I supported it on that occasion, not because I approved of all the purposes of the Bill, but because I think it is the inalienable right of any citizens of this country to submit to the Senate any measure they desire, provided it is not in violation of the rules of propriety and procedure of the Senate. They should have that right and it is not becoming—it is very ungracious and not calculated to make this Senate popular—to hastily reject any measure submitted to them, whether it be just or not. That is the ground on which I supported this Bill on a former occasion, and it is the spirit which should actuate the Senate to-day, whether they approve of the principle of the Bill or not.

I have not read this Bill carefully, but the point under discussion now is whether it should be given a second reading or not. From the expressions of hon. gentlemen who are very much opposed to it, I am glad to see that an opportunity will be given to discuss it in committee. I am sure the discussion will do a great deal of good, and it is only ordinary politeness and courtesy, which the Senate should show to every citizen.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend from Hawkesbury takes the ground that many members of this House are opposed to trades unions. I am within my rights in saying that few men of my age have had more experience of trades unions than I have, but while I have always been willing to accept the principle of trades unionism, I think the Senate should pause before committing itself to the passage of this Bill. What is the object? To dominate through trades unions and wage warfare against manufacturers who do not see eye to eye with them. Take the case of a large manufacturing concern producing ready-made clothing. If this Bill should become law, a workingman going into a store where ready-made clothing is sold, if he does not find the union label on the goods will not buy them. They may be properly made, they may have been made by union labour, under union hours, union wages, and union rules, but without the union label he would not buy them. The object of this Bill is to compel the manufacturer to use the union label, and to prevent the sale of his goods if he does not use it. No one objects to trades unions. A man who does not belong to a trades union is either incapable of doing his work, or an inferior workman. I hold it is the duty of every workman to belong to a union of his craft.

While I admit that, at the same time I ask why should the union be permitted to dictate to the tailors as to whose label should be put upon my coat, vest or trousers? The effect of these unions is more far-reaching than hon. members of the Senate have any idea of. Take the case of a brickmaker; an architect is employed, and a contractor consents to erect a certain building. The foundations are put in by masons who belong to the union, by labourers who belong to the union and bricklayers who belong to the union; but the bricks have not the marks of the labour union upon them, and therefore the bricklayers refuse to proceed.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the House adjourns, I wish to call the attention of hon. members to two or three matters which have arisen since the session of the House has been suspended. During the proceedings which have just taken place I notice that a stranger has been sitting on the floor of this House. I think that this should not happen in the future. No stranger should be admitted, except by special leave of this House, within the precincts while Bills are being assented to by the Governor General or Deputy Governor.

I wish further to know if any notice was given to this House that the Governor General or his deputy was to come here and assent to Bills ? Referring to the proceedings of last year, we find that during the sitting of this House on the 6th day of June, 1904, a message was sent to the Senate by the Governor General. His Honour the Speaker informed the Senate that he received the following communication from the Governor General's secretary :

Office of the Governor General's Secretary,
Ottawa, June 6, 1904.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Mr. Justice Sedgewick, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at 4 o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. S. MAUDE, Major.
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

The SPEAKER—Will the hon. gentleman tell me by whom this notice was signed ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—By the Governor General's secretary. He sent a notice stating that the Deputy Governor would be here at a certain hour to assent to certain Bills, and in accordance with that notice the Deputy Governor came here and assented to certain Bills. This was done in the middle of the session, just as Bills have to-day been assented to. As every one knows, at the end of the session, when the Governor General comes here, we are always notified of the hour at which he will attend. In 1904 a notice was sent by the Governor General's secretary, Major Maude, informing the Senate that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate chamber and prorogue parliament.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—That is always done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It has always been done except by one person. On the 10th August last year, the following notice was received and read by the Speaker of this House :

Office of the Governor General's Secretary,
Ottawa, August 10, 1904.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber to prorogue the session of parliament on Wednesday the 10th instant, at four o'clock p.m.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. S. MAUDE, Major.
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

The Bills were assented to on that occasion by the Governor General himself ; he came after having given us proper notice. As already stated, on the 6th June of the same session a similar notice was sent by the Governor General's secretary informing the Senate that Mr. Justice Sedgewick, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at four o'clock p.m. for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills. Again, on the 18th July of the same session, and in accordance with notice given beforehand we find that :

'The Hon. Mr. Justice Sedgewick, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, being seated at the foot of the throne', assented to certain Bills which are set forth in the minutes of that date.

On the 25th June, 1903, I find the following entry in the minutes, but there is no notice or intimation from the Governor General's secretary as in the other cases I have mentioned :

'The Hon. Sir Henri E. Taschereau, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, being seated at the foot of the throne,

The Hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons, &c.'

It will be seen that there is nothing on record to show that notice was given on that occasion, as is usually done. I wish to know why no notice has been given to the Senate on this occasion to explain why our proceedings have been interrupted, and in what way the hon. the Speaker received notice that the Governor General's deputy was coming to assent to some of the Bills passed this session.

The SPEAKER—I received no written notice of the intention of the Honourable the Deputy Governor to be in the Senate at five o'clock to assent to certain Bills. I was only notified by the Honourable the Deputy Governor verbally, through a page of this chamber, that he had reached my private chambers in order to be here at five o'clock to assent to some Bills. I had been informally notified by a minister of the cabinet that the Deputy Governor would be here at five o'clock, but I received no written notice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it is one of the privileges of this chamber to be notified in the proper way, and in the future we should insist upon it, that the Governor General when he comes here or sends his deputy, should give us notice in the usual way. I do not see why we have departed from this rule which has always been followed in the past. I have been able to find but one precedent for the course pursued to-day, the one which I have mentioned, when the Hon. Justice Taschereau came here at one time last year and took his seat at the foot of the throne. I do not object to his taking the throne this time, if he is entitled to it, but if he is entitled to it, we are entitled to some courtesy on the part of the Crown.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There can be no question that the proceedings to-day have been of a very irregular character, and not in accordance with the precedents or usages of this House. In what manner will the clerk make an entry of to-day's proceedings? The first we knew or heard of any intention on the part of the Governor General or the deputy representing the Governor General coming to this House was on a motion of a private member to adjourn the debate. No one knew why that adjournment was proposed until the hon. gentleman intimated that he understood the Governor General or his representative would be here in a very short time to assent to certain Bills.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. The Speaker called my attention to the fact and asked me to stop speaking.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not misrepresenting the hon. gentleman. I am stating what occurred. How was the Senate to know that the Speaker conveyed the intimation to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—He spoke in an audible voice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not hear it. I am not complaining of the hon. gentleman. I am speaking of the proceedings as being not only undignified, but not at all in accordance with the usages of this House. This is the first time I have heard of the Deputy Governor coming down and ordering the Speaker's chair to be removed.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—Did he order the Speaker's chair to be removed ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand he informed an official of the House that he would not appear in this chamber to assent to the Bills unless the Speaker's chair was removed so that he might occupy the chair of His Excellency. That is something new. Whether he is entitled to that position or not, I do not know; but I am of the opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman who has brought the matter before the Senate, that if there is anything in the constitution or practice and precedents of parliament to entitle him to it, the Senate is equally entitled to notice. The hon. minister who represents the Government in this House at the present moment, has not been long in the Senate, but I can say that since I have been here nothing, so far as I recollect, occurred which would be a precedent for the course pursued to-day. I think it is well that the members of the Senate should take some little time to consider this matter and place on record its disapproval of the manner in which the proceedings of to-day have been conducted, and let us ascertain where the blame lies. We are getting into very irregular ways, and we are somewhat lax, I am sorry to say, even in our rules. To my mind this is carrying things a little too far.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As the hon. member from Belleville has said, I have not assisted in any ceremony of this kind before, but I am disposed entirely to agree with the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in thinking that a formal communication should have been made to you, Mr. Speaker, and I will take care that it be represented in the proper quarter. I am not absolutely certain who has been in error in the matter, but it appears to me that the secretary of His Excellency should have communicated with you in writing, as I have understood has been the practice on former occasions, and as it appears to me is far more consonant with the dignity of the House than sending a message to you in the way the leader of the opposition has described. I will see that this matter is represented in the proper quarter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What about the Throne?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As to the point the hon. gentleman has raised touching the chair, that possibly may require, as on other occasions, to be referred to the home authorities for decision. It involves some grave constitutional questions.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He has the right to the title of His Excellency, and therefore to occupy the chair.

EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS ON GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to:

Call the attention of the government to a portion of the report of Judge Winchester, who was appointed to inquire into the truth or falsity of the allegations that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway managers were employing civil engineers from the United States to the exclusion of Dominion engineers, as follows:—

Referring to the capability and availability of Canadian engineers, Judge Winchester says: 'Mr. Hays and Mr. Stephens, having stated that they were unable to obtain capable Canadian engineers to do the necessary work in connection with this railway, I made inquiry with reference to the capability and availability of engineers bona fide residents in Canada, and examined a number of eminent engineers on that question. The consensus of their evidence is that there was a sufficient number of capable engineers to perform the work as well, if not better than, the American engineers appointed, and that had reasonable efforts been made by Mr. Hays or Mr. Stephens, they would have had no difficulty whatever in obtaining the necessary talent for the work to be performed.'

Judge Winchester quotes from the evidence of Sir Sandford Fleming and others as to the ability of Canadian engineers and says: 'In addition to the evidence of the engineers above mentioned, who were unanimous in stating the Canadian engineers were not inferior to the American engineers for the work in question; and some of whom stated that they were superior, having a better knowledge of our northern country, and that a sufficient number were available for such work at the salaries offered, I examined Mr. William Mackenzie, whose firm are constructing the Canadian Northern Railway, and he stated that he did not know a single engineer in connection with that railway who was an American. I also examined Mr. A. W. Campbell, Assistant Commissioner of Public Works for Ontario, and a civil engineer, and who had charge of the construction of the Temiscamingue and Northern Ontario Railway. He stated that he had no difficulty in obtaining Canadian engineers to take charge of the location and construction of that railway; in fact, he had so many applications that he did not know what to do with them.'

The conclusion of the report is as follows:— 'As a result of the evidence taken before me during the investigation I am of opinion that there was no earnest endeavour made to obtain Canadian engineers for the location of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway by those having authority to employ such; that had such an effort been made there would have been no difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number capable not only of locating, but of constructing the whole work. In the word "engineers" I include all from the chief engineer and harbour engineer to the trasitmen, draughtsmen, levellers and topographers. There was, however, a very earnest desire to obtain American engineers for the work, and in some cases applications were made to the heads of other railway companies to relieve men for the purpose of having them brought to Canada to be employed on this road. I have already stated the number of American engineers so employed. I find also, from the evidence, that the Canadian engineers are not inferior to the American engineers for the work in question, but having a superior knowledge of the country they are better qualified for that work. I also desire to state that the Canadian engineers are not asking for protection for themselves, but merely desire that no discrimination be made against them. That discrimination has been made against them, in my opinion, there is no doubt.'

And to ask if the government has taken any steps to enforce the Alien Labour Act? How many United States civil engineers are employed on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway survey and how many Dominion engineers?

He said: I suppose the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce realizes fully that some injury has been done to the people of Canada by the importation of engineers from the United States to work in Canada, and if the Alien Labour Act is not sufficiently comprehensive to put a stop to that abuse it should be amended by the government of Canada. The government tell us that it is not their business to institute a prosecution. It is perfectly clear that individuals have not the means to pursue a long prosecution in the courts, and if the matter is not taken charge of by the government, or some power with authority and money to carry on the prosecution, the abuse will continue. The report of Judge Winchester is clear and exhaustive. I think he is a splendid man for that class of work. He has demonstrated conclusively that the Grand Trunk Pacific people have told untruths, and that they did not endeavour to use their influence in the employment of Canada engineers on this work, but that they have sent to the United States of America for the members of their engineering staff. They have not employed idle men but have selected men that were employed on other railways, taking them from their work in the United States, to give them employment in Canada. That is very reprehensible, and constitutes an injury to our people. Since I placed this notice on the order paper, Judge Winchester has conducted an inquiry into the conduct of the Père Marquette Railway Company and it has been found that Canadians have been dismissed without any cause and United States citizens employed in their stead.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In reply to the questions asked by the hon. member from Victoria, I may say that I am informed that out of twenty-four persons reported against by his Honour Judge Winchester, fifteen have left the service of the company, in consequence of the steps taken by the government to enforce the Alien Labour Act. Some of those parties were deported at the express instance of the Attorney General, and some others left to escape the consequences of violating the Alien Labour Act. With respect to the hon. gentleman's second question, I have here a list of the positions occupied on the Grand Trunk Pacific survey which I will read to the House and lay on the table. It is as follows:

Positions.	Americans.	Canadians.	British.	Total
Division engineers	....	....	1	3
District "	....	1	....	1
Assistant "	3	14	3	20
Draughtsmen	3	19	5	27
Levellers	2	10	....	12
Transitmen	2	9	....	11
Topographers	....	10	1	11
Harbour engineers	1	....	....	1
Office "	1	3	....	4
Stenographers	....	4	1	5
	14	70	11	95

Axemen, chainmen, cooks, packers, &c., all Canadians.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand the hon. gentleman to say that some of those parties who had been brought to this country in violation of the Alien Labour law were deported at the expense of the country.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I said at the express instance of the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman's reply is much more satisfactory than I thought it would be. I am glad some steps have been taken to enforce the Alien Labour Act. I wish it distinctly understood that in this matter we did not throw the first stone. The United States began it, and we are only paying them in their own coin. In everything, including the tariff, we should be prepared to meet them. I would not have moved in this matter if our friends to the south had not moved first; and I hope we will always be able to meet them, and hold our own.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I would remind the hon. gentleman that a very great many of the best graduates of McGill have found profitable employment as engineers in the United States, and are drawing very large salaries there. I was told by Prof. Bovey, who is the head of the engineering faculty at McGill, that of the engineers who have graduated at McGill, Canadians, a certain number are drawing salaries aggregating in some years $1,000,000; so I believe we should be very guarded, and not be too hard on engineers coming from the United States, when the neighbouring republic has in the past shown such consideration for and appreciation of Canadian engineers.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the hon. gentleman know whether the Canadians to whom he refers, who are employed in the United States, have taken the oath of allegiance or declared their intention to do so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am not aware of that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think it is very likely they had to do that to get employment, and if engineers from the United States come here and become naturalized, or declare their intention to become naturalized, they would be treated the same as Canadian engineers.

THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before passing to the Orders of the Day, I desire to call attention to what I consider the unseemly and unprecedented proceedings of yesterday in this chamber, in consequence of the extraordinary action of the Deputy Governor. That gentleman seems to have—in fact it is a matter of public notoriety—a very high estimate of his own rights and dignity, but it strikes me that he does not entertain the same estimate of the rights and dignity of the Senate, although it is the highest legislative body in the land. I am induced to call the attention of the acting leader of the House, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to the subject to-day in consequence of a remark which fell from him during the discussion yesterday when I was not present. The hon. gentleman said that he would take care that the debate of yesterday was reported in the proper quarter, with a view, I presume, of having some satisfactory explanation or apology offered to this House, for the very cavalier manner in which we were treated by the Deputy Governor. I desire, however, chiefly to call the attention of the leader of the House, and of the House itself, to a larger and more important phase of the question discussed yesterday than the discussion itself disclosed. The incidents of the removal of the chair and the want of notice are of themselves very important, and I think involve gross discourtesy to this branch of parliament. I wish to ask the attention of the House and of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in view of the representations he intends to make in the proper quarter, to another and higher phase of the case. I contend, and have always contended, that the Governor General of this country has no higher duty to discharge than when he comes down to this chamber, as one of the three constituent branches of parliament, to give his solemn assent to the laws of the land. I know of no function of the Governor General's high office which is more important and which should be exercised with more solemnity than that function. It is a more important occasion than when the Governor General comes here with so much pomp and ceremony to open the session of parliament. It is true it may be said that in England sometimes, a commission is issued by the sovereign to give assent to Bills and perform other functions of the King as one of the branches of parliament. The three branches of parliament, as all know, are in England the King, Lords and Commons, and in Canada, they are Governor General or the Deputy of the Crown, the Senate, and the House of Commons. I say it may be true that this duty sometimes devolves upon a commissioner in England, but the commissioner then becomes the direct deputy of the King. It is only one remove from the King himself, but here it is very different. The Governor General who I say is the deputy of the King, authorizes his deputy —that is, the deputy of a deputy—to come down here and perform the most essential function of his office.

This is not, in my opinion, treating the Senate and the House of Commons with that respect and consideration to which they are entitled under the spirit of our colonial constitution, and I think according to all the traditions of colonial parliaments. When the Chief Justice comes down, the highest rank he can have is that of Chief Justice, His office as Deputy Governor is not in the table of precedence or titles. He has no special rank under the table of precedence settled by the Crown. The highest rank he can claim is that of Chief Justice, when he comes down under the commission to give his assent to Bills. I am told it is questionable whether the commission was made out yesterday or not. That is a very important matter. If the Deputy Governor came down yesterday before he received his commission and before the commission was made out, to assent to Bills, they may be called in question hereafter. But I say his special rank as Chief Justice, as settled by the Crown, is inferior to that of Speaker of the House, and I think that the chair which is good enough for our Speaker is good enough for any Deputy Governor that may come down for any purpose whatever.

Before passing from this subject I wish to relieve the present Governor General of all blame whatever in regard to the practice which has prevailed in Canada for some years past in regard to the manner of giving the royal assent to Bills. The custom has been on occasions such as yesterday to send down Deputy Governors to do the work of the Governor General. I think it is a bad custom. It originated in the Tory time, and there is too much pomp and frills about it. I do not think it is a custom which the present Governor General would care to adhere to if he thought it was not entirely satisfactory to both branches of parliament; but the present Governor General finds this custom existing and he does not wish to depart from it. He might be accused of wanting to make too ostentatious a display in coming down in person unnecessarily. I suppose that is the light in which the present Governor General looks upon it, because we have seen enough of the present distinguished occupant of the vice regal position to know that he is not a man to desire unnecessary ceremony.

We have other Deputy Governors besides the gentleman who was on the floor of the House yesterday. We have, for instance, the Clerk of the Privy Council. Now suppose the Clerk of the Privy Council comes down here under commission to assent to Bills as he has done previously, what would be thought of his sending a message through a page of the House that he would not come in unless the Speaker's chair was removed and he was given a seat on the Throne? More than that, we have a clerk in the Governor General's office, a Deputy Governor; and it would be just as proper to authorize him by commission to come down here and perform any function that the Deputy of the Governor has the power to perform. Supposing that Mr. Jones, of the Governor General's office, comes to the Senate and goes to the Speaker's chambers, where he has no right to go unless he is invited. He has no right to go there unless with the authority of the Speaker of the House. But supposing Mr. Jones were to come here, authorized under commission to perform certain functions in this House, and he were to send in a message to this House that he would not come in here unless the Speaker's chair was removed, and unless he was given the privileges of the vice regal chair and permitted to occupy the Throne, would not that be a pretty state of things? There is another breach of the privileges of this House, and that is in sending a page with the message. There is only one proper authority to convey messages from the Crown or the representatives of the Crown to either House of parliament. The message sent yesterday to the Speaker was a message to the House. The Deputy of the Governor General has a right to send the message through the sovereign's messenger, Black Rod, and not through a page of the House. Black Rod is specially appointed for the purpose of conveying messages from the Crown to the Houses of parliament, and it was his duty to deliver the message to Black Rod. I do not care to remark upon the extraordinary eccentricities of the gentleman on the floor yesterday. They are matters of notoriety in this country, and I venture to say have to some extent brought his high once into ridicule in this country. His predecessor, who was admittedly a great lawyer—which the present Chief Justice is not supposed to be, although he is very strong on the dignity of his office—frequently came down here and occupied the Speaker's chair and never had any hesitation in doing so. When I was Speaker I laid down the rule that my chair was not to be removed for any Deputy Governor, and that the Deputy Governor should occupy it, and while I was Speaker that rule was adhered to, and I think if the message had been sent to me yesterday, if I had been in the Speaker's chair I should not have consented to it; but I can readily understand that the present Speaker who has been only a short time in the chair, and who has given marked tokens of ability, impartiality and courtesy, of which we all approve—I can readily understand his being taken aback by the extraordinary proceedings of yesterday, and not vindicating the dignity of his position perhaps as strictly as other people might do. I think it would be a good time for the government, as their attention has been called to the subject, to consider the whole matter. Of course in unavoidable cases neither House would object to the high functions of the Governor General being performed by a deputy, but I think where there is no unavoidable necessity, since it is one of the highest functions which the Governor General in this country is called upon to perform as a representative of the Crown as one of the three branches of parliament, that that duty should be performed in person. It would not perhaps be an analogous case, but would it not be most incongruous if the other branch of the legislature should send up its Deputy Speaker with the Sergeant-at-Arms to assent on its behalf to the Bills requiring the royal assent, which has constitutionally to be given in presence of both Houses of parliament. As the matter has been brought under the attention of the government, something may be considered due to both the Senate and the House of Commons as well as to the third branch of parliament; and perhaps a little more care and a little more courtesy would be exhibited in dealing with this House and the House of Commons on such occasions. I believe that the present Governor General would be one of the last men to desire anything that would give occasion for dissatisfaction of a public character, and I believe that he would be met in the most cordial spirit if any steps were taken to remedy the present unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As I intimated yesterday, I entirely concur in the view which was expressed on both sides of the House that there had been a lack of the proper ceremonial and of the formalities which ought to be observed on such occasions as the hon. gentleman has referred to, and I can only repeat the assurance then given that I intend to take—and have already taken—steps to call the attention of the proper authorities to the questions which have been raised. As to the important point which my hon. friend has raised, whether the Governor General being himself in a sense the deputy sovereign, could properly delegate such a matter, I must refer him to the precedents that have occurred. I believe on many occasions a deputy has been authorized to give the royal assent to measures which have passed both Houses.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No doubt about that.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is my recollection, and I think I am correct in that. Other things being equal, I have no doubt the Governor General would discharge that function in person, but he was absent some days from the capital I am told, and could not very conveniently return in time to give the sanction of the Crown to the measures which we have passed. I do not think, however, that at the present moment there would be much gained by prolonging the discussion. I simply repeat the assurance that I have already given to the House that I will take care that this matter is fully represented in the proper quarters.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I rise merely to say that I cannot remain silent after the personal attacks which have been made on the Chief Justice of this country. I well understand the advisability of claiming the privileges of this honourable House and I was one who appreciated the remarks which were offered in that direction yesterday. I doubt, however, if it tends to maintain the dignity of this honourable House to raise the same question too often. It was very properly brought up yesterday, and I think for my part that we might be content with the remarks which were then offered ; but to take occasion, when asserting the dignity of this honourable House, to make aspersions and personal attacks on the Chief Justice of this country is a matter which I cannot for my part listen to without protesting against the remarks which have been made. Exception may be taken to the course which has been adopted by the learned Chief Justice, but with reference to his standing at the bar or on the bench—his qualifications for his office—I think his ability is appreciated all over the country, and that he is not in any way inferior to his predecessors as has been suggested.

The SPEAKER—When I was notified last evening by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod that His Honour the Deputy Governor was claiming the right to the vice-regal chair, I was not unaware of clause 8 of the Forms of Proceeding of the Senate of Canada which reads as follows :

The Deputy Governor being come all rise and do not sit down until he has taken his seat on a chair placed at the foot of the throne.

I was not unaware of this statement being found in our manual of procedure, but took it as an indication of the practice heretofore followed rather than a direction. We have no rule on this question, and I was and am still in doubt as to the right of the Senate to determine it. It was not the time to take the sense of this chamber, and I did not know if the Senate claimed the right to interfere in such a matter. I had no occasion to see what is the procedure followed in the House of Lords, and I do not know with whom it rests to decide what is the proper place of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General when he comes into this chamber.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to mention to the House that I have been approached by several gentlemen on both sides with the proposition that as this House has shown a very commendable spirit of promptitude and brevity in its discussions, which might perhaps be well imitated elsewhere, and as it appears that there is very little likelihood of any business being sent up to us for some time to come, it would meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen on both sides if we were to adjourn to-morrow say for a fortnight. That is a matter of course on which the government feel themselves in the hands of the House. If the House so desire, I will give notice that to-morrow I will move that, when we adjourn, we adjourn for say a fortnight from Tuesday next, if that will meet the views of the House. If there is no objection I should like that this intimation be taken as a notice of motion for to-morrow.

BRITISH CANADIAN EMPIRE LEAGUE BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY DISCHARGED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading Bill (P) An Act to incorporate the British Canadian Empire League.—(Hon. Mr. Domville.)

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for the 6th June.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I regret that the hon. gentleman has seen fit to make this motion of delay the second time. He has this time given no reasons for asking that this Bill remain upon the order paper. It will be recollected that this Bill was first placed upon the order paper as a public Bill, but when the second reading was moved the question was raised and the Speaker's decision given that it was a private Bill, and such being the case, the rules regarding private Bills should be complied with. The hon. gentleman then, I understood, asked as a favour that it should remain upon the paper for a week pending some negotiations with an influential organization which has its headquarters in Toronto who have given notice that they are opposed to the Bill. I do not see myself how any negotiations which may be carried on with that organization can remedy the objection or overcome the objections which were offered to the Bill having its second reading. In any case it would require public notice, and the rules regarding private Bills would have to be complied with. I do not think, from letters which I, with others, have received from the officials of that organization, that there is any probability or even possibility of these negotiations being brought to a successful conclusion. They desire to oppose this Bill and will oppose it if it reaches the committee stage. Under the circumstances I think the hon. gentleman should not ask that it remain on the paper. If he wishes to bring in a Bill of this kind, he should start at the beginning, give the necessary notice, and proceed in the regular way.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—If the hon. gentleman had spoken to me privately I might have consented, but it is too late now. It would suit me to go on to-morrow, but the adjournment will take place to-morrow. It must come before this honourable House, and I do not think I am asking anything out of the way to fix another day for it. I certainly will on that day lay before this House my views on the measure, and it will be for the House to deal with it. I do not propose to dictate to this honourable House. If the House should come to the conclusion that they do not wish it to go on, I would have no objection to drop the Bill; but before doing so I desire to place my views on record.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It does not matter in the slightest degree whether the delay is till to-morrow or till the 6th of June—the question before us is altogether in regard to the principle involved. This measure comes before us as a private Bill, so declared by the Speaker. No notice has been given of it, no report of the Standing Orders Committee has been made regarding it, and none can be made under the circumstances. Furthermore, when my hon. friend asked for the last postponement he did not say that notice was going to be supplied, nor that the defects in the proceedings were going to be removed in any way. He did not say the Standing Orders Committee were likely to report in favour of it, but he said negotiations were being carried on with some other company or organization and an amalgamation was likely to be effected. What I wish to submit is that no amalgamation with any other society or company, or agreement between them, will affect the question as it stands before us. The Bill has come to us, and it stands in its present position without any notice having been given of its introduction. No report from the Committee on Standing Orders has been received with regard to it, and none can be received under the circumstances. That being the case, I see no reason why the House should be trifled with by postponing the consideration of it and allowing it to have a place on the order paper to which it is not entitled.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another point to which I wish to draw attention. As I understand it, none of the conditions necessary for the presentation of a private Bill have been complied with, and the moment the hon. gentleman would rise to discuss the question the point of order would be taken that it could neither be discussed nor passed, the rules not having been complied with, nor would there be any probability of their ever being complied with; but until they were complied with, and that would be by the suspension of the rules of the House pertaining to the introduction of private Bills and payment of the fee of $200 and expenses—until that is done we are not warranted in discussing it at all, and there is no probability of this Bill being passed this session or even being considered. I think my hon. friend had better at once drop the Bill and waste no more time with it.

Mr. DOMVILLE—I hardly see it in the same light as my hon. friend. We presumed when this Bill was introduced that we were perfectly in order. To bring it in a proper shape we had copied a Bill that had already passed this House. Had we known that it contained objectionable clauses, we would very willingly have withdrawn them. As I say, we desire a private Bill. Of course we are entitled to that, if we cannot get it in the form of a public Bill. We have only to comply with the rules of the House, whatever they may be. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island spoke of this being a company. I did not know it was a company. I thought it was the British Empire League we were discussing.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Organization I said.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I refer to the hon. gentleman from Marshfield.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Society.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It will do no harm to let it stand, and I can get at it in another way if necessary.

The SPEAKER—Is a point of order raised ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I raised a point of order that the Bill must be dropped. We cannot put it on the order paper for a future day, there having been no petition.

The SPEAKER—I am not prepared to say there has been no petition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am informed that the fee for a private Bill has not been paid, neither has the expense of printing been paid, consequently the Bill ought to be dropped.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Notice was given, and a petition was presented in a proper order.

The SPEAKER—I think the second point is well taken, but the first point raised by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield was based on an erroneous impression. As far as my recollection goes, I decided that this was a private Bill, but the hon. gentleman was trying to transform it into a public Bill although he had preceded it by a petition, so that there is no question that the formality of notice has been complied with, I doubt, however, if the hon. gentleman can proceed with the second reading, since I am informed that no money was paid for the printing as there should have been.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Nor the fee.

The SPEAKER—Rule 55 says :

> Any person seeking to obtain a private Bill shall deposit with the Clerk of the Senate, eight days before the meeting of Parliament, if it is intended that the Bill shall originate in the Senate, a copy of such Bill in the English or French language, with a sum sufficient to pay for the translation of the same by the officers of the Senate and the printing of 600 copies in English and 200 in French.

I am informed by the clerk of the Senate that this rule has not been complied with.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I never was asked for any fees, thinking it was a public Bill. I think we have a right to pay that $200 at any time.

The SPEAKER—I am not speaking of the $200 ; I am speaking of the preliminary disbursement for printing.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I never heard of that ; we are willing to pay it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My point is that no notice was given.

The SPEAKER—I understand the hon. gentleman to say that it was introduced as a public Bill.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILE—Yes.

The SPEAKER—Then I declare that the Bill must be dropped.

AN ERROR IN THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to call the attention of the House to an irregularity in the minutes. Yesterday when the proceedings were suspended on the arrival of the Deputy Governor, the motion before the House and which was under discussion was the Bill relating to labour union labels. The hon. member from Welland (Hon. Mr. Gibson) was speaking at the time, and he moved the adjournment of the debate until to-day. According to rule 12 :

An Order of the Day which at the adjournment is under consideration shall stand first on the order of the following day next after orders to which precedence has been assigned under this rule; unless the Senate shall order otherwise.

I think, therefore, that order should appear first on the Orders of the Day. It stands last on the list, and appears as if the second reading had never been moved. The entry should appear 'adjourned debate.'

The SPEAKER—The point taken by the hon. gentleman is correct ; this should have been the first Order of the Day, and it should appear as an adjourned debate.

LABOUR UNION LABELS BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading Bill (10) An Act respecting labour union labels.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS said : This Bill was under discussion yesterday on my motion that it be read the second time. The hon. gentleman from Welland moved the adjournment of the debate, and I find on the orders that it stands for second reading. It should be a continuation of the debate.

The SPEAKER—That is the point to which the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) has just called attention.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (Windsor)—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from Welland (Hon. Mr. Gibson), I move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that the debate be proceeded with to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—This Bill has been before the Senate on several occasions. Having charge of the Bill, I consented to have it postponed from day to day with a view to meeting the wishes of hon. gentlemen who desire to take part in the discussion. We had it arranged for discussion yesterday, and the debate was adjourned until to-day. The hon. gentleman who moved the adjournment should be here if he wishes to continue the debate. If he cannot be present, others should be allowed to proceed with the debate and let the Bill be read a second time.

Hon. Mr. FROST—Yesterday when the hon. member for Welland was speaking on this Bill the Deputy Governor arrived unexpectedly, and he was obliged to move the adjournment of the debate. He was suddenly called to Montreal to-day, but will be back to-morrow prepared to resume his speech. He is very anxious to complete his speech. I would, therefore, ask the indulgence of this honourable House to further postpone the debate until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the order was postponed until to-morrow.

THIRD READING.

Bill (E) An Act for the relief of Arthur Howe Hersey.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, May 18, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

FARMERS' BANK OF CANADA BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (No. 124) An Act respecting the Farmers' Bank of Canada, with one amendment. He said: 'I have to explain that the amendment consists in expunging clause No. 3, which rendered lawful and binding acts and agreements entered into by the directors in the interval. The Act itself consists of a provision for the extension of the period during which the Farmers' Bank of Canada can be organized ; and the third clause was expunged because the committee was not cognizant of what acts and agreements might exist.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved concurrence in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved :

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 6th June next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH EDITION OF MILITIA RULES AND REGULATIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Is it the intention of the government to cause a translation to be made immediately of the Rules and Regulations of the Militia in force under the name of the King's Regulations for Canada, and to cause this translation to be distributed to the French officers of the Canadian militia before the opening, next month, of the training camps ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The first part of this inquiry has been already answered, vide page 34 of the Senate debates. It is expected that the French edition of the regulations will be ready for distribution next month.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF R. AIME TISON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have here an answer to a question by Mr. Desjardins, which I will lay on the table. The inquiry is as follows :

By Mr. DESJARDINS :

1. Did one R. Aimé Tison obtain from the government a position in the Dominion Printing Bureau ?
2. If so, at what date ?
3. What is his salary ?
4. On whose recommendation was he so appointed ?
5. Has the said Tison passed the Civil Service examinations ?

The reply is as follows :

1. Yes.
2. On May 1, 1905.
3. $18 a week.
4. On the recommendation of the hon. the Secretary of State.
5. He is employed as a proofreader on weekly wages and not as a civil servant. No civil service examination is required.

AN IRREGULARITY IN THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the House to what I think is an irregularity in our minutes of proceedings. Yesterday the first Order of the Day was the second reading of the Bill to incorporate the British Canadian Empire League. A question of order was raised and a decision was given, and the Bill, in accordance with that decision, disappeared from the Orders of the Day. Nothing of these proceedings appears to-day in our minutes. By reference to the journals of former years it will be seen that all such decisions have been entered in our records, in proof of which I will cite a few precedents which I found after very little search.

On the 3rd of June, 1898, on a simple motion which I made myself, a question of order was raised under rule 14 of the Senate, that the said motion being prefaced by a written preamble cannot be received. His Honour the Speaker ruled that the point of order was well taken and that the motion was therefore out of order. All this is recorded in the minutes.

In the same year there is a case where the title and the first and only clause of a Bill being read, it was moved in amendment:

That the words 'And the company's land subsidy shall apply to the line hereby authorized,' at the end of said clause be struck out.

A question of order being raised, that the amendment proposed to alter the disposition made by the Bill of certain public lands and so to change the subsidy which the House of Commons have decided to offer for the construction of the line of railway mentioned in the Bill, and that the Senate have no power to make such change ;

The chairman came to the conclusion that he should report the point of order to His Honour the Speaker for his ruling.

The House was resumed and the Hon. Mr. Clemow, from the said committee, reported the said point of order raised in the committee, and the Hon. the Speaker gave his ruling thereon, as follows :

The SPEAKER—It has been maintained during the discussion of the point of order that the Senate had no right to interfere with Bills which increased the expenditure of money.

The whole of the Speaker's decision, the first words of which I have just read, will be found in the Journals of the House for the 7th June, 1898. The Bill did not disappear at that time, but that amendment was set aside.

On the 11th June of the same year, on Bill (173) being presented to the House, it was moved by the Hon. Mr. Power, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Perley :

That the words 'and for each session of parliament hereafter held' in the first and second lines of the first section, be struck out.

Upon a question of order arising that the Bill under discussion being a money Bill, it cannot be amended by the Senate :

His Honour the Speaker ruled that the point of order was well taken.

This also is entered in our Journals. In the year 1895 I find the following :

Pursuant to the Orders of the Day, the Bill (150) intituled 'An Act respecting the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company,' was read a second time.

A question being raised that the 4th clause of the Bill is out of order ;

His Honour the Speaker ruled that said clause is out of order inasmuch as a provision affecting a private Act and private interests cannot properly form part of a public Bill.

In all those precedents the decision of the Speaker is given in the Journals. Then in 1897 I find the following :

The Order of the Day being read for the second reading of the Bill (68) intituled ' An Act respecting the American Bank Note Company,' the Honourable Mr. Clemow moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Casgrain,

That the eighteenth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Orders, on the petition of the American Bank Note Company be referred back to the said committee with instructions to report in favour of the suspension of the 49th rule of the Senate, in so far as the same regards the said petition.

A point of order being raised on the said motion, His Honour the Speaker ruled that the said motion requires an intermediate day's notice under the thirteenth rule.

Then on motion of the Honourable Mr. Clemow, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Casgrain, it was ordered that the same be postponed until to-morrow.

The Bill did not disappear from the order paper, but it was moved that the second reading be postponed to a future date.

With all those precedents, I think mention should be made in the Journals of the Senate of what took place in this House, and I call the attention of the House to it so that our Journals may be corrected.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman calls our attention to these precedents for our guidance in the future. I am informed that a decision was given when Sir Alphonse Pelletier was Speaker in 1900 or thereabouts, that those decisions of the Speaker should henceforth appear in ' Hansard ' and not in the Journals.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg the hon. Speaker's pardon, it was in regard to a question that arose in a debate, and not a question affecting the Orders of the Day. There is quite a difference between the two.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—A similar matter occurred a few weeks ago with reference to this same Bill, and I then called attention to it, and I thought that would prevent the recurrence of the difficulty in future. It must be evident to every hon. gentleman that when a point of order is taken affecting the standing of a Bill in the House, in order to account for the fate of the Bill, the particulars should go on record. Our minutes must be very imperfect if they do not contain any notice of what happened. For the future there must be a clear understanding on this point, that the facts shall appear in the minutes. Of course a ruling by the presiding officer of the House on any matter that arises in debate is altogether different.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think in the corrected Journals it should appear.

The SPEAKER—I will examine the point raised and decisions rendered, to see how far they are binding upon this House, and will give instructions to the clerk to have it corrected.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (FF) An Act respecting the Sterling Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (GG) An Act respecting the Brandon, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Should there not have been notice and a suspension of the rule in introducing a private Bill at this stage of the session. My hon. friend is aware that there is a rule which prevents the introduction of a private Bill at this stage, so many weeks after the beginning of the session.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I ask for the suspension of rule 52. The rules are suspended as far as the petition is concerned, but if it is necessary to suspend the rule on the Bill itself, I will move it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The rules were suspended a few days ago to enable the hon. gentleman to present a petition praying for the incorporation of this company. That having been acquiesced in by the Senate, is it necessary to move the suspension of any rule for the introduction of the Bill ?

The SPEAKER—Rule 52 reads as follows :

No petition for any private Bill (except a Bill of Divorce) is received by the Senate after the first three weeks of each session ; nor may any private Bill be presented to the Senate after the first four weeks of each session ; nor may any report of any Standing or Special Committee upon a private Bill be received after the first six weeks of each session.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Standing Orders Committee are continually recommending an extension of the time for introducing Bills. I do not know whether the time has expired or not, but we extended it a good while ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does not the Senate think that at this stage of the session it is about time we stopped rescinding motions and suspending rules ? What is there that caused this delay to justify the action we are now taking in suspending the rules for the introduction of a Bill to establish a new bank. I think the Senate is entitled to some explanation of that kind before we suspend our rules in the indiscriminate method we have been following.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There are too many suspensions altogether.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Senate should be informed of the reasons why the parties interested have delayed for four months after the meeting of parliament before deciding to ask for the incorporation of a new bank. I am not opposing the establishment of any new bank——

Hon. Mr. WATSON—All the information I have is from the solicitor, who told me that he was very anxious to have a Bill passed for the purpose of incorporating this bank. I also have a letter from Mr. Schreiber, who is one of the directors, asking if the House would facilitate the passing of this Bill. That is all the information I have.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Where are the headquarters ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Toronto.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved the adoption of the third report of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I should like to have some explanation from the hon. gentleman. I see that certain papers are not to be printed, among them a statement showing the areas of the provisional districts of the Northwest Territories, the School Ordinances Northwest Territories being chapters 29, 30 and 31, passed in 1901 ; and a summary of legislation relating to subsidies to the provinces. It seems to me these are very valuable documents of much public interest, and that they should be printed.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is the desire of the Printing Committee to cut down the expenses of the printing of parliament; but if any hon. gentleman wishes to have any documents printed he has only to notify the committee to that effect and I am sure every member of the committee will be glad to meet his request. If a copy is sufficient, I will guarantee to have a copy furnished; if more than a copy is required, I will bring the matter before the committee, and I am sure they will order it to be printed.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It seems to me these papers are in the nature of historical documents and therefore of public interest; and they should appear at least in the sessional papers.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. gentleman is a member of the Printing Committee, and he must be aware that no one on that committee has ever refused a request to have a document printed.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I do not make these remarks as a complaint.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to make a request I will see that it is brought before the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I fully concur with the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Bernier) that these documents should be printed for general circulation, because they will be looked for by all who take an interest in the western provinces. The chairman has made the suggestion that if my hon. friend from St. Boniface will make a note of what he wants and hand it to him, he will bring it up at the next meeting of the Printing Committee, and will ask to have the documents printed.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—There is nothing final in these recommendations. If it is the desire of any member to have documents printed, the committee will act on the request. The committee deal with the documents that come before them, and present their report; but should any desire be expressed to have any particular document printed, the request will be readily complied with.

LABOUR UNION LABELS BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 10) An Act respecting Labour Union Labels.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I desire to thank the House for their indulgence in agreeing to a postponement of this debate yesterday, because every member of the House is aware of the circumstances under which the debate was curtailed. I was going on to speak with regard to the accusation made by some hon. members, particularly the hon. member from Hawkesbury (Hon. Mr. Cloran), that this House was opposed to trades unions; and I made myself clear on that point. I said that no man who was a good workman ought to remain outside of the union of the trade to which he belongs. In some way the newspapers took me up wrongly and represented me as remarking that men who were good workmen were opposed to trade unions. I have had too much experience to hold such an opinion, and the papers have been kind enough to make the correction. I have before me what I said—that a man who does not belong to a trades union is either incapable of doing his work or an inferior workman; and I added that I held it to be the duty of every workman to belong to a union of his craft. It will be seen that this House, myself included, are not opposed to trades unions. I have had too much experience of them to take such a position. But while we are agreeable to have trades unions in this country, what we object to—and what was objected to more particularly when this matter was discussed in the Senate before—are the international trades unions, whereby outside parties can come to this country and stop our industries which might be perhaps competing keenly with similar industries in the United States. An unscrupulous man could be hired by parties in the United States to come over and make trouble and strikes amongst the workingmen here, and thus paralyze the competing industry in Canada. What we do object to is the international trades unions. I held, and I hold now, that Canada is big enough and the workmen in Canada are numerous enough to have trades unions of our own. While I have always agreed, sometimes reluctantly perhaps, with my men in matters in dispute as to wages and hours, after that was settled, I objected, and always will object, to any body of men attempting to regulate the way in which I shall carry on my business ; and it is such interference that this Bill proposes to legalize. I have under my hand numerous petitions and objections to the Bill as it stands. The trades unions are asking for certain powers from this parliament. I was speaking, when my remarks were interrupted by the arrival of His Excellency for the time being, about the different trades that would be affected by this Bill if it came into operation. I was showing that bricks which might even have been made by men receiving union wages, but which had not the union mark or the union label upon them, would not be laid by union bricklayers. If this city, for instance, proposed to extend its water main, they might find it necessary to invite public tenders to supply pipes. The city would naturally accept the lowest tender under the best conditions. They might in good faith accept a tender from abroad, but when the pipes arrive, if they have no union label on them, the union workmen would not lay them ; and the city would be handicapped by the fact that it had bought pipes without the union label. This Bill would not affect water pipes alone. If a man wanted to shingle his house the carpenters would not lay the shingles if they did not have the union label on them.

These are things which should cause this House to pause ; and I am surprised at my hon. friend's eagerness to have this Bill pass the second reading. He was so eager that he would hardly allow the discussion to be postponed because I happened to be away yesterday. I have shown how the Bill will affect certain industries. Take, for instance, the laying of slates—no union slater would lay slates on a roof if they did not have the union label. In the same way, no plumber would touch plumbing goods that did not bear the union label. You might go into a store to purchase a collar ; that collar must have the union label upon it. Are we to authorize any corporate body for twenty-five years to put its stamp on the collars that we have to wear, possibly collars made abroad ? The same with our hats, our gloves, our ties—yea, even the packages containing these goods—all must have the union label upon them ; and, as if that were not enough, even the packing case must have the union label upon it. I have under my hand objections from tradesmen, as well as manufacturers and others, who do not want to be handicapped by this legislation. Lest the hon. gentleman should think that I am stretching matters, let me assure the House that I have not touched the fringe of the effect that this legislation would produce if it should go into effect. I read in this morning's Montreal 'Gazette' a paragraph describing an incident which occurred at a banquet in New York. Mr. John Mitchell, one of the ablest union men in the United States, the man who, after everybody else had failed, settled the question between the coal owners and the coal workers on a satisfactory basis, was invited recently to a banquet, and here is what a paper says about him :

> Fault having been found with John Mitchell because he attended a banquet of the Civic Federation of New York and ate non-union bread,—

Just imagine that the waiters in a hotel would refuse to bring you bread because it had not the union label on it. Here is a man who has done more for trades unionism than all the workingmen in Canada or the United States ; and yet after all he has done for labour and the uplifting of his fellow workmen, he is censured because at a public banquet he committed the heinous crime of eating bread that had not the union label on it. Mitchell has retorted that he is not such a churl as to rise and ask at a banquet if the bread being served bore the union label. There is no man who will not appreciate the force of Mr. Mitchell's retort. I say it is lowering to the dignity of labour that a man at either a public banquet or in a private house should be expected to ask his host or hostess if the bread or the butter put before him bore the union label, before he would touch it. Yet that will be the effect of the legislation these gentlemen ask the Senate to impose on the country for 25 years. The article continues :

> Mr. Mitchell's answer is inadequate. He should have investigated before accepting an invitation to attend, and he should not have drawn the line at bread either. He should have demanded from the hotel steward an affidavit that all the materials used in the preparation of the meal, the table on which it was served, the building in which the banquet was held, were uncontaminated with non-union hands. Then, being assured that all the guests would wear union-made clothes, have union ideas, and that the speeches would be union speeches, he might in fear and trembling have consented to attend.

This perhaps is a little satirical, but it is just the idea these men would have of imposing on the country if they could accomplish their purpose. We have given our consent to have unions. The men have agreed upon certain wages, and to work certain hours—then for goodness sake stop at that point, and let the tradesmen and manufacturers have a chance to run their own business without being dictated to as they would be under the legislation asked for under this Bill.

I am astonished that any man in this House would even ask for the second reading of the Bill, but I do not want to be alone, and I want to hear what new arguments can be offered to reconcile this honourable body to such a condition of things as they ask the people of Canada to accept at the hands of this House. I shall be glad to attend the meetings of the committee to which the Bill is to be referred, but I feel satisfied that the Bill proposes to put into the hands of unscrupulous men a power that will be wielded to the disadvantage of every man who lives in Canada. It is not the workingmen we are afraid of, but the agitators who rule and antagonize and boss them and encourage strikes, disorders and bloodshed. When this matter was before the House last time, I read the decision of the stonecutters union in the United States that no member of the union should belong to the volunteer force. What did that mean? That if union men were to become volunteers, they might be called upon to protect the lives and property of innocent people; and this might conflict with their own interests. Is that a condition of things we should accept from those who are promoting this Bill? I give my hon. friend from Saskatchewan credit for having the good sense when introducing this Bill, to apologize for it. The Bill should not receive the assent of this House.

As long as I have the honour of holding a seat in the Senate, I am prepared to deal fairly and squarely with the workingmen. I have been in public life for 15 years and have been connected with workingmen all my life. I served my time, rose from the ranks and became an employer of men; and I have never had a difficulty with my men that I could not settle with them myself. If I could not do so no outside power could compel me to submit to its dictation. Why should we give encouragement to such vicious legislation as this Bill asks for?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The House is thin, and the principle involved in this Bill is an important one. I think it would be as well to adjourn the debate until the attendance is fuller, and better consideration can be given to the measure. I therefore move that this debate be adjourned until the 7th of June.

The motion was agreed to.

Bill (92) An Act respecting the New York and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. McSweeney.)

SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, June 6, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BRANDON, SASKATCHEWAN AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

PETITION PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, reported the petition of the Brandon, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company asking leave to introduce a Bill, and moved that the rules be suspended, and that leave be granted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman explain why this petition is presented?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The company have had a Bill passed and they find it contains a word or two requiring amendment. They ask for the suspension of the rules to permit them to present a petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This suspension should be recommended by the Standing Orders Committee. Is it to obtain permission to present a petition ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The House in the past has followed two courses in this respect after the expiration of the time for presenting petitions. One is to present a petition asking leave to present a petition, and the other is to ask for a suspension of the rules and present a petition directly. The latter course has been followed very recently. In this case matters have arisen recently requiring legislation, and the parties have come to parliament to get relief. In the case of a petition with reference to a patent, reported by the committee to-day, it appears that by a change in the law a few years ago the practice which prevailed in the past is not available to those who have the patent on which they thought they had a six months' extension of time, so that there are various reasons relating to these petitions. However, with reference to the practice, it is only under a suspension of the rules that this petition can be directly presented without petitioning for leave to present a petition. The other is the shorter course by far, and seems to have met with the approval of the House a great many times. That is no doubt the reason why this course is followed to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not object to the suspension of the rules merely ; what I want to bring to the attention of the chamber is this—if there is no urgency the Bill could follow its regular course. We could have a report of the Standing Orders Committee and proceed as our rules indicate. If the Governor General were coming to sanction the Bill and it required to be expedited so as to be passed in time for the Royal assent, I can understand that the rules should be suspended without notice ; but if there is nothing of that kind, I see no reason why we should not follow the rules.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend is absolutely right. The only urgency at the present time is that these Bills are originating in the Senate and will have to go through the same course in both Houses. We do not know how long the session may last, but surely we are drawing nearer to the end of it than we were some months ago, and it is as well to lose no time.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW SENATOR.

The Hon. Wm. Ross, of Halifax, was introduced to the Senate.

GRAIN INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT introduced Bill (HH) an Act to amend the Grain Inspection Act as regards the selection of commercial grades and samples.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that the Bill be read the second time on Thursday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the Bill be printed in sufficient time to enable those who are interested in the subject to become acquainted with its provisions ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It consists of a single clause, and the object of it is to permit the Grain Standards Board, under certain conditions, to appoint a committee of their number to discharge certain functions which heretofore by law have been performed by the whole board.

The motion was agreed to.

CELEBRATION OF THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF NELSON.

MOTION DROPPED.

The Order of the Day being called :

By the Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE :

That he will move that the Senate shall take into consideration a proposal for a suitable celebration, by the parliament and people of Canada, of the centennial anniversary of the death of Nelson, the hero of the British navy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Stand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think there is a rule that when an hon. gentleman is not here to make his motion it should be dropped. I am rendering a service to the hon. gentleman in asking that this motion be allowed to drop.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I think that in the absence of the hon. gentleman who placed the motion on the order paper, we should allow it to stand as an act of ordinary courtesy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman is authorized by the hon. mover of the motion to make that request, all right. If he is not so authorized, the motion should drop.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I may say that during the recess I received a letter from the hon. gentleman in charge of this matter, stating that he was afraid that he could not be present at the opening of the Senate on the 6th instant. He was writing because he wished to know if there would be any meeting of the Railway Committee——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman should read the motion before speaking. His remarks are altogether out of order.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I stand corrected.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I saw the hon. gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville), and he told me that he would never move that motion, therefore it is just as well to let it drop.

The SPEAKER—The contrary has been the practice from my observation, but, accepting the statement from the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, I would say that the Order of the Day should be dropped.

The motion was allowed to drop.

CANCELLATION OF CONCESSIONS IN THE YUKON.

INQUIRY DROPPED.

The Order of the Day being called :

By Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) :

Inquiry of the government if the following concessions in the Yukon mining districts have been cancelled, or if any of them are worked and paying the stipulated rent, royalty or license :

	Acres.
The Boyle concession..	25,600
Bronson & Ray concession..	5,120
Matson & Doyle concession..	1,920
Boyle Quartz Creek concession.. ..	1,920
Herman concession..	3,840
Anderson concession..	2,560
In all..	40,960

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I believe the concessions in the Yukon which have not lapsed, have passed to a syndicate to be worked by British and French capital ; and, therefore, I ask that this inquiry be dropped for the present.

The inquiry was allowed to drop.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (28) An Act to incorporate the Northwest Telephone and Telegraph Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (114) An Act respecting the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (116) An Act respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

THE VIBERT DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN moved the adoption of the 29th report of the Standing Committee on Divorce to whom was referred Bill (J) An Act for the relief of Philip Vibert. He said : The evidence taken before the Committee on Divorce fully and clearly established the truth of the allegation in the Bill. The committee had no difficulty whatever in agreeing upon the point, and they have unanimously recommended that the relief prayed for be granted.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was then read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER DISCHARGED.

The Order of the Day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole on (Bill D) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, as regards the free transportation of senators and members of the House of Commons.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—With the consent of the House, I should like this Bill to be dropped. I understand that the railway companies have been informed by the clerk of the Senate that he has been instructed to prepare a form of certificate, and that they have declared themselves perfectly satisfied with the certificate which is now being presented to the senators. I therefore ask the honourable House to allow this Order of the Day to be discharged.

The Order of the Day was discharged.

SUPPLY BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certain estimates, to cover disbursements for the current year, have passed the House of Commons. The amounts have to be paid during the current month, and it was expected that the bill would be here before four o'clock. It has not reached the Senate yet, and I will ask the House to adjourn during pleasure, or to fix an hour later on. The reason I am asking the Senate not to defer consideration until to-morrow is that His Excellency has made arrangements to go to Quebec to-morrow and he would like to assent to this Supply Bill in person.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not be well to adjourn until 5.30. That would allow us time to discuss it before six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the House adjourn until 5.30 p.m.

The motion was agreed to.

The House resumed at 5.30 p.m.

SUPPLY BILL No. 1.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was read from the House of Commons with Bill (168) An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1905, and the 30th June, 1906.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It seems to be the fate of all governments that no matter what provision parliament makes for the expenditure for the coming year, there are always supplementary supply Bills for the current year. In some instances possibly the vote granted by parliament has been in excess of the actual requirements, and in regard to other items it has been found insufficient. The amount of the supplementary estimates for the current year—that is the year terminating on the 30th June next—is $6,364,522. The principal items are, first under the head of charges of management, the sum of $25,000 for the printing of additional Dominion notes. As hon. gentlemen know, the circulation has been deficient and consequently additional notes have been printed. Then there is the sum of $94,000 for legislation, chiefly for the House of Commons, and $20,000 for the Senate. There is an amount of $306,000 for immigration and $245,000 for militia. Then for the Intercolonial on capital account there is the sum of $450,000, and for the National Transcontinental Railway $200.000. For public works a considerable sum is asked—$648,000. The principal items in connection with that are for the improvement in the St. Lawrence ship channel, over $100,000, and to provide for permanent piers in Lake St. Peter and other places in the ship channel, $115,000. There is an item of $160,000 for dredging in the maritime provinces.

In addition, as appears by the Bill, the House of Commons has already voted a portion of the estimate for the coming year (amounting I may say, in round numbers, to $50,000,000)—they have already passed $37,374,535.62. That vote is included in this Bill.

I may say for the information of the House, in reference to the vote for the current year, which is the one we will first consider, that it adds to the vote of parliament at the last session, $6,379,000, making a total, with the amounts voted last session, of $81,551,401. I move the suspension of rules 17 and 41 as far as they relate to this Bill, in order to proceed with it at the present sitting, as it would be a convenience to His Excellency if he could leave Ottawa in pursuance of his arrangement to-morrow. If the Bill passes to-day the House could meet at ten minutes before three to-morrow, and the Royal assent could then be given to this Bill and to a number of other measures which have been passed by both branches of parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not necessary to discuss the details of this Bill. We cannot amend it; all we can do is to accept or reject it, and I do not suppose the Senate feels inclined to throw out the measure. The supplementary estimates for this fiscal year exceed $6,000,000. It strikes me that the Finance Minister could have given very little consideration to the subject when he presented the Supply Bill last year. It is very seldom we have had supplementary estimates showing an expenditure exceeding $6,000,000, over and above the main Supply Bill. However that is a matter we may be able to discuss more intelligently when we have the full amount of the supplies before us, and can see what proposals are made for expenditure during the coming year.

According to the statement made by the hon Secretary of State, the expenditure for the year now ending exceeds $81,000,000. Whether that amount covers all the expenditure for the current year, we do not yet know. It is probable we will have an additional supplementary estimate to cover any deficiency caused by over-expenditure of the estimates for the current year. What I desire more particularly to bring to the attention of the House, is some remarks made in the debate which took place in the other chamber on estimates affecting this House. The apparent ignorance of the Finance Minister and other members of the government struck me as being not only peculiar but not creditable to themselves and certainly not flattering to this House. When it was proposed to vote a supplementary sum of $15,000 for the Senate, Mr. Bergeron asked what that was for; strange to say, the Finance Minister. whose duty it was to know, could not give any reason why that amount was to be voted, but simply replied 'nobody'—that is, nobody could give any information. That struck me as so singular a position for the Finance Minister to take, that when I read the report in the newspapers, I wrote at once to the clerk of the Senate, asking how it was that the item of $15,000 in the supplementary estimates, to cover a deficiency in the current year's expenditure, could be supplied to the Finance Minister without any information as to the purpose for which it was required. The accountant in reply sent me a statement showing every cent that was required to make up the $15,000. That estimate, I am informed, was sent to the Secretary of State, who, I presume, in the exercise of his functions when asking the government for that sum to meet the extra expenditure of this House, laid it before the Finance Minister, yet we find the minister in a jocular and rather contemptuous manner speaking of it as though he knew nothing about it. 'I really think,' said the Finance Minister, 'we will have to take these items as being self-explanatory, for I am not able to give any explanation that is not set forth in the estimates.' All that was set forth in the estimates was the bare item, giving us $15,000. Further on the Finance Minister says: 'These items are sent to us by the officers of the Senate and we can hardly do anything more than accept them. The Senate is rather sensitive about our inquiring about what it does with its leather trunks.'

I do not know why we should be any more sensitive than the commoners upon that question. They get their trunks also; it is the law of the land, and I do not know that it is necessary that we should explain to the House of Commons what we do with our trunks so long as we take them. It seems to me that it is treating a subject of this kind with levity unbecoming the Finance Minister and unbecoming also to the dignity of this House. Then the discussion ran on as to how long the session would last, and the remark was made by the Finance Minister: 'Perhaps if they (the Senate) sat more frequently, they would not want so much for contingencies.' If the Senate did not sit as many days and as many hours as the Commons, I think the country should know that that was not our fault. The members of the other House have occupied the time talking day in and day out on questions before them, and no business has been sent to this House, for our consideration. If there had been any important measures which the government could have introduced here, they would have been dealt with by the Senate. just as well as by the House of Commons. I have long been of the opinion, and have expressed it repeatedly, that the government should, while the Lower House is discussing questions of finance and supply, introduce important measures here where they could receive due and full consideration. I venture to say that in this House measures affecting the general interests of the country receive a consideration that is not always given to them by the more popular branch of parliament.

At a later date,—only yesterday,—a question arose again in connection with the expenditure of the Senate. An estimate for $76,576, for salaries and contingent expenses of the Senate was moved in supply, when an explanation was asked for. The Finance Minister not being present—being more congenially occupied in trying to convince the electors of London how they should vote—the Prime Minister had to act for him, and the only explanation which that right hon. gentleman could give was to repeat what has very often been said: 'It is a growing time.' He continued: 'The only explanation furnished to me is that these estimates are prepared by a committee of contingencies of the Senate.' Beyond that, no information could be given to the House of Commons. One of the members said, without mentioning names, that he thought the representatives of the people were entitled to know how the public money was expended. The right hon. leader of the government at once acknowledged that, and he was quite correct. The people who pay the money and the Lower House who have to make the appropriations, have a right to know, not only the amounts required, but the purposes for which they are to be expended. There was one feature of the discussion, however, that the members of the Senate may congratulate themselves upon, and that is when the Prime Minister was asked as to the character of the men who were being called to the Senate, as to how old they were and so on, the Prime Minister answered that he thought the probabilities were that they were old enough to have cut their wisdom teeth. I am inclined to think we are all in that position, and our only regret is that we have not the same number now that we had when we commenced cutting them. He was asked a further question as to the reforming of the Senate, and was accused of having made certain statements and threats in the past as to the reformation which was to have taken place, even to the abolition of it. The gratifying portion of the reply of the Prime Minister is his answer to that question, which was jocularly and sarcastically put to him by a member of the Commons. He said:

'That was not my view. My hon. friend knows me too well. That was the view of some of my hon. friends and not my own.'

That is, that the Prime Minister never intended to reform the Senate out of existence. Nature has been doing a great deal for him in changing the political complexion of this chamber, and so long as that process continues, I have no doubt the party who desire to reform the Senate by reforming it out of existence will be quite satisfied, however much we may regret—and even my hon. friend no doubt personally will regret—the absence of a large number of those whom we have been in the habit of meeting in the past. Reverting to the discussion regarding the item of $15,000 required for the purposes of the Senate, I think the jocular manner of treating questions of this kind is unbecoming the dignity of the Finance Minister, and certainly is not either creditable or respectful to this House; and I cannot believe it possible that the Secretary of State failed to lay before his colleagues the detailed statement of the various sums required to meet the $15,000 deficiency in the Senate. It must have been a lapse of memory on the part of the Finance Minister when he made the statement that he had no information, and that nobody could tell what the money was for. I may say, however, to the credit of the late Speaker of the House of Commons, the present Minister of Inland Revenue, that he did give a partial explanation, which I suppose he would infer from the state of affairs in the House of Commons, that the extra amount was required to conduct the business owing to the length of the session. That was a reasonable explanation, but I repeat that I think the Finance Minister ought to have known the details of the estimate which he was asking the Commons to grant, as he had before him the statement sent to him by the officials of this House, for I have no doubt the Secretary of State, who is the leader of the House must have laid the statement before the government or the sum would not have been placed in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am afraid I cannot make any comment on the criticisms of my hon. friend, feeling that they are somewhat deserved. The only explanation I can give is that among the multitudinous papers with which the Finance Minister is deluged he was unable to find the details of the expenditure of this House. The clerk of the Senate sends a copy not only to the Secretary of State, but also direct to the Finance Department, so they have not only a copy, but also the paper that I furnished to Council, and my only apology is that it was probably mislaid, because I know very well that frequently those papers are supplied and afterwards lost. In regard to the estimates for my own department, the first list is frequently lost, and a second one is called for. It is simply due to having too many papers to look after, and not being able to lay his hands on the proper ones at the moment the minister was led, I presume, to make these observations, which I think are probably ill-timed and ill-placed. As to the leather trunks, the House of Commons figures for $6,000 odd in the purchase of leather trunks; so we are not alone in that respect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I forgot to mention that objection was taken to one $25 trunk, and the Finance Minister suggested striking out that item.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time and passed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until ten minutes to three to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 2.50 p.m. to-morrow.

PROPOSED STEAMSHIP SERVICE TO MEXICO.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to:

Ask the government how the negotiations for the proposed steamship service on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans to Mexico now stand?

Whether it is the intention to establish such a service, but if abandoned, what is the reason for such abandonment?

He said: It was pretty well known some months ago that the government were negotiating for a contract with some firm for a steamship service between the Republic of Mexico and the ports on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the Dominion of Canada. Such a step was considered necessary for the extension of commerce and enterprise, yet now we hear that that contract has been cancelled, if it had got the length of a contract—at all events that negotiations are broken off—and that this has been brought about through the interference or the influence of the Postmaster General. On that point I am not in a position to speak either one way or the other, but I do think that with a country like Mexico, with a population of 13,500,000 people, an area of over seven hundred thousand miles of land, and a great deal of commerce, Canada could find an opening for profitable trade. The people of Mexico are progressive. The revenue of that country is rather remarkable; it is about the same as the revenue of the Dominion of Canada, about $70,- 000,000 or $80,000,000, so that the 13,500,000 people living in that country pay about half as much taxation as we do in the Dominion. They have also ten thousand miles of railway and forty-four thousand miles of telegraph lines. The imports amount to $76,000,000 and the exports are about the same as they used to be in Canada some years ago, about $200,000,000; so that with a foreign commerce of these proportions there should be room for considerable trade with the Dominion of Canada. The forest production of mahogany, rosewood and ebony is large and might be exchanged for our forest production of soft woods. The chief imports of the country are textile manufactures, and the chief exports are gold, silver, flax, hemp, coffee, sugar, tobacco, hides, skins, dyestuffs, logwood and other like products, many of which could be utilized in Canada, if commerce were put on a proper basis. All that is required now is to provide facilities for transportation, and the commercial men of this country would then be in a position to promote trade with Mexico.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government are not unaware of the desirability of extending our trade relations with the Republic of Mexico, and they have for some time been carrying on negotiations for that purpose. I might observe in passing that I think my hon. friend, in quoting the statistics which he has just given, has in a good many cases at any rate, quoted the Mexican dollar, which as he knows is worth probably only 45 or 50 cents. I speak under correction, but I think a good many of those statistics are in silver and not in gold. Notwithstanding, I quite agree with him that it is very desirable we should encourage trade with Mexico, more particularly as the Mexican government is almost the first that has offered to co-operate with us on reasonably equal terms. Now, it is the desire of the government of Canada that they should have steamship communication established with Mexico, both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, and I would say to the hon. gentleman that the delay which has occurred in establishing this has not been due to any default on our part, but to a change of policy on the part of the Mexican government. In the first instance the gentlemen who appeared here on behalf of the Mexican government intimated to us that they would greatly prefer to establish a service on the Pacific; and they desired that the bulk of their subsidy, which is $100,000 of their money—roughly equivalent to $45,000 or $50,000 gold—should be applied to the Pacific service. On the strength of that statement we advertised and opened negotiations, but subsequently the Mexican government altered their mind on that point. The House will understand the position better from a letter, a translation of which I hold in my hand, from the President of Mexico. It is dated 8th April, 1905, and addressed to the Premier of Canada. I shall lay this letter on the table, but in the meantime I will read the part which more especially refers to my hon. friend's question. Senor Diaz observes:

> With regard to the line on the Pacific, we have believed it to be advisable to study the question more minutely before accepting some of the propositions made by different enterprises which have solicited the concession; and with this object, when dealing with this point with Sir Wm. Mulock this government insisted on reserving the initiative for the establishment of the said line, counting, as Sir William offered, upon the co-operation of Canada, on the basis indicated in the letters to which you allude.
> You may be assured that not only in matters of lines of communication, but in everything which will harmonize the interest of both countries you will always meet from my government the kindest consideration.
>
> I repeat to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.
> (Sgd.) PORFIRIO DIAZ.

This is a translation, and may not perhaps do justice to the phraseology used by the president of the republic. I may safely say, however, that an Atlantic service will be carried out as originally advertised by us, by means of a line of steamships from Montreal, calling at Charlottetown and Halifax and thence proceeding by way of the Bahamas and Cuba to the Mexican ports. That much I think is now practically accomplished. I should be very glad to be able to say that the Pacific service would be speedily undertaken, but that, as the hon. gentleman will see, rests largely with the Mexican government.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.). I have to thank the hon. gentleman for his very clear explanation of this matter and I am glad to see that the government are carrying on the negotiations. I suppose Mexico will contribute to the Atlantic service.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes. They have voted, as I understand, $100,000 of their money, which is not quite equivalent to $50,000 gold, for a service between Canada and Mexico; and they propose to divert that to the Atlantic in place of applying it as they originally proposed, to a Pacific service; but we are in hopes of obtaining a double subsidy from them—a like sum for the Pacific service, only the hon. gentleman will observe they desire to initiate that service which they regard as more particularly their own. I believe the trouble has partly arisen from the fact that when those gentlemen called on me about a year ago they expected to complete certain lines of railway across Mexico to various ports on the Pacific. Owing to some difficulties, whether financial or engineering I am not quite advised, these projects have not yet materialized, and I believe the government of Mexico are waiting for their completion before proceeding.

FESSENDEN WIRELESS TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

COMMONS' AMENDMENTS REFERRED TO COMMITTEE.

A message was received from the House of Commons rturning Bill (I) and Act to incorporate the Fessenden Wireless Telegraph Company of Canada, with amendments.

The amendments were read to the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The amendments appear to amount practically to the recasting of the entire Bill, and I think they require serious consideration. The hon. gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville), who has charge of the Bill, is not present, but it seems to me that this is a case where the Commons' amendments should be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, who reported the original Bill to this House. The amendments are not such as could very well be considered by the whole House, and I think it would be wiser to refer them to the Railway Committee. I therefore move that the amendments be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)

Bill (84) an Act respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.—(Hon. Mr. Coffey.)

PUBLIC HOUSE TRUSTS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Béique: That in the opinion of the Senate the British Gothenburg' experiments and the establishment of public house trusts in England have materially advanced the solution of the temperance question and of the social reform problem, and that the time has arrived when like experiments should be made and like public house trusts should be established in Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Wilson.)

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Hon. gentlemen will remember that on the 4th May the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) introduced this resolution into the Senate for discussion. It is important and far-reaching in its provisions, and if it can accomplish what we all desire should be accomplished—if it will make the country more sober than it is at the present time—then it should be the duty of every hon. member of this House to do everything in his power to have such a law placed on the statute-books. The hon. gentleman expressed himself strongly in favour of the resolution, and used some strong arguments, the effectiveness of which no one could very well deny. Therefore, I think it is proper that we should consider the matter carefully to ascertain whether the Gothenburg system, if inaugurated in Canada, would conduce to sobriety or not. Many facts were stated by the hon. gentleman and many reasons given why this system should be adopted in this country in the modified form of the public house trust system lately adopted in Great Britain. For my part, I am not yet fully prepared to say whether it should or should not be adopted. If I had the same faith in the Gothenburg system that my hon. friend has, I would regard it as our duty to do all we could to introduce this system into Canada. But we must bear in mind that the Gothenburg system has been in existence a number of years, and although at the time it was first introduced in Sweden there was a great amount of intoxication, the beneficial effects produced were not perhaps so much on account of the system as on account of the feeling of the country generally at that date that the drunkenness previously existing should be done away with. We all know full well that formerly delirium tremens was very prevalent in Sweden. As stated by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, a large amount of spirits was imported into that country, because the general drink was a fiery brandy instead of the milder drinks. My hon. friend referred to the fact that it would be well to do away with the strong spirits and drink more wine or beer ; but I have grave doubts whether it would be in the interests of the country that such a course should be pursued. The amount of spirits drunk at the time in Sweden was enormous. The system under which they carried on their license law enabled everybody almost to obtain a license to sell spirituous liquors. There was an enormous number of distilleries in Sweden, I think some 173,000. Hon. gentlemen can well understand that if there was that many distilleries a very large quantity of liquor must have been produced. We know also that wherever it is in the interest of the hotel-keeper to sell as much liquor as he possibly can, he will hold out every possible inducement to his customers to use spirituous liquors. I think it would be beneficial if we could do away entirely with the profits arising out of the sale of the liquor, and have the traffic so controlled that those who sell it will derive no direct profit. That is the principle of the Gothenburg system to a certain extent. By that system the parties in control of the licensed houses receive six per cent only of the profits. That would do away to a certain extent with the inducement to the license holder to dispose of as much liquor as possible. As I said before, there was an enormous amount of drinking and drunkenness in Sweden, and about the time the Gothenburg system was established there was a great change. But was it the Gothenburg system that accomplished that result ? I hope later on to have an opportunity of showing that it was not the Gothenburg system which caused the great reform in that country.

My hon. friend stated that we had a short time ago been discussing the question of tuberculosis, which was the cause of the death of great numbers of people annually. I think it is generally admitted that drunkenness predisposes to tuberculosis—that the drinking habit reduces the vitality of the human system to such an extent that the disease will be contracted very readily. If that be so, should we not be as anxious to decrease the drinking habit as to do away with tuberculosis ? We should advocate strongly and unitedly any means by which we could reduce the drinking habit. Most diseases I may say are curable. We know that tuberculosis is curable ; and the drinking habit can also be restrained—it can be done away with entirely, and it is our duty to do away with it.

As far as the licensing system in England in concerned, I do not see how that could very materially benefit the people of Canada. I think our licensing system is as good as the licensing system in Great Britain, if not better. I think that any means whereby we encourage and make the drinking habit respectable will result in injury, and will cause many people to become addicted to drinking who otherwise would not. If that be so, is it not necessary that we should avoid making the places where liquor is sold respectable? If people go to an hotel to meet their friends and take their social glass, whether it be wine, beer or strong drink, that is an encouragement to the evil, and young people will acquire the habit of drinking. I do not believe it is a good system to have beer and wine resorts where young people may obtain drinks and thus become more or less addicted to drinking. We know that some of those beers and wines may have seven per cent of alcohol in them—some not so much, and some more. The seven per cent would produce intoxication, and I do not know that it makes any material difference whether a man gets intoxicated by drinking a liquor of which one glass will make him drunk, or whether he takes a larger quantity of wine or beer with a similar result. You might just as well be knocked down by an iron bar as by a basket stick. It simply requires the application of sufficient force. It is the same, in the matter of drinking alcohol, whether you become intoxicated with one drink of strong liquor or whether you become intoxicated by drinking a larger quantity of milder beverages. If I can convince this honourable House that the Gothenburg system is not in any way superior to our own, I think I have done that which should induce hon. gentlemen to say that we ought to adopt some other method than the Gothenburg system. I think I will be able to show that the Gothenburg system has not produced the beneficial effects that were expected. I have here a statement made by a good authority, Mr. Mulhall, upon the drinking habit. He says: 'Now what has been the effect of legislation as a whole ?'—meaning the legislation that took place about the time that I am speaking of, when the Gothenburg system was first inaugurated. The entire population of Sweden in 1830, drank on an average 8·80 gallons per head. In 1840, the average was 8 gallons per head. As I mentioned at the outset, intemperance was very prevalent in Sweden at that time. In 1850, the consumption was 8·40 gallons per head. It was in 1855 that the new liquor law came into operation and by 1860 the average consumption per head of the population had been reduced to six gallons, not by the Gothenburg system, but by the restrictions adopted in the country, local option and prohibition. In 1870, it had dropped to 4·60 gallons per head, and in 1880 to 4·25 gallons per head. I may be told that this was the result of the Gothenburg system. Not at all. You will bear in mind that my hon. friend stated the Gothenburg system was inaugurated in 1865, while by the figures I have quoted it will be seen that the greater reduction in the consumption of liquor took place prior to that time. Mulhall goes on to say :

> And what had the Gothenburg' system to do with this most gratifying result ? That system did not come into operation in Gothenburg itself until 1865 and then not fully, and in other towns not at all until a later date. Hence it could have nothing whatever to do with the reduction—the greatest reduction of all—which took place between 1855 and 1860, and almost nothing with that which was brought about between 1860 and 1870. That is, the system which has been and is being pressed upon the English public on account of the enormous advantages which it is alleged to have produced, was not in operation at all before 1865, and had next to nothing to do with the reduction which in 1870 was shown to have occurred, and the mixed system of restriction and prohibition which exclusively did effect that great reduction—a reduction from 8·40 to 4·60 gallons per head—is treated as if it were non-existent.

I might go on and give further evidence of that nature, but it is unnecessary to do so. We all recognize the fact that Canada to-day is perhaps the most sober country under the sun. If we were to adopt the necessary means to produce a temperance sentiment and thus carry temperance legislation into effect, we would have no cause to complain. There is another thing to which I wish to refer. The hon. member from Mille Iles (Mr. David) said it was necessary that beer and wine should be used as nourishment. He referred to the fact that in a cold climate where there is an excess of oxygen the Esquimaux and other inhabitants require to take oil, which acts as a fuel or food. We know that oil serves to keep up the animal heat, and we can well understand why the Esquimaux uses it, but why does he also use sawdust with it ? Is it because sawdust is a food ? No, but because the sawdust acts as a stimulant and furnishes bulk upon which the stomach can act. Now is oil really a food and is that the reason why the Esquimaux take it ? The man from whom my hon. friend quoted must have been mistaken, because if I understood his speech correctly he said that the oxygen uniting with the oil in the system produced carbonic acid. I think that must have been a mistake, because the oxygen unites with the oil or carbon and thereby keeps up the animal heat so that the system will not call upon the deposit of fat in various parts of the body to keep up the animal heat. That is why the Esquimaux uses it. I deny emphatically the theory that spirits of any kind, whether wine, beer or anything else, is essential as a food. I say it merely unites with the oxygen in the system to keep up the animal heat and perhaps during the period when it is taken into the system the oxygen does not enter into the conversion of the fats of the system to the same extent.

If these be facts, and we know that they are facts, are we going to lay aside a system that is acting well in our country to adopt one that has not proven a success in other countries ? I am well aware that it is said prohibition cannot be enforced. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State introduced a law many years ago, and the Dominion of Canada to-day ought to feel grateful to him for having inaugurated it. Let that law be put into operation. It is a measure which has saved thousands of lives on account of the restriction it imposed on the consumption of liquor. It has done more to do away with intemperance than all other schemes combined. Why are we told that the Scott Act, or prohibition has not been a success ? It really has been a success. It has not been absolutely in force, but is there any law on the statute book which can be entirely enforced ? Are we for that reason to condemn them ? We know that the Scott Act has done away with a great deal of drunkenness, and the same result has followed restriction and prohibition in Sweden, Norway and other countries. I believe that neither beer, wine or any kind of spirituous liquors ought to be drunk as a fuel. As a medicine I say there is nothing in it, that it is virtually injurious. Some doctors I am told recommend it. Those same doctors may use it themselves, but if they are thoroughly acquainted with their profession they certainly will not be disposed to recommend the use of an article which might lead to drunkenness. I would say let us put our heads together and seek to induce the provinces to give local option a trial in every county in Canada. Education is the means whereby we are likely to overcome the drinking habit. Educate the people ; let them understand that a man who drinks is committing a crime. Let it be known that drunkenness is regarded as a crime, and you will then have means whereby you can restrain the drinking habits of the people and prevent many other crimes. Are we prepared to say, because in a number of counties in the Dominion of Canada where the Scott Act was formerly in force it has been repealed, that therefore prohibition has proved a complete failure ? By no means. In many rural sections the Act is still in force. In some cities and towns we know it has been repealed on account of many considerations, chiefly because it interferes with the revenues derived from the licensing system. Let us do our utmost to prevent a revenue being derived from the sale of intoxicating liquors and we will accomplish a great object.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Let it be understood that however great the consumption of liquor no profit goes to the community, and people will be ready to unite with us in an endeavour to carry total prohibition into effect ; I believe total prohibition is the only effectual remedy for intemperance. I know full well that the Scott Act can be enforced, but as a rule the subject comes under the control of the local legislatures. I would not have any entangling alliances between the Dominion of Canada and the local legislatures. I believe each province should be a sovereign power within itself, but I say we should do what we can to benefit the community. Is it necessary for me to depict to you the awful effects of drunkenness ? We know it is demoralizing to all men. It first affects the brain and as a man begins to die from his head downward, liquor will have that effect upon him. Feeling strongly on this matter, feeling that drunkenness in Canada ought to be repressed to as great an extent as possible, I cannot support the resolution before the House, for I believe that the law which we have in Canada is far superior, and that the Scott Act will accomplish more than the Gothenburg system could bring about.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Whether we concur or not in the proposal submitted by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) that it would be a good thing to inaugurate in Canada a public house trust, as they have it in England, we must at all events agree that the discussion of a subject of this kind is attended with very great benefits. I need point to no better illustration of it than the speech made by my hon. friend behind me, who has rendered a great service by calling public attention to the progress of the temperance movement and to the view he holds as to the causes that are entitled to credit for that progress. The Public House Trust in England probably is a good thing in its way. I am disposed to give the parties who inaugurated it very great credit. The distinguished nobleman who within an hour past occupied the Throne in this chamber is mainly entitled to any credit due for the inauguration of the Public House Trust in England, and there is no doubt whatever that it has been beneficial. To begin with, it completely eliminated the most important element, that is the element of profit, because we know that drinking habits are stimulated very largely by those who are interested in the profits derived from the consumption of liquor. I say that the elimination of profit is a very important point, but giving credit for the adoption of that, you must consider the conditions which exist there and compare them with the conditions prevailing in Canada. A few years ago, when I looked into the subject last, the per capita consumption in the United Kingdom, as compared with Canada was about as five to one, so one would scarcely draw an inference as to the benefits which would result from the adoption in this country of the system that prevails there. So far it has not to a very great extent diminished the quantity of liquor consumed, and it has made drinking more respectable. That feature is not one which would commend it to the people of Canada. We have got beyond that stage.

As my hon. friend behind me has observed, Canada leads all countries in regard to the temperance movement, and I think he has very properly and correctly given the explanation of the causes which have led up to that; they are the licensing system, the local option system, and the prohibition system, adopted in very many sections. While prohibition has not always been maintained, it has been an educator. In those very counties which, after adopting the prohibitory law subsequently repealed it, from influences that we need not now discuss, we can still trace the beneficial effects which were produced, because wherever the prohibitory system has been adopted, even for a time, the reduction in the consumption of liquor that follows is quite perceptible. Take as an illustration the effect of the law which prevails in nearly all the provinces, restricting drinking from Saturday at 7 p.m. until Monday morning. That has been done with a view to removing from the wage-earner the temptation to spend his week's earning in drink. I notice in England the question of Sunday closing came up in the House of Commons, but the temperance sentiment there was not strong enough to carry a measure prohibiting the keeping of taverns open on Sundays. The common thing there is to adjourn from the church to the tavern; people after attending service want to drink at the tavern. We are far ahead of that in Canada. Therefore, while a system may recommend itself to people in the United Kingdom, as being beneficial under the conditions prevailing there, it might have no place at all under the conditions in this country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD, (B.C.)—Are there no hours in England during which public houses must be closed?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know; locally there may be. An hon. gentleman near me says it is the case in Ireland. It may be limited to the Green Isle, or it may prevail in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In London I know that the beer shops and restaurants were all closed until after church hours in the morning.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And open after church?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes—I think after two o'clock.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In this country there is not only a strict system of licensing, but local option prevails in many parts of the Dominion. In New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, the Canada Temperance Act is enforced in twenty-five or twenty-six electoral districts. I may be told that it is not observed, that the law is violated. I admit it is violated, like every other law on the statute-book, but I maintain it has restricted the quantity of liquor sold, has reduced the consumption of liquor and also the number of places where liquor is sold, and that is a very important element in considering a reform of this kind. Take the number of tavern licenses in Ontario in 1874, compared with the number in existence to-day. In Toronto in 1874 there were 309 taverns; in 1884 they had been reduced to 217, and in 1902 to 150. The liquor stores, that is stores where they sell liquor otherwise than by wholesale, numbered in 1874, 184; in 1884 they had fallen to 88, and in 1902 to 50. The wholesale houses in 1874 were 21; in 1884, 13, and in 1902, there were only 5. In Hamilton in 1874 the taverns numbered 127; in 1902 they were 75. In Ottawa in 1874 there were 120, in 1902 there were 76. In London in 1874 there were 75; in 1902 there were 35. Taking the whole province of Ontario in 1874 the total number of taverns was 4,793; in 1884 they numbered 3,253, and in 1902 there were 2,628. A similar proportionate decrease took place in the case of shop licenses.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the word 'tavern' include saloons?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, wherever liquor is sold by the glass. It would appear there has been a uniform reduction throughout the whole province of Ontario, at all events in reference to the opportunities for obtaining liquor. My experience, if it is worth anything—and it extends over a good many years—is that the removal of temptation is really the best method of reform. Many a man going home from his work with $5 or $10 in his pocket will drop into a saloon if in passing he hears jolly companions inside and the tinkling of the glasses. If the tavern was not there he would go on his way home, and be all the better for it. So, with opportunities for observation perhaps quite equal to most of my colleagues, I have long since come to the conclusion that the removal of the temptation is really the best system to adopt. I am sorry to say that the record in the province of Quebec is not equal to that in the province of Ontario. My hon. friend from St. Thomas (Mr. Wilson) touched on a point of grave importance, and one that ought to appeal to the moral sentiment of the people of Canada when he spoke of the temptation to make a revenue out of the traffic. To receive a revenue out of that which is dealing death and destruction to our fellow beings, has, I am afraid, been a strong inducement not only to municipalities, but to provinces, and as evidence of it I refer to the province of Quebec. A few days ago the subject was brought up by the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, in the legislature of Quebec, and he deplored the extent of the liquor traffic, particularly in the cities. In the country parts of the provinces they have very few licenses and consequently very little drinking. The drinking in the province of Quebec is confined almost entirely to the cities and towns, and the traffic is largely, in my judgment, due to the revenue derived from it. That is a terrible blemish to cast upon the reputation of those who control the laws of the country, because we must all admit that the liquor traffic is the source of the larger portion of crime. I am quite of the opinion of Sir Frederick Treves, which I dare say hon. gentlemen have seen, that alcohol, in whatever form or shape you take it, is a poison. In the course of a long life, having opportunities to observe such matters particularly, I have come to the conclusion that alcohol acts on the brain in the same way as paralysis, and that men's brains are often paralyzed without the public being aware of it. They may talk and act coherently in many ways, but at the same time there is paralysis to a greater or less extent existing there. I have had proof of it in ways I need not explain now—proof that men have committed crimes under the influence of alcohol without intent, and without even being aware of having committed a crime. I have myself had indubitable evidence of this in a variety of ways, and I make the statement boldly that crimes are committed—perhaps not often—where the party is not conscious of what he is doing, and knows nothing of it afterwards when he regains his normal condition. I have known a man to go to the gallows protesting, when he was dropping into eternity, that he had no recollection whatever of having committed the crime for which he was executed. Many years ago an incident occurred in the city of Winnipeg illustrating this fact. A trapper, who always carried a knife, returning home after being for some months in localities where he had no opportunity of getting liquor, got on a spree. After drinking at a number of places, he was staggering home to his boarding-house when he met a man on the sidewalk. This man simply struck or jostled against him, and as he did so the trapper drew his knife and struck a blow, staggering on without knowing what he had done. The blow caused death, and although when that man was tried, it was shown there was no motive, that it was done mechanically, the verdict was that he was guilty of murder. That man declared on the scaffold, when he was going to meet his God, that he had no recollection of committing that crime. Is that not terrible and appalling, to send men to eternity who are placed in that condition simply through the mercenary motives of municipalities and individuals interested? Alcoholic liquor creates a paralysis of the brain such as takes away the sense of responsibility, and not only the sense of responsibility but the knowledge of what has been done. A case came under my observation only a few days ago—hon. gentlemen probably are aware of it—in which a man near St. Hyacinthe was to be executed for murder. The murder came about in this way; his wife left him on Saturday and he got very drunk. There was a step-child in the house of whom he was very fond, a pet of his; but he got the worse of liquor and he took its life. People say he was not drunk, but no doubt that very paralysis of which I speak had affected his brain. He got angry at some little act the child did, nothing of any consequence, and struck the child a violent blow with a stick or rod of some sort. A vessel burst in the brain, causing its death. When he came to his senses a few hours afterwards he said: 'I give myself up. I did not know I did it.' He broke down and said: 'I must be hanged now.' The man was tried a few months ago, and found guilty of murder. He had struck the child apparently in a fit of anger, and death followed. The judge sentenced him to be hanged about three weeks ago. The case came up before the Privy Council, and it was discussed. The absence of any motive was shown; the evidence was clear that the child was a pet of his; that he could have had no thought of killing the child. It would be hard to call it murder, and yet it was a killing without justification. Here is another case. Only a few days ago we saw in the paper that in the town of Pembroke some Italians were drinking; a young lad of seventeen who was not drinking was stabbed by a companion who was under the influence of liquor. The blow injured the heart and death followed. He is to be tried for murder some little time hence. I could go on and give illustrations of that sort without number. In a very long life I have noted various cases of a similar kind, with which I have had to do myself. For very many years I was in active practice and acted as 'Queen's Counsel' and had to indict people for all manner of crimes. I have had to indict a husband for the murder of his wife and the wife for the murder of the husband. In both cases the crime was solely attributable to alcohol. I merely mention this as one of the illustrations. Hundreds of like cases have come under my observation. Crimes that are due to brutality, offences committed by personal attack, are in a great majority of cases—fully 90 per cent—entirely due to liquor. Of course there are some crimes which cannot be traced to that cause. There is the regular criminal, who may be placed in the category as a professional burglar or robber. But I speak of those criminals who are charged with offences against the person, accompanied by violence. I do not hesitate to say that a very large proportion of such crimes are due entirely to the use of alcohol. It has been said, 'Oh well, so and so was not drunk; he walked perfectly straight; he enunciated his words clearly and distinctly.' I admit all that, and yet there was an influence operating on the brain which caused him to commit the crime; and I say that it is most regrettable that in this age of civilization any portion of the community should be seeking to make profit out of a traffic that brings death and destruction in its train, as is the case with the liquor traffic. Hon. gentlemen have probably read the report of Sir Frederick Treves, whose name I have already mentioned. He is a very distinguished medical man, probably one of the most distinguished in England, and had a large practice in London. He was appointed Surgeon Extraordinary to the Queen, and subsequently to the King; and it was he who performed the operation on King Edward VII. for appendicitis. He said:

> All alcohol is distinctly a poison, with certain uses, like other poisons, but limitations on its use should be as strict as on arsenic, opium or strychnine. It is a curiously insidious poison, producing effects which seem to be only relieved by taking more, a remark which applies to other insidious poisons, such as morphine and opium. Alcohol has had a certain position in medicine in the last twenty-five years, but its use by the medical profession has steadily and emphatically diminished.

He goes on enlarging on the opinion he has there expressed. A distinguished member of this Senate, Sir William Hingston, who I am sorry is not now present, was asked his opinion as to this statement of Dr. Treves and in reply, he said:

In regard to Sir Frederick Treves' statement, I quite agree with him. In my general practice I very rarely prescribe alcohol in any form. There was a time when it was used in medicine and in some quantities. Now its use is the exception, and is confined to those cases—and they are few—where alcohol is necessary.

I have a number of other opinions in the same direction which entirely sustain the opinion expressed by Sir Frederick Treves.

Before making this diversion I was about to give the figures in regard to the province of Quebec, which I am sorry to say are not on a parallel with the province of Ontario. In 1874 there were 457 tavern licenses in the city of Montreal. That includes the restaurants and all the drinking places. In 1903 there were 649 licenses. While in Ontario the number has gone down fifty per cent or more, in the city of Montreal the number has gone up.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did the hon. gentleman make the comparison on the basis of population ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I have not gone into that. Of course there is a difference in population. The increase has been greater in Montreal, probably than elsewhere. In 1874 Quebec had 161 licenses, including restaurants. In 1903 they had risen to 178, a proportion of increase not so great as Montreal. Of course we must make allowance for Montreal that it is a seaport city, and there is always much more drinking at seaports which are frequented by many outsiders and foreigners. I presume the same remarks would apply to Liverpool, Antwerp, and many ports in Europe.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Has the hon. gentleman the figures for the country as well as the cities ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have only cities. I stated just now that I thought probably the rural parts of the province of Quebec were as far advanced as any other part of Canada perhaps further, because I know that in very many parts they do not allow a license at all. I am merely making a comparison of the cities.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What source are those figures taken from ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From the Journals of the House in Quebec ; and in Ontario from the same source, the official figures published by the authority of the province. In St. Hyacinthe in 1874 there were 54 licenses and in 1903, 59. At Richelieu in 1874 there were 28 licenses and in 1903 there were 40. The total increase in Montreal, Quebec, St. Hyacinthe and Richelieu was from 700 in 1874 to 926 in 1903. Now it can be seen where the real temptation to increase the number of licenses lies. It is in the license fee. In 1874 the fees for licenses in Montreal amounted to $61,000. In 1903 it had risen to $361,987. I think I am quite correct in the opinion I expressed that the increased consumption of liquor, the increased opportunity given to men to indulge, has largely been stimulated by the profit there is in it for the country. I think that is a very melancholy reflection to make on so intelligent a body as the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MACMILLAN—Is this the amount that the hotelkeepers pay for the privilege of selling liquor ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I think in Quebec the province receives the larger proportion, perhaps all.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The government in reality receive all the fees. A certain amount goes to pay for the certificate, but that amounts to only about eight dollars.

Hon. Mr. MACMILLAN—The same in Ontario ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is only a proportion. It is less than one half. In Quebec the license fees for taverns and restaurants rose from $18,000 in 1874 to $73,314 in 1903. In St. Hyacinthe in 1874 they amounted to $4,100 and in 1903 to $12,900. In Richelieu in 1874 the fees were $2,400 and in 1903 $9,700.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. gentleman tell us if the price of the license has been raised ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am merely giving the net result. The prices no doubt have been raised, and at the same time more places have been licensed ; because I gave you in the first instance the number of licensed houses, showing a very material increase. The total received in those four places in Quebec increased from $84,500 in 1874 to $457,913 in 1903. That is not a creditable showing, because it is quite evident that not only was the revenue payable for each license increased largely, but there has been a large increase in the number of licenses issued. I think this is where the chief damage has been done, and I think it is responsible for many crimes that have been committed in Montreal which have come under my notice as a member of the government from year to year—quarrels arising at a tavern door, quarrels arising inside the tavern and quarrels arising outside,—and one of the peculiar features that I have observed in the last fifteen or twenty years is the number of wives that have been assassinated by their husbands. That seems to me a terrible thing, that the number of women shot or stabbed by their husbands, has been on the increase. We all know very well that frequently men out of jealousy have shot their sweethearts; but I am speaking of those in the marital state where men acting under the influence of a stimulant and wholly without any feeling or motive to commit the crime, have murdered their wives. A case comes to my mind at the present time; a policeman who is now in St. Vincent de Paul, a man with the best of characters, who came home under the influence of liquor; a word or two passed with his wife about the dinner not being ready or something trivial of that kind. He drew his pistol and shot his wife, killing her. The man ought to have been hung, but it was very hard to hang a man under such conditions. The man loved his wife and had no feeling of any kind against her. The unfortunate glass that he took probably at the opportune tavern which stood between his beat and his home was entirely responsible for it.

Perhaps my attention has been more directed to this question than most men, because I have in the last 65 years given a good deal of thought and attention to it, and I have noted the effect on my own mind and the effect on society, and have noted also the terrible consequences which have followed this indulgence. One thing I have particularly noted—and perhaps some of my contemporaries may have remarked the same thing—that the effect of the liquor to-day is entirely different from the effect of the liquor used 55 and 60 years ago. I can recollect perfectly well upwards of 60 years ago in the convivial meetings where men congregated together, there was no quarrelling. They were jovial and ate their Bacchanalian supper, so to speak. They hugged each other and fell on the floor, without any drawing of knives or stabbing,—no drawing of the pistol in those days—and my conviction is, from the observations I have made as years went on, that it is due largely to the adulteration of liquor. I defy anybody to get pure liquor. It is all nonsense to talk about pure liquor. When the phylloxera dissapeared it was thought that the quality of the champagne sent out would be improved, but such was not the case. Inferior wines are made, and with the advance which has been made in chemical science, you can now make wine out of potatoes or anything and you can give it the peculiar flavour that is fashionable. I can go back forty, fifty or sixty years ago, when there was a rage for dry sherry. How were sherries made dry? By prussic acid. There is no doubt about that at all; and the consequence is that men have died from paralysis.—sherry drinkers who perhaps did not drink more than a pint a day—and yet paralysis overtook them in the end, due entirely to the adulteration of the fluid.

I did not mean to make a temperance speech when I rose. I meant rather to draw a comparison between the conditions in Canada and the conditions in Great Britain; and while I am prepared to give credit to those who support the action of His Excellency the Governor General in establishing the trusts in England for public houses, yet I believe it would not be acceptable to the people of Canada. We have made too great progress in this country in the temperance cause and we would not approve of making liquor drinking respectable, giving it a standing that it does not to-day possess, and for that reason I hope my hon. friend will not press his resolution. I think the very fact of his drawing attention to the subject entitles him to great credit, because we have had the opportunity of not only giving expression to our views but of drawing deductions from a full discussion of the scheme; and I am glad to see that the deduction we all draw is in the direction of minimizing the quantity of liquor that is consumed.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments before the motion is disposed of. I think we all agree with the remark of the hon. Secretary of State that the excessive use of intoxicating liquor is a terrible evil. Having settled that in the affirmative, then the other question arises,—is there a remedy and what is it? Whatever disposition may be made of the motion before the House, I think I utter the sentiments of all, when I say that we are under a debt of gratitude to the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion in such a temperate and intelligent manner, and I hope and believe that the discussion of this question will result in great good.

The question is, is there a remedy and what is it? We have tried many remedies. It has been my fortune during a considerable number of years to take some interest in this question. We have tried the much maligned and much abused Dunkin Act. It was my fortune to vote for the enforcement of the Dunkin Act in the counties of Northumberland and Durham, where I reside. I did not have very much faith that it would accomplish all the objects of its ardent advocates, but I did think, and still think, that the agitation caused by the endeavour to pass that Act, and the agitation for and against its repeal, has had a good effect in calling the attention of the public to the great evil of intemperance; and I never allow any one in my presence to abuse that much abused Act called the Dunkin Act. I believe Mr. Dunkin was sincere and that although he was in advance of his time when he brought that question before the old parliament of Canada, it was one step in the right direction. Then that having accomplished its purpose, the Scott Act for which credit is largely due, if not chiefly due, to the hon. Secretary of State, came before the public. It was my duty as a humble member of the other Chamber at the time to take some part on the committee in framing that Act. I did not at the time think that that Act would accomplish all that its most ardent advocates expected, but I did hope that as in the case of the Dunkin Act the agitation for its enforcement and the agitation against its repeal would operate as an education to the people on the great question of temperance, and the evils of intemperance. I have ever thought and think now that the effect of that Act on the public was salutary.

That has gone out of force now in nearly all the provinces. Then the only other alternative, prohibition, is advocated by a great many; by some very ardently and, sometimes, very unwisely. When I hear people speaking of the great things they expect from prohibition, I often think of that passage of Scripture which says: 'Let not your good be evil spoken of,' which, I take it, means do not run a hobby into the ground, so that you disgust everybody by your advocacy of it. I have always been on the side of temperance and practically a teetotaller all my life, and I have so educated my family that they do not touch liquor and do not want to touch it. In this connection I am reminded of a very wise remark made by the Nestor of this chamber, the venerable senator from Fredericton, New Brunswick, in speaking on this question two or three years ago. He made an observation which has recurred to my mind frequently since he uttered it. His remedy for the great evil of intemperance was, to use his own phrase, 'destroy the market.' What he meant by that he afterwards told us—so educate and so train the rising generation that they will not crave or desire the use of intoxicating liquors, and if that state of things is brought about there will be no liquor manufactured, because, if the market is destroyed, there will be nobody to sell it. That brings me to another question, whether the proposition before the House will solve it. If this question comes to a vote, I should like to vote for the resolution; but, before doing so, I should like to have a little more information, and be more fully satisfied that the Public House Trusts are a success in England. That they have done a great deal towards solving the question of temperance and social reform I have no doubt; but I am not prepared, with my present knowledge of the question, to affirm that statement of them, nor am I prepared to affirm the second portion of the motion, that the time is ripe for us to attempt similar experiments in Canada. I do not think it is. Then, is there any remedy? The only remedy that I see, and the only remedy that I advocate now is, not the repeating of the Dunkin Act, not the repeating of the Scott Act and not the establishment of these trusts, but the enforcement in the most rigid manner of the licensing system. Reduce the number of licenses, and in the meantime educate the people of this country to the great evil of intemperance; and bring about by education what I am thoroughly satisfied you cannot bring about by legislation. You never can make a man honest by legislation. You may punish him for doing wrong, but you will not make him honest. How will you make him honest? By teaching him religion, by improving his morals, by making him feel that he has a higher destiny than his destiny in this world, and that the only sure way of securing that is to lead a sober, righteous and upright life. I believe that education will be the great means of bringing about what will be practically prohibition, but never in the form of an Act of parliament. Now, I say—and I know I shall offend a great many of my warmest friends when I say it—that I do not believe that at the present moment a prohibitory law, if it could be passed, could be enforced; for, as some Roman author has said, what are good laws without good morals to enforce them? I do not believe that we have the moral stamina in this country to enforce a prohibitory law. My last word then is, educate the people on this terrible evil of intemperance. Diminish the drinking usages by better education, both moral and intellectual, and while we are doing that keep the number of licenses down to a minimum, meting out very severe treatment to any one who dares to violate the law. There is no question before the people of Canada to-day comparable to this question of temperance or intemperance, and none so difficult to deal with. I believe the only remedy is to educate the people and keep on educating them until that time arrives—and I do not despair of seeing it—when it will not be considered respectable to indulge in intoxicating liquors to excess. I feel strongly on this subject; and giving it the very best consideration I can, I believe that education and a rigid enforcement of the license law, certainly in the province of Ontario, are the two means to be employed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I do not very often agree with the hon. gentleman from Cobourg (Hon. Mr. Kerr), but on this occasion I heartily coincide in his remarks. I believe that education is the main thing to develop a temperance sentiment, and that education should begin the moment a child enters school. As soon as he is sent to a common school he should there be instructed in the principles of temperance as well as those of religion, and if that is done in a proper way he will grow up to be a citizen who will be a credit to his country, and who will shun all the evils of intemperance. Coming as I do from a province which has adopted the Scott Act and enforced it for many years, I must say that it has had a good effect in all the rural districts, and has reduced the consumption of liquor there very materially. It has not had the same good effect in the city because in the city there is a floating population, rendering it almost impossible to enforce a prohibitory law. In the city of Charlottetown, which is an exception to the general rule in the province, not having adopted the Scott Act, there is a local law intended to restrict the sale of liquor, which has had some good effect but not the effect expected by those who promoted it, for there certainly has been a great deal of drinking in the city up to the present time. At the last session of the legislature, they passed some measures more restrictive in their nature than had been in force previously, with a view to reducing the consumption of liquor, and I expect it will have that effect; but it is a very difficult problem to curtail the sale of liquor in cities like Charlottetown where there is a continuous movement of population—workingmen engaged in railroad construction, bridge-building and other public works. Such people remain in the city as long as their employment lasts, and then move on, having finished the work they were employed to do. But the great difficulty in enforcing a law of that kind is that public opinion is not educated. Public opinion must be educated in the first place before the law can be made effective, and in order that that should be done, we must begin with the young generation and instil right views into their minds as they grow up. As regards the city of Charlottetown I must say that the different churches there have taken this matter up very seriously indeed, and with very good effect. I am aware that in one church nearly all the children—all the young people under the age of twenty-one, with very few exceptions—have been educated in the principles of temperance and belong to a temperance organization under which they are pledged to total abstinence until they reach twenty-one years of age.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Had you not the Canada Temperance Act in operation in Charlottetown, several times, and how did it work?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—We had it in operation in Charlottetown for a good many years, but public opinion was not strong enough there to enforce it properly. The last time there was a vote taken there was a majority against the Act and it was done away with, and this other law was introduced. When the hon. Secretary of State was addressing us on this subject hon. members certainly must have agreed with him that indulgence in intoxicating liquor is the cause of a great deal of crime. That is a statement which cannot be disputed. He referred to the number of places in which intoxicating liquors are sold in the different cities, and he showed that in Montreal there had been an increase in the number from 457 places in 1874 to 649 in 1902. That is to say in the space of nearly thirty years the number of places in which liquor was sold had increased nearly forty per cent. On the other hand the amount received for licenses for the sale of liquor increased in the same time from $61,000 to $361,000. The number of places increased 40 per cent while the amount received for licenses increased about 600 per cent. That shows that they have been endeavouring to restrict the business there by increasing the tax imposed on persons licensed to sell. The population of Montreal has certainly increased very much more than 40 per cent in the last thirty years, so that the number of places in which liquor is sold now is less per thousand inhabitants than it was in 1874; so that even in the city of Montreal the record is not so bad as one might infer from just a casual glance at the remarks made by the hon. Secretary of State. The same observations would apply in a less degree to some of the other places to which he referred. It is certainly desirable to limit the number of places where liquor is sold, if that can be reasonably done; but you require to have the people educated in order to place those restrictions on the sale of liquor. The local governments represent the feelings of the people. If the majority of the province of Quebec or of any other province are in favour of total prohibition of the sale of liquor or of the adoption of the Scott Act it will be carried out. but until the people are educated up to that point you can never enforce a prohibitory law.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—It never has been carried out in any locality that I am aware of.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It has never been carried out effectually I admit, but it has restricted the sale of intoxicating drinks wherever it has been adopted. It struck me while this discussion was going on that if we could graft something in the nature of the Gothenburg system on the Scott Act, we might be able to accomplish some good in that way. It seems almost like an impossibility to do it, but still something may come out of this discussion which will lead to good even in that line. There is a difficulty, too, in this way; license of course restricts the sale to a certain extent, but the temperance people are opposed to the license system altogether. The consequence is that numbers of people enter into the business of selling liquor without license because the temperance people are opposed to the license system. There is a demand for drink, and people who have no other business, and probably have very little to lose, take it up and enter into the sale of liquor illegitimately. Although this discussion may not eventuate in any legislation, it may do some good to the country. It will let the people see there is a sentiment in the minds of many of the people's representatives to do what they can to prevent the evils of intemperance.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I come from a county where the Scott Act has been in operation a good many years. I think there are ten counties in New Brunswick under the Scott Act, yet I find that the number of arrests for drunkenness in New Brunswick is very much in excess of the number of arrests in Quebec, or Ontario, which are under a strict license law. Twelve counties in Nova Scotia are under the Canada Temperance Act, and three counties in Prince Edward Island, yet I find the same condition of affairs prevails there. Let us compare the arrests for drunkenness in those Scott Act provinces, with the arrests for drunkenness in Quebec and Ontario. In Nova Scotia the number of inhabitants to each conviction is 229 ; in New Brunswick it is 237 ; in Prince Edward Island, 446. In Ontario where there is only one county, Prince Edward, under the Scott Act, the number of inhabitants to each conviction is 554, and in Quebec 600. In other words, where we have the Canada Temperance Act in force the arrests are almost three times as many as where they have restrictive license laws. You may talk and theorize as long as you please, but there are the facts ; and they are against the Canada Temperance Act. I will take my own county of Westmoreland as an example. In Moncton when we had licenses we had thirteen people licensed to sell liquor—not shop licenses but licensed to sell by retail. To-day I venture to say we have fifty people selling liquor in Moncton, some of them paying a fine and others not paying. I am satisfied that drunkenness has increased in that town 50 per cent under the Canada Temperance Act. Take Fredericton, Charlottetown, Truro, Amherst and various other places in the maritime provinces and it will be found that instead of being a benefit the Scott Act has been a perfect curse. I am satisfied that it has put back the cause of temperance 50 years. In Cape Breton, take Sydney and other towns ; take New Glasgow in Pictou county—there is not the least doubt that drunkenness has increased in all of them.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—One statement made by the hon. gentleman I cannot allow to go without contradiction. He says that drunkenness has increased in the town where I live, New Glasgow. Whatever may be said of other places, drunkenness has not increased in New Glasgow.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—The arrests for drunkenness have increased.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—We are in the midst of a mining population and perhaps the law is better enforced in some places than in others. In the rural parts of the county where I live you cannot get liquor. You can only get it in New Glasgow and Pictou and certainly there has been no increase of drunkenness in the town where I live.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I suppose it is pretty well known even in the Senate that I am a temperance advocate. I was very much pleased this afternoon to know that the records of the Senate will contain reports of such observations as have been made, and more particularly the observations of the Secretary of State, showing so conclusively the evils of the drinking habit. We may labour to find an antidote for the evil, but it seems to me in the present state of society that is an impossibility. The only sure cure for the habit of intemperance is to leave liquor alone, and that is a thing we cannot as yet get our people to do. The statements made by the hon. Secretary of State show pretty conclusively that under the licensing system we need never expect to do away with the drinking habits of the people. Many years ago in my own town we had to fight this licensing system. The law there was, with the old court of sessions, to grant a license on a petition of a majority of the taxpayers, and under our educative system it became impossible to secure this petition ; therefore the licensing system had to be abolished. Then after that we had the Nova Scotia Act which worked very well and then we had the Scott Act. I would not have said anything today on this subject if it had not been for our experience. This liquor traffic is an insidious foe. You may crush it in one quarter and think you have it entirely annihilated, and soon after some of his Satanic Majesty's agents may think they can make money out of it, and those who are fighting it make no money, and so it reappears. The reason I speak to-day is because of the remarks of the hon. senator from Westmoreland (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) on the Scott Act. Why it is only two or three weeks ago that under the application of the Scott Act in the town of Amherst, every liquor shop in the town was closed down, making it clear that where the moral sentiment of the people is right it will prove effective in prohibiting and suppressing the liquor traffic. What has my hon. friend to say to that? Would the licensing system have done as much? We were told a few years ago that if you licensed a few houses and made the sale of liquor respectable, the licensees would put a ban on the other places and close them down, because having themselves to pay a high price for the privilege of selling, they will stop illegal selling on the part of others. Did they do that? Not a bit of it. They fostered and encouraged those places to sell liquor. Now some may say that the Scott Act is not working a sure cure of intemperance, and that the licensing system would be better; but with the experience of the past to guide us we can have little faith in putting an end to the evil by licensing. I am opposed to the licensing system on principle. How can you properly license something that you know is wrong? If you do you take the responsibility on your own shoulders of licensing an evil. The moment you grant a license you take the responsibility off the rum seller, and if any one should censure him for the curse he is placing on families, he can say: 'Go to the man who gave me the license, I am carrying on a legitimate business and what have you to say to me?' I have fought the evil of intemperance for 50 years. I know the results of the licensing system, of the Scott Act, and of the other Act mentioned. My hon. friend the Secretary of State showed us that under the influence of liquor men commit murder, the husband has slain his wife, the father his children. It is a desperate evil, but still we go on and treat it lightly. Another hon. gentleman tells us that this is the greatest question before the country. Why can we not enact a prohibitory law? Because the moral sentiment of the country is not up to that level. The Apostle Paul says the law is the school-master to bring us right. We want education and law both, but we do not want to license people to do that which we all acknowledge is wrong.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I do not think it is any argument to point out to us the number of arrests made in the different provinces. The hon. senator from Westmoreland (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) says that the number of arrests in Ontario and Quebec in proportion to population is less than in the maritime provinces, where the Scott Act is enforced. They have the licensing system in those two large provinces, and do not arrest people for drunkenness as they do in the maritime provinces. I rose for the purpose of saying a word in behalf of the Scott Act. I live in a province where the Scott Act has been enforced for the last 20 years, and have lived in the same county all my life, and have had good opportunities of observing the working of the Scott Act, having practised medicine and been amongst the people a great deal. I wish to say that the Scott Act has worked exceedingly well in King's County, P.E.I. It has lessened the drinking of intoxicating liquors in that county in a very large degree. It has been pretty well enforced. It is a difficult matter to enforce any law against the selling of liquor. You will find a man beginning to sell liquor at one point and when he is brought up and fined another man will crop up somewhere else and sell liquor, and so it goes on. In the county in which I live the Act has been very well enforced and I feel that I speak the truth when I assert confidently that the Scott Act in the county where I live has caused the consumption of liquor to be very much diminished. The enforcement of the Scott Act is a little difficult, because the seller is always the party to be punished,—the drunkard is never interfered with. But Charlottetown during the last year has enacted what might almost be called a prohibitory law—not exactly prohibitory, but very nearly so—under which any man found drunk can be arrested and jailed, and when he becomes sober he can be brought up and required to declare on oath where he obtained the liquor that made him drunk. That is a very salutary amendment to the liquor law and one which I believe will stop many of the heinous crimes which, as the hon. Secretary of State has pointed out, are caused largely by the use of alcoholic liquors. When a man who is unable to take care of himself is jailed until he becomes sober and is then made to say where he got the liquor which made him drunk, and the liquor seller is then punished, you are going a long way towards stopping the sale of liquor. It is all very well to say educate the people; that is a very good idea and one that we would all like to see carried out; but unless the legislatures of the different provinces and the Dominion will enact strenuous laws you will have little result in the way of lessening the sale of liquors in this country.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I wish to say that the question demands consideration in all legislative bodies in Canada, both local and Dominion. We have listened to the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State, in which he gave us a painful picture of the results of intemperance in the country, and I have no doubt he is correct. A great deal has been said about law. My hon. friend says we have had law enough on the statute-books for the last twenty-five years, but the trouble is that it is not enforced. My hon. friend from Moncton talked about statistics in regard to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and other provinces. I do not dispute his figures, but there are reasons why, in Nova Scotia particularly, with a maritime and floating population, like other places on the coast, as the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has said, the law is violated and arrests are made. It may merely prove that in Nova Scotia the law is carried out better in that regard than elsewhere. The people in that province are fined and brought to book, whereas in other places perhaps they are not. During my term of office as a member of the local government in Nova Scotia one trouble came forcibly to my knowledge, and that was the question of jurisdiction. Unfortunately after consideration, it did not appear to be well defined how far the authority of the Dominion government went and how far the authority of the local legislatures went, and so in Nova Scotia, notably in the county of Halifax, and also in Lunenburg and other places, the question was constantly being raised as to jurisdiction. The rum-selling community and the parties who vended liquor illegally, either wholesale or retail, would employ the best counsel they could get and would fight out those points. If the case originated in the magistrates' court an overwhelming array of legal talent would be brought there very often to prove that the local legislatures had not power to pass the laws and that the law under which the magistrate was acting was not really constitutional. The case would be carried from one court to another, and in this way the liquor sellers had an advantage. Now a deliverance has been made by the highest court in the empire, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and yet the law is not clear. I am told that according to one of the latest deliverances of that august body in a Nova Scotia case, the local legislature has certain very restrictive powers, as a matter of fact have prohibitive powers within their own borders. The brewer or distiller outside of the province could, however, manufacture liquor say two hundred yards over the border, just over the line in New Brunswick, and could take his product into the province of Nova Scotia and set the authorities at defiance. If that be true, it is a lamentable state of affairs. I think the deliverance of that august body, across the water, as to the relative jurisdictions of the Dominion and local governments in regard to the fisheries dispute, as well as in the liquor question, requires to be further explained, to be fully understood.

I am not in favour of the motion before the House. As a result of discussion considerable information has been obtained on the great subject of temperance, and I hope the motion will serve its purpose in that way. I firmly believe we have law enough. What we have not, is the necessary moral public sentiment behind it to enforce the law. I have lived in a county that never passed the Scott Act. I have also lived in Halifax many years, and they have never had the Scott Act. Considering the maritime population in those places, I do not believe there was more drinking than under the Scott Act. It was not a failure in the country but it is a failure in towns and cities. The reason is because the people were not behind the law. Rum-selling is yet too respectable in New Brunswick and elsewhere, and too respectable in the capital of the Dominion. Are you going to make it more respectable by giving it the direct sanction of the government—make the government a party to it, and receive a revenue from it, as the Secretary of State said he could not do. I look upon this question as a great moral question. The great Apostle said: 'If meat make my brother to offend I will eat no meat while the world standeth.' Therefore the strong should refrain from strong drink, and set an example to the weak. I do not believe that drinking a glass of liquor is per se a sin. I am a total abstainer, but not a prohibitionist. I believe you will never succeed in the temperance cause until the different branches of the Christian church take hold of it and deal with it in a practical, sensible and Christian manner.

Thanking the House for attention to these remarks I resume my seat.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN moved the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

LABOUR UNION LABELS BILL.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day being called.

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the second reading (Bill 10) An Act respecting Labour Union Labels.—(The Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —This is a Bill which I believe in one shape or other has been several times before this House. I understand from the promoters of the measure that it differs in some important respect from those which have heretofore, come before the Senate, and they desire to make a special request of this House that they be allowed to present their side of the case before a committee of the House. As they represent a large number of persons, and as it is obvious they cannot have their side of the case very well presented unless they are permitted to appear before such a committee, I suggest, if it meets with the approbation of honourable members, that on the distinct understanding that we do not commit ourselves to a recognition of the principle of the Bill, we should refer it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for the purpose of giving the parties an opportunity to present their case. I should have preferred to see it go to committee after its first reading, because it will be said that we approve of the principle of the Bill, which the House has not done ; but it is expedient and desirable, as a large number of persons are interested in this measure, that the Senate should extend to them the privilege of stating their case in the full manner in which it could be done before a committee. I therefore suggest that the House consent to the second reading of this Bill and that it be referred as I have proposed.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

UNDERWOOD TYPEWRITER COMPANY BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto) moved that the House concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (W) An Act respecting certain Patents of the Underwood Typewriter Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does not the law as it stands upon the statute-book cover the amendment which has been suggested by the Commons ? I make no objection to the amendment ; I think it is a very good one. It protects those who may have entered into the manufacturing of this article after the time had expired for which the patentee had the sole right. I was under the impression that the law on the statute-book gave the right to any one to commence manufacture of an article after the time had expired

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—This Bill extends the time for importation only, and the amendments which were made in the Commons cut down the time for which the extension is made from a year to six months. There could be no objection to that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 o'clock tomorrow.

SENATE.

DOMINION ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (106) An Act respecting the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company, with several amendments. He said: The amendments simply provide that the Midland Railway Company which is now to be part of the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company, and which was granted certain rights and franchises by the Nova Scotia legislature, shall not exercise any franchises which are inconsistent with the Railway Act of 1903.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPORTATION OF DISEASED IMMIGRANTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to :

Call the attention of the government to the highly undesirable practice of steamship companies conveying to the shores of the Dominion from Europe, persons afflicted with trachoma, and other diseases, as well as persons too far advanced in years to become productive settlers.

More particularly I direct attention to the cruel process of deportation caused by the neglect of steamship companies, their agents, and medical officers in taking diseased persons on board their ship without a thorough inspection.

Such unfortunate persons as are deported are landed in Great Britain to become a burden on that country, and in a much worse condition than when they embarked ; all hope of bettering their condition shattered, and their scant store of money depleted.

And to ask if the government will take steps, by law or regulation, in the interests of charity, public health and justice to prevent the perpetuation of such dangerous, cruel and unbusinesslike proceedings.

He said : I feel perfectly certain that the members of the government in this House and every hon. member in this chamber consider this matter to be of the highest importance. We find that many poor people in Europe, hearing of the prosperity of Canada, dispose of their scanty effects and direct their steps to this country. There is undoubtedly great difficulty in preventing immigration of this class. In the first place those people, whether diseased or healthy, land at some port in England, and from that port they come to Liverpool, intending to sail to Canada. At this point the trouble might be stopped if there was a proper system of inspection, but it seems that the steamship companies take them on board without inspection for the sake of obtaining the passage money. If the government of Canada could induce the government of England to inspect people landing on their shores from different parts of Europe, the difficulty could be easily overcome. We can easily imagine those poor people, men perhaps with families, having disposed of everything at home, having spent all their money to pay their passage, sent back across the ocean and landed paupers on the shores of Britain.

It is one of the greatest hardships that can be imagined. What is to become of those poor people when they are landed in a foreign country without money or friends? I do not know what course the government of England will take in this matter, but it deserves careful attention. I noticed a few weeks ago that twenty-four persons who came to Canada, and who were found on arrival to be afflicted with trachoma were deported. What is to become of those poor people when they get to a European port ? I have put the matter in my question as strongly as I can in order to bring it to the notice of the government, and I hope steps will be taken, to impose on the steamship companies the highest possible fine for bringing diseased people into the country. When twenty or thirty such people are included among the immigrants in a ship they may infect a large number of their fellow-passengers with trachoma and other contagious diseases. It is evident that the steamship companies do not carefully inspect the people they take on their ships. They get $30 per head, while it costs only $5 to feed each immigrant. If a passenger is deported it would cost perhaps $5 to take him back to a European port, but, so far as I know, there is no return of any part of the passage money. I hope the government will see its way to pass a stringent law imposing the heaviest kind of fine on any company found guilty of bringing in people who have to be deported from our shores.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I regret that it is a fact that from time to time undesirable immigrants have been embarked at European ports by steamship companies for Canada, but I am not aware that any practice of this kind exists. On the contrary, I am informed that great precautions are taken by the steamship companies to deter undesirable immigrants from taking passage, and that to this end the companies chiefly engaged in passenger traffic employ medical officers at European ports to examine intending immigrants before going on board ship as to their physical fitness and state of health. It may, however, be added that while all this is true, it nevertheless happens that persons who, in the judgment of the medical officers of the government of Canada, as undesirable as immigrants have been from time to time brought to this country and have been deported at the expense of the steamship company bringing them. This, with over 100,000 immigrants entering Canada yearly, would appear to be inevitable. It is a matter of regret that such deportations have been found necessary, and that the immigrants have been returned to European ports sometimes without money or employment; but it may be stated that the government of Canada has endeavoured in the past, and purposes still more in the future, to restrict by every means in its power the embarkation at European ports of immigrants who are undesirable from any point of view. Probably the hon. gentleman's question and his observations may result in the exercise of extra care and diligence by the officials who are specially charged with this work, when they are advised that immigrants escape detection on the other side. They probably will be more careful hereafter.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. member from Victoria deserves credit for having brought this matter before the House. Although the government may use all the means they possibly can to prevent such a state of things, it is nevertheless a fact that we have imported into this country many undesirable immigrants. That being the case, some means should be adopted on the other side of the Atlantic to thoroughly investigate the condition of every immigrant before he is permitted to embark. Even though the influx should be as large as the leader of the House says, if the officers charged with the duty exercise sufficient care they can see that every individual coming to Canada is free from disease. Possibly now and then an immigrant may land here who has contracted some disease on the ocean, but that could not happen very often, certainly not to the extent that we now find disease existing among immigrants. Trachoma is a very loathsome disease, one that we all abhor, and no medical man feels any disposition to treat it. To import immigrants afflicted with such a disease is very unfortunate indeed. We cannot be too careful to see that the proper kind of immigrants are admitted into Canada. We have a noble country, a country that will command the respect of any nation under the sun. We have sons and daughters who are equal to, if not superior to, the people of any country in the world, and it becomes us to be extremely cautious that we import healthy immigrants only into this country. There is too much indifference manifested as to our sons and daughters marrying undesirable partners for life, thereby perpetuating diseases contracted in the old country. Children born of unhealthy parents are brought over here and intermarry with our population, and their offspring are consequently more or less diseased. I say, therefore, that this House ought to feel grateful to the hon. gentleman, and the government ought to bear in mind what has been said, and do everything in their power to prevent the admission into this country of any persons whose presence will not be of lasting benefit to the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I heartily concur in the remarks of my hon. friend from the west. Coming from the city of Montreal, I have been a witness of the class of immigrants sometimes brought to Canada, and I believe the government should insist on its officers exercising the utmost strictness in admitting diseased immigrants. It is all very fine to bring in large numbers of people, but it is better to ensure quality, and I would ask that the government of Canada exercise the same severity that the United States shows in admitting immigrants into the country. Canada is large and we need people—all we can get—but the less we receive of those who are afflicted with the diseases of which the hon. member spoke, the better for Canada. Coming from the metropolis of Canada, where the immigrants land, and where I have seen myself numbers brought in who are suffering from diseases, I am strongly of the opinion that the government should insist on its officers exercising all possible strictness in regard to the introduction of such persons.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Hon. Secretary of State will see that it is no hardship to the steamship companies to take back a few emigrants; the hardship is on the poor people who have spent their money and left their homes, only to be turned back to a foreign shore. It is a fearful hardship, and I do hope the government will exercise all the power they possibly can to prevent its occurrence. I think every credit is due to the quarantine officers of Canada. The instance which occurred a few weeks ago, and to which I have already referred, where twenty-four persons affected with disease escaped the quarantine officers on board the ship, but were detected by our officers, shows that Canadian officials deserve great credit. But it shows also a looseness of inspection by the doctors belonging to the ships and every means should be employed to punish them if they allow anything of this kind in future.

Hon. Mr. WILSON.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—A person would almost suppose that carelessness in the inspection of immigrants existed on the part of the government and the Immigration Department, whereas, I think, considering the large number of immigrants who come to Canada from Europe each year, we may congratulate ourselves on the fact that so few have to be deported. With reference to the Immigration Department, I may say that I do not think Canada ever had a more efficient staff than we have at present. They are careful in selecting the class of immigrants admitted to our shores. I have an opportunity to see a great number of those who arrive in the west, and as a rule they are healthy. Some of them are not very wealthy, but they come from all latitudes, and they do well in our country. It is a matter of congratulation in the west that you will very seldom find even a newly arrived immigrant asking public charity. They are generally able to take care of themselves, and while there may be an isolated case of disease that passes inspection, still I do not think there is any ground for wholesale charges against the government or against the officers in the department for allowing undesirable people to land in this country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no charge against the government or against anybody in Canada. More care should be taken before embarking the passengers. I venture to say that my hon. friend could not tell a case of trachoma if he saw it to-morrow.

THE BUBONIC PLAGUE.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the government to a matter which is far removed from politics, but a matter which is in the interests of the whole of Canada. I refer to the bubonic plague. I have a few memoranda from a scientific man, which I desire to read to the House and invite discussion on the subject. The bubonic plague is spreading all over the world. It is in South America and is getting into Mexico and we have received communications in Canada warning us in regard to it. There is no cure known in the world for this disease. Nature allows a certain number of people to recover from it, and certain things can be done to check it—that is all. The Governor General of India, Lord Curzon, and Lady Curzon, were both inoculated with a serum which is supposed to check the disease, and it was done in order to show the people of India what might be done as a precaution. I am advised that that is the only thing which can be done. The best medical science in the world cannot suggest any cure. The memo. reads as follows :

We are now menaced by plague as never before. A brief glance at its history will show what this means. Athens lost one-third of its population 429 B.C. One-half the population of Lybia wiped out in third century B.C. Livy describes an epidemic which destroyed one million persons in Africa 230 years B.C. It spread over Europe in the sixth century A.D. In 522, Constantinople lost 10,000 in one day, and it killed hundreds of thousands in Italy and northern Africa. It prevailed in England in the seventh century. Hecker states that the epidemics of the fourteenth century swept away one-quarter of the population of Europe, or 25,000,000 people. In 1466 the mortality in France and Spain was 40,000. In 1572 50,000 died at Lyons. In 1576 Venice lost 70,000. In 1655 Naples lost 300,000 in five months. The great plague of London was in 1664-5. London's population was then 460,000, of whom 206,000 fled to escape contagion. Of those who remained, 68,596 or over 44 per cent died.

The eighteenth century's epidemics in Europe were Marseilles, 1720, deaths 60,000 ; Toulon, 1721, deaths 87,659 ; Sicily, 1743, deaths 45,000 ; Moscow, 1771, deaths, 50,000 out of a population of 200,000.

In the nineteenth century there were epidemics on the east coast of Italy, 1815 ; Greece, 1828 ; Egypt, 1833-45. One of extreme severity in Cairo in 1833; Dalmatia, 1840; Constantinople, 1841. Then followed a recession and from 1879 to 1893 it seemed improbable that there would be any more extensive epidemics. In 1893, however, it reappeared in epidemic form in Tonkin and Hong Kong, and immediately afterwards in Bombay, Kurrachee and Poonah in British India. In the next three years there were 220,907 cases and 164,083 deaths in Bombay presidency alone. Up to 1900 there were 1,541 deaths in Hong Kong, 540 deaths in Amoy, and 1,866 deaths in Formosa. Nieuchuang was infected in 1899, Eygpt, 1899 ; banks of the Volga, 1900 ; Oporto, Leixoes and Masan, Portugal, 1900. At Santos, Brazil, the first case occurred upon the western hemisphere in October, 1900, and the next March it appeared at San Francisco. During the year it appeared in Australia and South Africa. Now the ports of South Africa and Australia seem to be permanently infected. The epidemic rages with intense violence throughout India and Formosa. The weekly mortality in India exceeding 50,000. China, the Philippines, Aden, the Caucasus, Brazil, Chile, the Argentine, Peru, British East and South Africa, Japan, and Arabia, are all infected, and cases are being discovered in the British islands. Already this year the aggregate mortality exceeds 1,000,000. Is it not time that Canada should awake to the danger and to the necessity for protecting herself. This disease travels along the trade routes, and is propagated entirely by rats and vermin. The steps necessary to protect Canada from infection through her ports are thoroughly understood, and no doubt thorough inspections of all animals are being made, but this is not enough. A campaign against rats and vermin should be organized in every port in Canada, and it should be consistently carried on so long as the present conditions last ; and no vessel from an infested country should be allowed to come alongside of any dock in Canada, even though all on board are well until all rats and vermin on board have been killed and destroyed by fire. If vessels will come to our ports in a filthy condition they should be made to take the necessary time and measures to clean up before being permitted to go to their berths. One single port infected by rats with plague would cost Canada, not thousands but millions of dollars.

An appropriation of not less than $100,000 should be made for this special purpose this session of parliament.

This is an important question. By the extracts which I have placed before the House we can see that the disease is coming this way, and as we are filling this great country with people—and I find no fault with that—I wish to direct the attention of the government to the fact that it is necessary at the present moment to take some steps that will check the bubonic plague.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman I think are likely to create some alarm unless some observation is made and some criticism is expressed upon them. He spoke of millions of people in Canada being affected. It is one of the wise laws of nature that where any large branch of the human family live for any considerable time under degenerate conditions and filthy habits, the plan which nature adopts is to sweep them away. They are no longer of use. But I deny that the bubonic plague will attack people living under normal conditions. Any person who leads a reasonably healthy life and observes proper hygienic laws is absolutely immune from the bubonic plague. I do not hesitate to say further that he is probably immune from any plague ; but certainly he is immune from the bubonic plague. It is quite proper that the greatest possible care should be taken in the case of vessels which are contaminated approaching our shore, that they should not be permitted to communicate with the land.

I have no doubt that our medical men who are stationed at the various points, and who are employed by the government for the express purpose of making an examination, both of immigrants and vessels, will see that no vessel that is at all infected with the bubonic plague is permitted to land on our shores. I think my hon. friend should have spoken more moderately and should not have said that if the bubonic plague got into Canada it might sweep away millions of people. I deny that a single person in a healthy condition would be affected by it. It only affects those in a low state of vitality from bad habits of life. We know very well that in India and in all tropical parts of the world there are large numbers of people who live under unfortunate conditions. I am not going to enlarge on that subject, but it is a matter of notoriety. Any one who reads the papers and the reports from those countries can arrive at no other conclusion than that if they are not swept away by the bubonic plague, which is the quickest way of doing it, they would be destroyed in some other way. They would not live out the natural term of life.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend the Secretary of State misunderstood me. I endeavoured to be modest in presenting this matter to the House. I am simply reasoning from a scientific point. I might call attention to the great plague of London. Were the people who died at that time British subjects? Were they Christians? Were they people living in the ordinary way of life? Why were they swept away?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because they got into a filthy condition and it required a fire afterwards to clean out the place.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—We might also get a fire to clean out the country, but it is a terribly drastic method of cleaning.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman stated that if it got into Canada it might sweep away millions of people. I do not think that is probable. I do not think the conditions of Canada are in such an abnormal state that any very large proportion of the people of this country could be affected by the bubonic plague.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Does my hon. friend find any fault with me for calling the attention of the government to this matter? We are becoming a great country; we are legislating to-day for the autonomy of the great Northwest and building up a nation; and when a humble individual like myself simply calls attention to a terrible disease and asks that an appropriation be made to prevent the evil, what blame can be attached to me? I am informed—and there are medical gentlemen in this House who will perhaps endorse what I say—that it is the rat that conveys it, through the drains and sewers, and how will you check it when it has gone too far? I thought I called attention to the matter in a very moderate way, and suggested that something might be done in good time. I had no idea of alarming the people. My hon. friend says they have to die. If he is right, perhaps it is a good thing for some of them, because they will not suffer any more. I am merely suggesting that precautions should be taken in the seaport towns and it could be done with a very small expenditure of money. I think public opinion will be largely in my favour in this matter. Scientific men will tell us that an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure. I am simply performing what I consider is my duty in placing this matter before the government.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not know whether there are any rags imported into this country, but I may remind the House that a short time ago it was discovered that the bubonic plague was transmitted by means of rags. A ragpicker having obtained a bale of rags from a ship which had just come into port, was taken with bubonic plague. He was conveyed to a hospital, and his wife and children were quarantined. His wife said that when he opened the bale of rags a number of rats jumped out of it, and the disease was probably brought in by them. I hope no rags come to this country; we can do without them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would call attention to the fact that there is no question before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Although not a practical man——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I ask for the decision of the chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The discussion has gone on so far without interruption. I simply wanted to call the attention of the House to the fact——

Hon. Mr. POWER—Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I think it is a matter which interests the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Order what? Why did you not call the Secretary of State to order? Is the hon. gentleman afraid——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have raised the point of order.

The SPEAKER—The question raised is that there is nothing before the House. As a matter of fact there is no question before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is a question of facts: statements that are not true——

The SPEAKER—Orders of the Day.

THIRD READING.

Bill (148) An Act to amend the Act respecting the incorporation of Live Stock Record Associations.—(Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

GRAIN INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (HH) An Act to amend the Grain Inspection Act as regards the selection of commercial grades and samples. He said: This measure is practically to allow the Grain Standards Board, under certain conditions therein set forth, to delegate to a committee of their members the power of selecting grades and samples which is now confined to the action of the whole board.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Have any difficulties arisen in the past to necessitate the introduction of a Bill of this kind which provides for the delegating of the powers of the board—to a subcommittee of the board, is it?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or outsiders?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, a committee of the board itself. The matter has been brought to my attention by the Winnipeg Board of Trade, which explained on previous occasions that owing to the great extent of country which is subject to the operations of this board, considerable inconvenience has been found. Some portions of the crops ripen at a later date than others, and some practical difficulties have been experienced which they think can be amended by this legislation. I referred the matter to the Chief Commissioner, Mr. David Horn, and after conference with him he thought the request was a proper one, and ought to be granted. I also consulted the members of the lower House who represent the grain-growing districts and they appear to concur with Mr. Horn in thinking it a desirable object.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG. I happen to be a member of the Standards Board, and therefore have some little experience in the matter which is now being dealt with. The board exercises jurisdiction in regard to the matters referred to it, over an immense stretch of country, and it is only to be expected that the crops do not always mature everywhere at the same time. It is desirable that the Standards Board should meet at as early a date as possible and fix the commercial samples for the current year, so that trade may not be interfered with. We meet as early as we possibly can, and yet when we do meet it is sometimes found that certain districts are later than others and that they have not their grain threshed to any extent, so that we have no samples before us from those districts. Now from a business point of view, it is desirable that a subcommittee of the Standards Board, which is composed of men chosen from all over the great west, should meet if circumstances require, at a later period, and fix additional samples if it is thought necessary to do so. Under this Bill, when the board meets in any year, and finds there is a large district in which the grain has not been threshed, and which is consequently unrepresented, the board may in their judgment appoint a subcommittee to deal with that district. The intention is, as I understand it, that that committee may meet at other places than the city of Winnipeg ; the samples will be gathered and the questions dealt with on the spot. It is advisable and important that this power should be given the board, so that samples may be selected at the earliest possible moment, and so that the trade of the country will not be retarded or interfered with by any delay in selection.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who appoints the board ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The board is appointed by the government.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Are the members of the board paid ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG. No. The Board is a representative one. Every class interested in the production of grain is represented on it. The Grain Growers' Association, the farmers, the millers and the dealers all have representatives who meet in consultation and deliver over those samples which are before them, and endeavour to fix the grades so as to meet the requirements of the producers and of the trade. I am speaking of course of the commercial grades.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Only the commercial grades are affected by the Bill.

The Motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

Bill (28) An Act to incorporate the Northwest Telephone and Telegraph Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

SEEDS INSPECTION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (7) An Act respecting the inspection and sale of seeds.

In the committee.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause requires seeds of cereals, grasses, clover or forage plants to be free from the seeds of certain weeds, and that the packages shall be marked with the seller's name and address, the kind of seed and the names of weeds the seed of which is mixed with the seed purchased.

It appears from a statement furnished by the commissioner that those weeds named in clause 3 are the most objectionable. They are rarely found in grain ; they are to be found generally in grasses. It will be observed that the clause reads :

> 3. No person shall sell, or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale, for the purpose of seeding, any seeds of cereals, grasses, clovers or forage plants unless they are free from any seeds of the following weeds.

Then follows a list of the weeds, and the clause continues :

> Unless each and every receptacle, package, sack or bag containing such seeds, or a label securely attached thereto, is marked in a plain and indelible manner—
> (a) with the full name and address of the seller ;
> (b) with the name of the kind or kinds of seed ;
> (c) with the common name or names of the aforenamed weeds, the seeds of which are present in the seed sold or offered, exposed or had in possession for sale.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will there be inspectors in every part of the country where the seeds are sold ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; where objections are taken the samples are sent to the department.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—For inspection ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do we understand by this clause that the label is to contain the names indicated on every package that is sold ? If so, how is it going to affect the hundreds of thousands of small packages that are sold throughout the country ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It only refers to cereals, that is the various kinds of grain—which are not put up in small packages—and to the grasses. It does not refer at all to the multitude of small garden seeds.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I)—I should like to call attention to the fact that some of the seed merchants, especially in the province of Prince Edward Island, object very decidedly to the provisions of this Bill. They are opposed to the passage of the Bill in its present form, and claim that it will simply drive them out of the business altogether. They say in that province, where very little seed is grown by the farmers for seed purposes, they depend on the seedsmen for supplies, and that if this Bill should become law they will not be able to procure them in the regular way, thereby causing a great deal of hardship. They object on that account to the passage of the Bill, as they think it will be very injurious to the business there, because in that province there is very little grass-seed grown. They have to procure it from the upper provinces, and I must say that a great deal of it is mixed with noxious weeds. The effect of this Bill will be to prevent them from carrying on business at all—at least that is their opinion of the Bill as it stands at present. I desire to call the attention of the House to the objections which they urge against the passage of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite understand there are persons engaged in the trade who prefer that the commerce they carry on should not be shackled in any way, but my hon. friend will admit it is of the highest importance that good seed should be produced and used in this country. There are portions of Canada where they grow very large quantities of seed. Canadian seed grown in certain districts commands high prices in other countries, especially in European markets ; and it is desirable that we should endeavour to keep up the character and standing of our seeds. All the farmers of Canada are interested in this Bill. It is only the seed merchants who oppose it, because it imposes certain duties and restrictions on their trade, but in order to show that there is no great necessity for alarm, I have before me here a return obtained by the department in regard to a number of samples that were secured promiscuously from different parts of the country. There are very many seed merchants who have a reputation at stake and who desire to maintain the character of the seed they deal in, and they approve of this Bill, but no doubt a very considerable amount of seed is distributed among country merchants, who exercise very little care as to the kind of seeds they sell, but to show you that the Bill is not of that sweeping character that hon. gentlemen sometimes assume, I may say that of 450 samples that were received by the department from those who bought, not from seed merchants but from country merchants, of timothy, 49 per cent would grade No. 1, so that one-half at all events would be of that high standing.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That was from Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, from all part of the Dominion. The best timothy is from certain sections of Ontario. Of alsike, 17 per cent would grade No. 1, and of red clover, 21 per cent was No. 1. Of 196 samples received from the seed merchants—those who had to take some care as to the quality of the seed they exposed for sale—of timothy, 76 per cent of all the samples received would grade No. 1, of alsike, 54 per cent, and of red clover, 63 per cent, would grade No. 1. That shows that the majority of the seeds dealt in are of a high character. The percentage that attain to the highest standard is very large.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does the hon. gentleman mean No. 1, as provided for in clause 4 of this Bill ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is the highest standard.

The clause was adopted.

On subclause 2,

2. The provisions contained in this section shall not apply to the sale of seed that is grown sold and delivered by any farmer on his own premises, for seeding by the purchaser himself, unless the purchaser of the said seed obtains from the seller at the time of the sale thereof a certificate that the said seed is supplied to him subject to the provisions of this Act.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved that the clause be amended by inserting after 'himself,' the words, 'on land of which he is the owner.'

He said: My reason for moving this amendment is that in the province from which I come there is a very large amount of land that is rented, and tenants are usually required to leave a certain area of the land seeded down when the lease terminates. For instance, say a man rents a farm of 100 acres, forty acres of which is under grass when he gets possession; the landlord will require him to leave forty acres of the farm seeded down when the lease terminates. Without this amendment the tenant could procure the worst kind of seed and use it for this purpose, and it would comply with the terms of his lease. Now I desire to provide that tenants shall be required when they enter into a covenant of that kind to sow as pure seed as can be procured. The owner of the land, if he chooses to use impure seed, injures himself, but the same option should not be given to the man who simply leases the land.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The department decline to accept the amendment. They do not give any special reason, except that it will preclude the tenant farmer from getting the benefit of subsection 2, and also because it conflicts with clause 13 which reads:

13. Any sample of seeds taken from any seed which are found or suspected to be sold in violation of the provisions of this Act shall be taken and forwarded to an official seed analyst:
(a) from seeds that are sold in sealed packages, sacks, bags or receptacles, at the time of the breaking of the seal thereon; and
(b) from seeds that are not sold in sealed packages, sacks, bags or receptacles, within seven days from the date on which the seeds entered into the personal possession and became the property of the purchaser.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This is an exceedingly important matter. The objection of the department is that the tenant farmer will not have the right to buy impure seed and sow it as if he owned the land. If the owner of the land chooses to sow impure seed, he has the privilege of doing so; the land is his own and he can do with it as he likes, but this amendment is intended to protect the owner of leased land from having it destroyed by the use of improper seed. I cannot see what reasonable objection the department could possibly have to this amendment. I have consulted with a great many farmers in the district from which I come, and they consider it is an important amendment, because it is the only protection the owner of a farm can have against his farm being destroyed by the sowing of bad seed.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—While there might possibly be some just cause for an amendment of this kind, yet we must consider how it may operate upon the owners of a property. It would look reasonable, under the circumstances to which my hon. friend refers, that a tenant farmer might buy seed that was not of good quality and sow it upon the farm, and thus injure the farm. But is it supposed that the government should make a law to protect a farmer's land under such circumstances? I should think not. I should think that would be a matter between the tenant and the farmer. Supposing I am a landlord owning one hundred acres of land and sow it in seed, and afterwards rent my farm to a tenant. I buy any kind of seed I feel inclined to use. If I sow the farm with cheaper seed than that used by the tenant, what position will the tenant be in when he takes possession? He must buy the most expensive seed, in which there will be no impurities, and that places him at a disadvantage. Is it reasonable and just that the tenant should be placed in a different position from the original owner of the property. I can see no hardship in this clause, and I think the government would do well to pass it in its present shape. The owner of property adjoining my farm would know whether the land was pure or impure. A tenant will not willingly seed down land with cheap seed and thereby injure the property, even if he were going away. Then, again, is it fair that a poor tenant struggling for an existence should be placed in a worse position than the owner of the land? I say it is not. We ought to deal out even-handed justice, and I would suggest that it would be better to withdraw this amendment and pass the Bill as it stands. If any hardship arises, let the government amend the measure next session so as to suit the requirements which may arise.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—My hon. friend evidently has not had very extended experience in the matter of renting land and handling farms. I have had a great deal of experience for the last thirty years, and there is nothing an unscrupulous tenant is more likely to do when he is going to leave the land and not get the benefit of the crop than to simply comply with the terms of the lease by using the very cheapest seed he can get. I contend that the tenant is not deprived of any right, because the rule should be that men should buy proper and pure seed to sow land in every case. If this amendment is not inserted, I consider that it will be unfair to those who have rented farms to have their land destroyed by the sowing of noxious weeds. The object is, no doubt, to allow one farmer to sell to another, but I do not like the clause at all. I should prefer that the Bill be not passed; but if it is going to be passed, I intend to press the amendment, because I consider it an important matter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no doubt my hon. friend means well by his amendment, but I fear that it will not have the desired effect. A farmer is selling seed to another farmer who is an owner of some land and a tenant of other land. How is the vendor of the seed to know what part of it is to be used on a rented farm and what part is to be used by the owner himself? I can foresee any amount of difficulty in bringing this into operation. Very often with us the same man is both an owner and a tenant, and he buys seed, probably in one lot, for the use of both his farms. It is my own practice on rented land to provide the seed. That is part of the contract, and I do not leave it in the power of my tenant to spoil my land with bad seed. I think the remedy is in the hands of the owner himself. He can include a provision in his lease such as I have mentioned. The tenant will be very glad to allow him to furnish the seed, and in that case it will be all that could be desired by the owner. I am afraid the amendment would not be very useful, because, as I have stated, very often the same person is a tenant and an owner.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Even admitting that the tenant may be an owner and at the same time the lessee of other property, the hon. gentleman argues that it would not be better to compel him to buy pure seed for use on the rented land as well as on his own land. I think that is not a good argument. In 99 cases out of 100 a farmer will go to a stationer and buy the ordinary form of lease, and in that form you will find a clause providing that he must destroy the wild mustard, &c., but there is nothing said about the purity of the seed to be used, and the result is that under the provisions of this Bill he might use any amount of filthy seed upon the farm of which he is tenant. Very often farmers have disputes with their tenants during the term of the lease. A little difficulty arises, and ill-feeling follows, and the tenant endeavours to get everything possible out of the farm, pocketing all he can for the three, four or five years during which he has the farm rented. In order to save himself a few dollars, he can under this clause obtain spurious seed which will be injurious to the farm. I am glad to say that in our province a very laudable effort is made by farmers to keep their hands clean. I am sorry to observe that the same plan is not followed in Quebec. I was amazed a few years ago, while travelling from Montreal to Quebec, to find the whole country between those places coloured yellow with wild mustard. It is surprising that the province of Quebec have not made a better effort to rid the country of these obnoxious weeds. We are doing the best we can in our province, and the Minister of Agriculture, I suppose in order to cultivate the kindly feeling of the province of Quebec is saying to them: 'We are not going to interfere with you. We are going to allow you to sell one to the other whatever kind of spurious seed you like to buy. But we will insert a provision that where a seedsman sells seeds he must show that they are pure and clean.' I do not think that is a wise provision. I commend the government for the provisions of the Bill. If what they are contending for could be enforced, it would be all right; but if you open the door for one farmer to sell spurious seeds to another you are making a mistake. I desire to provide against a tenant being permitted to destroy the land of the owner by sowing a filthy seed and saying: 'I am complying with the provisions of the Bill.'

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I am not a lawyer, but I have been a farmer ; and I think that this Bill is introduced for a very wise purpose and is very much needed. I think we recognize the wisdom of the government in undertaking to rid us of the great evil which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has so graphically pictured. No doubt in some parts of the country the evil is more prevalent than in others, but wherever it exists it mars the beauty of the country for every practical farmer. At first I was very suspicious of this Bill and its practical workings, and I am not even yet clear that it can be worked out in detail in a manner satisfactory to every section of the country and also to the salesmen of seed. But I think that as the government have undertaken this reform in regard to the proper seeding of the land of this country, the responsibility should rest with the Agriculture Department, because if we undertake to tinker with the Bill, so to speak, or to improve upon it—that would be the more courteous term—the responsibility will rest with the Senate. If we pass this measure in its entirety, it will be easy to observe the practical working of it. The Agriculture Department will remedy the defects as they come under notice, and we will not be burdened with the responsibility of the Bill. As they have undertaken this good work let them become solely responsible. Give them a free hand and let them work it out.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I was very much pleased to hear my hon. friend from Wellington state that the province of Quebec has adopted the orange colour, in regard to the soil, at least.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the only redeeming feature in the whole province.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What he said is perfectly true, the province of Ontario had developed the orange colour, and the province of Quebec thought it might be a good example to follow. I think it must be several years since the hon. gentleman visited Quebec, because we have driven the yellow colour out. Five years ago the soil was largely coloured yellow, but we have endeavoured to drive that colour out, not only for the benefit of the animals, but for the benefit of the citizens as well. The hon. gentleman is right in stating that wild mustard was prevalent not only over the province of Ontario but the province of Quebec, but the farmers have done their duty there in eradicating it. If the hon. senator would travel from Montreal to Quebec now he would find there is much less yellow to be seen than there was five or six years ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not time to see it yet.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The twelfth will be here in a few weeks. There is not the slightest doubt that the yellow swept from Toronto down through the heart of Quebec, showing the good-will between Ontario and Quebec. But considering that the yellow was not the best colour for the human family we have endeavoured to eradicate it. As a food the yellow was not good for the animals. I consider the hon. gentleman from Wellington has done his duty by the farmers of the country in placing before the House and the country his views in regard to this matter. I am not an expert on this question. I have had little experience, but I am prepared to follow what he considers best for the farmers of the country. Under the circumstances, if the amendment is submitted I am prepared to support the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—In reference to the remark made by the hon. gentleman from Wellington, I may not perhaps be the owner of as many farms or may not have as extensive agricultural interests as he has, but I have been a renter of farms for a number of years, and as such I have had an opportunity of ascertaining the conditions under which a farm is worked. If I am an owner of property, I may use whatever kind of seed I feel disposed to sow. I may not be very cautious as to the quality of the seed. I may buy it from a neighbour, knowing the farm next to mine to be of a certain quality. But if next year I rent my farm, the tenant who comes upon the farm cannot go to the neighbour and buy that seed, but must go where he will have to pay the uttermost farthing for the article. I would appeal to this House as to whether that would be fair to the tenant. The tenant ought to be treated as well as the landlord and should not have unfair burdens imposed upon him. It is difficult enough for him to get along as it is, and I apprehend that the tenant would be as cautious and as careful as the owner in seeing that the farm is properly seeded. The hon. gentleman says there may be friction between the tenant and the landlord and that the tenant would get the worst seed he possibly could and thus destroy the land. I do not apprehend that that would be the case. My experience has been entirely different from that, and I feel that the amendment suggested would be hardly fair to a tenant.

As my hon. friend from Amherst (Hon. Mr. Black) has said, the government assumed the responsibility of introducing this Act as an experiment, for the benefit of the whole country. For that reason we ought to accept the Bill as presented to us, and hold them responsible for its provisions. It cannot do any serious injury for one year. We do not expect the government to be perfect and if they say to us next year: 'We have made a mistake,' the matter can easily be remedied. My hon. friend has a desire to do what is right but he ought not to brand the tenants of the country as dishonest and suggest that they are going to defraud the landlord. For these reasons I will support the Bill.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—I think the argument of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is rather begging the question. The object of the Bill before us should be to improve the position of the farmer and force him to buy good seed. It is altogether out of the question to come here and appeal on behalf of the tenant for sympathy, and urge that the tenant should be allowed to buy cheap seed. I think that is rather a poor argument. The object should be, not only in the case of the tenant but of any farmer who has not good judgment enough to buy good seed, to force him to do so. The object of the hon. senator from Wellington is a good one, but I think he should go further. If he would strike out the clause in question entirely, and also clause No. 7, there might then be some chance of the Bill operating for the benefit of the farmer. He would have to strike out the exemptions in the clause referred to, for I do not think we should even allow the farmer to sow poor seed upon his own land which will later on injure his neighbour's farm. We should protect him against himself. In clause 7 you are making exemptions and providing that the farmer can sell such seed. Once the farmer undertakes to sell those seeds to others, he becomes a merchant. Why should we permit the farmer to poison his neighbour's lands any more than the seedsman? Those exemptions in the Bill are going to prove injurious; in fact they will make it unworkable and will place the seedsman and the farmer who wishes to buy good seeds in the country in a worse position than if the Bill were not passed.

I am sorry I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) when he says the farmers in Quebec have been eradicating the yellow. That would refer, I presume, to the mustard; I do not suppose he means Orangemen. It is too early in the season to see the mustard, but if the hon. gentleman will go through Ontario or Quebec a month or so later with his eyes open, he will see any amount of mustard—too much of it. Our country has become poisoned with it. The hon. gentleman from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) is right when he speaks of what may be seen travelling between Montreal and Quebec. There is no place where more of it will be seen than near Montreal, where the land is high. One would think the farmers would adopt some means to clean the land, but such is not the case.

As hon. gentlemen have been discussing personal matters, I may say that I had occasion two years ago to buy a farm. Two years before I purchased it, the farm took a prize as a model farm. I bought it in the winter without having seen the crops, and when I came next summer and looked at the crop of mustard, it was as thick as the hair on a dog's back. We had to lose two years crop in order to eradicate the mustard. We succeeded in doing it, however. I regret that our farmers in Quebec are not adopting that course, and that it is necessary that the government should come to the rescue and endeavour to force them to buy good seed. I think the only way we can achieve good results is to make even more amendments to the Bill than are suggested by the hon. gentleman from Wellington. We would require either to drop those clauses altogether or if the Bill were referred to a sub-committee they could obtain the evidence of farmers and seedsmen upon it, and possibly something better could be accomplished. It is quite evident the session will drag along for a considerable time yet, and I think the hon. gentleman from Wellington and the farmers in the House will agree with me that the gentleman who drafted this Bill, must have done it from an experimental point of view, because certainly the Bill is not practicable and would do more injury to the seedsmen and the farmers than if it were not passed.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I do not find fault with the course of the government in the preparation of the Bill. I believe they have the best intentions. Their aim and object is to try to purify the seed—to provide that better and purer seed shall be used, that our country may be preserved from the destruction of the soil by spurious seeds. I give them credit for trying to secure that result. But I agree with my hon. friend, and would much prefer to see this clause dropped altogether, and to provide that when a farmer buys seed to sow on his own land he must buy it from a source that will comply with the other provisions of this Bill. I quite agree that every one should be placed on a level. I would have consented to have the clause expunged, but if it is not expunged, I claim it is right that there should be protection for owners of land who are not present and do not know anything about the seeds that are bought. If tenants are to leave a certain amount of land seeded down and they comply with that provision, and yet 25 per cent of it is found to be mustard or some other seed equally injurious to the land, it is evident that some safeguard is needed; and my object is to prevent the owner of the land from being victimized by his tenant in that way. I was rather amused by the argument of the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas (Hon. Mr. Wilson), and I was quite surprised at the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Amherst (Hon. Mr. Black) that the House should allow the government to assume the responsibility in the matter and permit the measure to be passed. What is the good of this House? What are we here for?

Is the Senate here simply to register the will of the government? If that is all we are here for, we had better shut the door and lock it, for we are of no use at all. I maintain that the Senate was never constituted for that purpose, and that it was never the intention that we should sit like political jumping-jacks merely to register the will of the government. I do not think the government expect anything of that kind. The Senate has a place in the legislation of this country, and senators are expected to discharge their duty in the interest of the country. Any man who feels himself so bound that he must follow the government whether they are right or wrong, and merely register their views, is not here in the interest of his country. I have moved this amendment in the interest of the owners of farms, and I consider that it will afford protection to absent landlords who do not know what is done upon their land. It will protect them to a certain extent from having their lands destroyed by their tenants using impure seeds. I am sorry that some members of the Senate do not view it as I do.

Hon. Mr. BLACK—I have always found that when we begin to talk on agricultural subjects the farmers are in the background and that the lawyers exhibit a great deal of intelligence on agricultural subjects. My hon. friend who has spoken so eloquently and forcibly with regard to the protection of the landlord, should remember that if a man is intelligent enough to become the owner of farms which he leases out, he is quite competent to protect himself. He would rather trust to the lease he would grant than to the seedsmen or the government to keep his farm free from impure seed. Now, following the arguments of the hon. gentleman, I say, first, that we had better leave this matter in the hands of those who know something about it practically, to the men who have gone over this country and seen the evil which prevails. They have found out, through the agricultural institutes of Ontario and Quebec and the maritime provinces, that the people wish the government to take some action, through the Agriculture Department, to check the evil. These men have gathered information that we cannot obtain here, and now some hon. gentlemen are anxious to mar and spoil this Bill. They desire the House to take the responsibility of impairing the efficiency of this measure. The men who have obtained the information, and who have prepared this Bill, understand the subject, and I am willing to leave it to them, not that I have any wish to interfere with the independence of this honourable Senate, far from it; but I see plainly that the men who are criticising this Bill cannot give a better one to the country. I stand here as a free representative man in the parliament of Canada. We have freedom of action and speech; but we have here a measure prepared by men who understand it, and we should not take the responsibility of tampering with the measure and interfering with a plan prepared by men who have been for years gathering information on the question.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I desire to reply to my hon. friend from Wellington, and to say, with reference to his insinuation that I am a mere registrar for the will of the government, that I have always felt a disposition to yield my own judgment to those who have better knowledge of what they are trying to accomplish than I have myself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Provided that the hon. gentleman is not in the opposition.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If I was puffed up with vanity, and if I believed that all knowledge centered in myself; if I believed that I knew more of the subject than those who had spent years in collecting information and devising a scheme whereby this evil could be checked, I would not yield at all. I would in that case do my own will and pleasure only; but I do not think that I possess all knowledge. When my hon. friend makes the remarks to which we have just listened he does not use arguments. Why is he not bold enough to say that he is true to his instinct and that he wants to protect himself against the poor but honest tenant-farmer? I say that is not a courageous course for my hon. friend to pursue. The hon. gentleman wishes to discriminate against the tenant-farmer, to impose on the tenant an obligation from which the owner of the land is free; and because I object to that he tells me that I am only a jumping-jack willing to do the bidding of the government. He says if we are here to register the will of the government we had better get out. Whose will should we register? That of my hon. friend from Wellington, who wishes to deal unfairly with the tenant and to give the landlord all the advantages and privileges? Are we to meet their wishes and deny others the same rights? I say now, as I said before, that the government has been maturing this Bill for a length of time with a view to protecting the country from the spread of noxious weeds, and that I am willing and prepared to give them an opportunity to try their plan. Let this Bill become law for a year, and if it does not meet the approval of the people we can amend it. Is that acting like a jumping-jack? I am prepared to defend my rights and privileges on all occasions, but I am not going to shield myself by a cowardly act and say 'I will do to the tenant that which the tenant ought not to endure.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am opposed to the whole clause for this reason, that it is class legislation. I can see no reason in the interest of the farmer for this distinction being made. If it is wrong for a merchant to sell impure seed, it is equally wrong to allow the farmer to sell it and to propagate weeds. That is my principal reason for opposing this clause.

I am sure when I call the attention of the House to it the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have a distinct recollection of a certain statesman who has gone to his long home, who used to admire government by Order in Council. We used to hear a good deal of that in the lower House. If the doctrine laid down by the hon. member from Amherst (Hon. Mr. Black) and the hon. member for St. Thomas (Hon. Mr. Wilson) is to be acted upon, we will revert to the colonial system, where the Governor in Council is paramount in all matters affecting the government of the country. Now at this advanced stage, to hear doctrines of that kind coming from men who profess to be Liberals is very strange. If it was from an old Tory like myself, or as the hon. Secretary of State used to be at one time, it would be admissible, but it comes from men who claim to be Liberals but who have not advanced as rapidly as ourselves. My hon. friend from Amherst said that in matters affecting the farmers, it is generally found that the lawyers have more to say on the subject than the farmers. My hon. friend to my right (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) is a farmer. My hon. friend from St. Thomas (Hon. Mr. Wilson), though a professional man, has been a farmer also, and my hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) has had experience of farming. The only lawyer who has spoken is the hon. gentleman who has been endeavouring most of his life to eradicate a certain colour from the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I won agricultural prizes for years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He rejoices in the fact that the colour has been to a very great extent eradicated. While I do not sympathize with the hon. gentleman generally when he talks on questions of that kind, I am at one with him in his endeavour, so far as legislation can do it, to eradicate that colour from all the fields in Ontario as well as in Quebec. My hon. friend from Wellington was a little astray when he drew what I thought was a rather invidious distinction between the province of Quebec and Ontario. A month hence if he will keep his eyes open in travelling through the oldest settled portions of Ontario, from here to Brockville, and from Brockville to Toronto, he will see field after field yellow with wild mustard. It is a crime to allow the agricultural industry to be destroyed in such a manner. It seems to me my hon. friend from Wellington was quite right from a constitutional standpoint when he took the ground he did, and for which the hon. gentleman for St. Thomas took him so severely to task. It is true the government of the country is held responsible for legislation emanating from themselves, and this is a government Bill, but we as legislators are equally responsible to the people if we give it our support. I do not hesitate to say that this clause which we are now discussing was put into the Bill in the House of Commons in order to secure as far as possible the vote of the farmer in the different portions of the Dominion. It was not in the Bill, if I am correctly informed, when it came from the Department of Agriculture, but it was pointed out in the House of Commons that it would materially affect the interest of the poor farmer, as he was called, when he was buying seed from his neighbours and that amendment was made to the Bill in order to meet that objection and secure if possible the political influence of the voters. Now if this House performs the functions for which it is established it will correct errors of that kind that creep in during discussion in the popular branch. That is my idea of the duties of the Senate. My attention has just been called to the fact that I was somewhat in error in the statement I made with reference to the amendment to the Bill. It was not in the Bill that was introduced and withdrawn last year, but it was in the Bill introduced this year. But the influences to which I have called the attention of the House, are, I firmly believe, the influences which led the Minister of Agriculture to add this clause to the Bill. An hon. gentleman talked of fads. We have ministers —I am not finding fault with this ministry more than others,—who have fads. There are certain ministers and certain hon. gentlemen who have fads, and this Bill emanates from a lawyer, if that be a crime. I do not think it is. A lawyer ought to be able to draft a clause to meet the objects which he has in view. The great objection to the Bill is that which I indicated in the first place. That is, it draws an invidious distinction between two classes of people. As was intimated by one hon. gentleman, the moment a farmer purchases he becomes a trader, no matter what use he may make of the article he purchases. My hon. friend from Wellington did not fully comprehend the statement made by my hon. friend from Marshfield. If this becomes law in its present shape, then the system which has been practised by my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) is the one which should be carried out and provided for by every man who leases a farm to another. He tells me, as he stated, not quite so fully, a few moments ago, that whenever he leases a farm to a tenant he makes a proviso that he shall furnish the seed which the tenant sows upon the land. He asks : 'How much seed do you want to sow on the land,' and then he furnishes that seed. It has to meet his approval before he permits it to be sown upon the land; and of course he charges the lessee for it. There is the only remedy that suggests itself to me. I am not a farmer, but it seems to me to be common sense. This talk about the poor tenant and the landlord I look upon as—I do not wish to say it disrespectfully—so much clap-trap. We are dealing with a very important subject. The government deserve a great deal of praise, I admit, for making provision to secure the use as far as practicable of pure seed by our farmers, and to eradicate as far as possible by any and all means the deleterious effect of impure seed. I have arrived at that stage when, Tory though I am, I do not want to see any government by Governor in Council. There are two branches of parliament, one elected, the other appointed, one to act in accordance with the will of the people as far as is practicable, and the other to check improper legislation whenever it comes before them; and on that ground we ought to act, apart altogether from politics. Politics has nothing to do with a question of this kind—nothing in the world——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A Conservative wants a clean wheat-field as well as a Liberal, and if we can effect the object by legislation let us do it; but on no account let us put on the statute book a clause which gives concessions to one class of people and detroys the effect that the whole law is intended to accomplish.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the proposition made by my hon. friend from Wellington could really be made effective, I should personally be disposed to accept it, but if he will only consider it, he will see that it would be absolutely inoperative. The only plan that can possibly secure the object he has in view is that suggested by the hon. member for Marshfield. In the first place the landlord would know nothing about the seed until a year and one-half afterwards, after the seeds had germinated and grown up; and therefore there could be no prosecution against the tenant under this Bill, because to effectually prosecute any one for using impure seed a sample must be produced within seven days for analysis. We know that the tenant sowing the seed would not furnish a sample to the landlord. The landlord would only find out about it when the seeds were growing. There is only one way for the landlord to protect himself and that is in the lease, because he could prosecute when he found by ocular demonstration that improper seed had been sown. My hon. friend will see the change which he proposes would effect nothing. It would be delusive. I might read what was said while this clause was being debated in the other House in reference to the objection taken by my hon. friend from Belleville. Mr. Fisher's observations were as follows:

> Practically it exempts the case of the farmer who, on his own soil, sells seed which he has grown himself on that very soil, to a neighbouring farmer who is going to sow it. . . . The farmer who purchases the seed probably knows the land of the farmer who raised it—knows whether it is clean land—knows pretty well what kind of weeds were growing on that farmer's fields, and he purchases the seed with his eyes open to all these things. Whereas, if he buys the seed from the seed merchant, he does not know where the seed was grown, does not know whether they are clean or not; does not know whether the seed came from a thousand miles away or from the next farm, and therefore does not know what evil weeds he may be introducing into his own farm and his own section. The two cases are entirely different, and it is for this purpose of preventing an unnecessary interference with sale and purchase of seeds among neighbours that this proviso and exemption is made. The exemption is very small, because if the purchaser chooses, he may require that the seed be sold under the provisions of the Act.

It is quite competent for the purchaser to require a certificate under the Act, and that will protect him.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—When the Bill was first presented to the Senate and printed, I sent a copy of it to all the agricultural societies in the county of Wellington from which I come, and I also made a note of the amendment that I had proposed. In every single instance in which I got a reply—and I got a reply from four out of every five that I wrote to—my proposed amendment was heartily endorsed. I claim that the county of Wellington is one of the cleanest from weeds in the Dominion. We have the Agricultural College there and I claim that no better farmers are to be found anywhere than in Wellington, and our agricultural societies are composed of intelligent men. When I received a favourable reply from four out of every five to whom I wrote, I concluded the amendment was a good one. They agreed with me that it was absolutely necessary ; and that is why I have suggested it to the House.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I wish to dissent from the view taken by some hon. members that the Senate should throw the responsibility of this Bill on the government. The Bill is before us, and it is the duty of the Senate to give it careful consideration. I say this in advance of the action I may take before the Bill passes, because I am going to move some amendments myself. In connection with the amendment that has been proposed by the hon. gentleman from Wellington, I would say that while there is an apparent inconsistency in allowing farmers to do that which we do not allow seedsmen to do, the only means by which the landlord can protect himself is by following the course suggested by my hon. friend from Marshfield, either by purchasing the seed himself or inserting in the lease that the seed to be sown must be up to the standard provided in this Bill. The amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Wellington will not be effective because a sample of the seed must be sent within seven days from the date of its purchase, for examination at the seed department. The landlord cannot know what seed is sown, and the only way he can protect himself is by purchasing the seed himself or binding the tenant to use seed of the standard required by this Bill. There are some other clauses that I desire to have amended, but I want to say now that I dissent from the sentiments expressed by some hon. members who say that this Bill should be left with the government. It is before us now and we have to deal with it.

The CHAIRMAN—Does the hon. gentleman press his amendment ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Yes, I certainly do.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should like to draw the attention of the House to the early discussion with regard to this Bill. A great deal was said about forcing clean seed upon the farmers, and particularly when the seed had to be bought through seedsmen. From this provision farmers who raise their own seed were exempted, and they are allowed to sell their own seed to other farmers. That in itself is class legislation, but that is what the hon. member from Wellington still wants to enforce—that the man who owns a farm may with impunity sow any kind of seed on his farm because the land is his own. The desire of the government, if I understand it, is to stop the propagation of impure seed. It is proposed if he is not the owner of the farm to force him to get pure seed, but if the farm he cultivates happens to be his own he is to be exempt from the operation of the law. We have gone far enough in all fairness when we exempt the farmer from the regulations imposed by the government, but do not force the first part and the last part of this Bill on two classes of people—first on the seedsmen and then on the tenant farmers. You do not allow the seedsmen to sell impure seed, and it is proposed that the tenant farmer shall not be allowed to use impure seed, but you make an exception in favour of the farmer, and allow him to use or sell impure seed raised by himself, and to propagate weeds. After dealing in a liberal way with the farmer who owns the land he cultivates, you turn to the tenant, the man who is not fortunate to own a farm in his own right, and say, 'You must not buy impure seed, you must leave the farm that you occupy in good shape,' while his neighbour who owns the land he cultivates may use impure seed. We should not throw any more burdens on the seedsman or the tenant farmer than we thrown on the farmer who owns the land he cultivates. If there is any person in this country for whom we should legislate along the lines suggested by the hon. leader of the opposition, surely in all fairness it is the man who is too poor to own a farm of his own. I therefore hope this House will not accept the amendment of my hon. friend from Wellington. While I uphold everything he said with regard to the fertility and beauty of the county he represents I am sure that the replies which my hon. friend got were from the men who own the farms, and that he did not get replies from the tenants that they would consent to buy a higher standard of seeds for the lands they were occupying when the farmers who own the lands are alllowed to sow whatever seed they like.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—In reply to the remark of the hon. gentleman, I am not in a position to say whether these men are owners of land or not. They are simply the presidents or secretaries of the agricultural associations. Now with regard to the point which the Secretary of State called attention to, that this proposal of mine would be nugatory on account of clause 13, I will read clause 13 to the House. It reads as follows :

13. Any sample of seeds taken from any seed which are found or suspected to be sold in violation of the provisions of this Act shall be taken and forwarded to an official seed analyst.

But the purchaser of seed from a farmer, where he bought adulterated seed, would not be purchasing in violation of this Act if he purchased the seed for the purpose of sowing it. The violation could only be in cases where a man purchased seed not from a farmer for the purpose of sowing, but from a seedsman, so that this would not interfere with it.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—It may seem presumptuous for me, being better known perhaps as a professional man than otherwise, to offer any observations upon the question before the House; but I trust that in saying a few words I will not render myself amenable to the charge that 'fools rush in where angels fear to tread.' I am a professional man, but it is my pride and it has been my pride all my life that I spent my earlier years until I reached manhood on a farm, and I have not only lived upon a farm but I have worked on a farm ; and I took an intelligent interest in farming and tried to make the farm on which I lived the model farm of the neighbourhood. Since that time up until the present I have been either directly or indirectly associated with agriculture, and for the last thirty years I have been a landlord I have taken precious good care as to the kind of seed my tenants should sow, and it seems to me it would be impossible for this House to legislate for all cases that may arise. My own view is that the amendment is scarcely necessary. I believe that all that is aimed at by the amendment could be more perfectly secured by a properly framed lease. Every good farmer who has a tenant has his lease reduced to writing. That lease should contain special clauses to cover every possible contingency, and in that way the case would be met better than by legislation, and if the owner or landlord is not protected it is his own fault. There are two ways in which he can protect himself, the way suggested by the hon. leader of the opposition, and the manner proposed by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, by the owner and landlord stipulating in the lease that no seed either grain, hay or grass seed, shall be sown except that selected and provided by himself, or that the tenant shall not sow any grain, timothy or clover seed unless it is pure. If farmers do not protect themselves it is their own fault. It is true we have been visited by the yellow peril which is prevalent in Quebec. Quebec has not a monopoly of it. Around Cobourg we have been struggling with it for thirty years, and there is no doubt it has been the cause of great damage to the agricultural community of that portion of Ontario in which we have as magnificent farms and as intelligent, enterprising and successful farmers as anywhere in Ontario. I find in nearly every case that if a man's farm is fouled with wild mustard or weeds it is largely his own fault in the inception. I wish to impress upon hon. gentlemen the fact that the landlord can protect himself by his lease as well and better than he can by any legislation this House can pass; and if he does not do that, it is his own fault.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It appears to me there is going to be a good deal of trouble in enforcing this law. How will it be possible for the man who grows the seed for sale to put tags on each bag giving the names of the different seeds set forth in the Bill ? I think it is simply impossible. While every hon. member in this House will be glad to have the government, or any hon. senator, suggest anything that might do away with obnoxious weeds and furnish pure seed, it seems to me that it is almost impossible to accomplish that result by legislation. If the provincial governments and the municipalities, through their officers, require the farmer to keep his farm clean and destroy noxious weeds, they will see that the man who sells clean seeds will get the custom, and it seems to me that will do more than anything else to remedy the evil. I ask the hon. Secretary of State how do the officers consider it possible for a farmer selling seeds to-day to label the bag which contains the seed with the names of all the noxious weeds? The farmer would have to go over the dictionary and write out a list of the names, and if he made a mistake he would be liable to the penalty under the Bill. I think it is impracticable in the case of the farmer selling to the seedsman. As far as the seedsman is concerned, I consider it is proper to restrict him, but the farmer cannot be familiar with all those names.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Clause 7 provides that the farmers are exempt from the clause with reference to putting the tags on the bags.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Clause 5 reads as follows:

5. The Governor in Council may make regulations determining the maximum proportion of seeds of the weeds named in sections 3 and 4 of this Act, that may be tolerated in any seeds without affecting their character as being within the meaning of the said sections free from the seeds of the said weeds.

If the government make regulations that there shall be not more than five in a thousand, surely the farmer can tell if there is more than that proportion of wild mustard in the seed. I do not think there is any hardship in that provision.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I think that is only after the seed goes into the possession of the seedsman.

The amendment was lost, and the clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I would suggest that in the 15th line of this clause the word 'germinable' should be struck out, and that the words 'sound and reasonably plump' should be inserted. If a seed is sound and reasonably plump it is reasonable to suppose that it will germinate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To the eye it may be plump, and yet not be germinable. Some seeds lose vitality after a certain number of years, and besides this clause is purely optional. A man need not mark it No. 1 seed, but if he does so mark it, the purchaser is entitled to get a seed that will germinate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. gentleman say how it is intended to ascertain what number of seeds out of each hundred is germinable? The clause says:

And contain out of every one hundred seeds not less than ninety-nine seeds of the kind or kinds represented, or seeds of other useful and harmless grasses and clovers, of which ninety-nine seeds must be germinable.

How in the world is a merchant to ascertain whether it is germinable or not? A seed may be plump and to all appearances contain all its vitality, but its age may have destroyed its vitality and the germinable character of it. Any one who has sown garden seeds knows that to be a fact. But the difficulty in this clause is that it says it must be germinable. Can any hon. gentleman tell us how it is to be ascertained that these seeds are germinable? If there happen to be only 89 seeds germinable out of 100, the man is subject to a penalty.

The CHAIRMAN—If he sells it as No. 1.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps it is presumptuous on my part to give an opinion, but it does seem to me that the character of the Bill is altogether impracticable, and I come to that conclusion after looking at the result of the investigation which took place on this subject in England, and the difficulties they had in arriving at any decision as to the germinable character of seed. A variety of causes are pointed out which render it totally impracticable; but it does seem to me that the proposition made by the hon. gentleman from Lindsay (Hon. Mr. McHugh) is a reasonable one and will do away with the dangerous character of the wording of this clause when you come to apply the penalties.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a general thing what the hon. gentleman from Lindsay says has a great deal of force in it, but this clause really applies only to the seedsman. It does not apply to the farmer. Now if one goes to a seedsman and buys seed which is marked No. 1, or which is represented as being seed of the very best quality, surely he has a right to expect that nine out of ten of the seeds which he buys will be germinable and that is all that this clause provides. The seedsman has every opportunity to ascertain whether or not the seeds are germinable, but the party who is purchasing has not. If nine-tenths of the seeds are not germinable, then the seedsman should not mark his seeds No. 1. I think that this is one of the most important and valuable clauses in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—The objection to this clause does not apply to the seeds marked No. 1. They would be fully protected, but if the seedsman does not mark the bag No. 1, he can sell any kind of seed in it. There is no restriction whatever upon the bags not marked No. 1. I think the objection raised by my hon. friend in reference to the seeds being germinable is very easily gotten over, because he can in a very short time tell whether those seeds are germinable or not. When he buys the seeds if he puts a certain number, 25, 50 or 100, between two damp cloths he will soon discover whether they are going to germinate or not. The objectionable feature is that you have no check upon the bags not marked No. 1, and it is practically unworkable for that reason.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I think it will take from 14 to 21 days for the seedsman to tell whether the seeds are germinable or not. They buy them to-day and they are selling them out to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—They keep them in quarantine four days.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—If the seed is sound and reasonably plump, and has not been musted, I think there is very little doubt that 90 per cent will germinate, and it is only to protect the seedsman against parties who might take action. He cannot tell whether the seed is germinable or not, because he cannot hold it long enough to try it. He would have to keep it beyond seeding-time in order to give it a test, and I am fully satisfied that if we insert the words 'sound and reasonably plump.' It will answer the purpose.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Our object should not be to protect either the seedsman or the farmer. If the seedsman marks his seed No. 1, it should be No. 1, and I do not wish to protect him in regard to that; but the objection I have to the clause is that you have no control whatever over bags not marked No. 1.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Supposing a man goes to a merchant and buys a certain quantity of seed and the man sells to him something which is guaranteed to be up to the standard required under this Act. After some time the man says: 'Well, that seed did not grow. Ninety per cent of that seed did not germinate.' The dealer brings an action at law to recover the price of the seed. I should like to know how he can recover the price. I think it is going to result in a great many lawsuits. And in this particular case, unless the seller can prove that ninety seeds out of ninety-nine were germinable he cannot collect the money.

The amendment was lost.

The clause was adopted.

On sub-clause (d) of clause 7,

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Sub-clause (d) is as follows :

(d) Seed marked 'screenings' and held or sold for export only.

I think you are going to destroy the export trade of this country if you have to brand a seed as screenings. Any one who knows anything about the foreign seed trade knows it is carried on by sample. The sales are all made by sample. The seedsmen send their samples to Germany, France and England, and the seedsmen there order according to samples. If the goods supplied are not equal to the sample they are thrown back on the seller's hands. I have an amendment which I will move to sub-clause (D). After the word 'seed' insert 'held for export only.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend's proposed amendment would simply destroy the seed trade of the country. If our farmers were going to sell screenings abroad it would put Canadian seed below par. There have been complaints about the butter and cheese, and we are not going to flood the European market with screenings. I do not think that proposition would be acceptable to the House.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—If a man sells screenings the buyer receives screenings and if a man buys No. 1 sample, that is what he receives. The seeds must be up to the sample, and the foreign merchant can protect himself. What are we going to do with the seed if we do not sell it abroad ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It must be honestly marked.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—My amendment does not interfere with the Canadian trade in any way, and it maintains the quality of seed that must be sold in Canada. The foreign merchant protects himself by getting the quality of seed he buys. If he wants Canadian sample No. 1, he orders it and gets it.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat should receive the careful notice of the government. You have a standard at which it is hardly possible for the seedsman to keep within the law. The question was asked in committee, what are you going to do with seed that contains six impure seeds to the thousand ; and the answer I got from a gentleman representing the Department of Agriculture was that it is to be called screenings. Now the very fact of exporting seeds of this kind under the name of screenings will simply damn our export trade.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—No, on the contrary—

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Yes it will. There ought to be some other word than screenings, either second quality or standard No. 2. Screenings would really mean the impurities only of the seed. Such is not the case. The gentleman who represents the department says that if six weed seeds are found in a thousand it is adulterated. No latitude is given. Six-tenths per cent would make it screenings. Would it not be better to make it standard No. 2, to say second quality instead of screenings. The hon. gentleman who has resumed his seat says it is sold according to the samples sent, and the prices given. We are told there is not the same standard required, but if you use the word screenings, you will stop the whole of our export trade.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED from the committee reported that they had made progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THIRD READING.

Bill (106) An Act respecting the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

PITBLADO DIVORCE CASE.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the thirtieth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred Bill (Q) An Act for the relief of Isaac Pitblado together with the evidence.—Hon. Mr. Gowan.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think that this Order of the Day should be allowed to stand till some day next week. There is something lacking in the report, and I observe that one of the parties fainted.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman will recollect that the report of the committee states that they did not print a part of the evidence, giving their reason for it, and I think any hon. gentleman who paid any attention to the evidence must come to the conclusion that if ever a divorce was justified it is justified in this case. Sufficient evidence was reported to warrant the committee in reporting the Bill, but a portion of the evidence was eliminated because it was not considered in the interest of public morals to publish it. This case has been pending for some time, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not object to the report being adopted to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could we be furnished with the minutes of this case ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Oh, yes. I do not know whether the shorthand report of the proceedings was extended or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I mean the minutes of the committee.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—They will be found in the minutes of the House.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Not only the minutes, but the portion of the evidence which has been eliminated, will be presented to the House. Everything in connection with the investigation will be placed before the Senate, so that hon. gentlemen need have no fear that they will not see all the evidence.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know if the minutes of the proceedings have been reported to the House ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Yes. The minutes have already been presented to the House. It was thought best at first to eliminate some of the evidence in the interest of morality, but that portion of the evidence will also be reported to the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The case may be clear to those who heard all the evidence, but in reading the report of the evidence as submitted, I find it falls short and that something has been suppressed. I am not speaking of the portion suppressed at the commencement of the case, but at the conclusion of the case the petitioner appeared before the committee and stated that on the 24th May when he returned to the house, he found certain domestic arrangements which excited his suspicion. Nothing regarding that matter appears in the evidence.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If the hon. gentleman will exercise a reasonable amount of patience, all the evidence which was taken will be presented to the House for the information of the hon. gentleman before any motion is made for the acceptance of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then the consideration of the report must be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken, because it was the intention of the committee not to extend the Eggo evidence. Of course if it were demanded by the Senate or House of Commons, the evidence would have to be extended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would not ask that it be printed, but I ask that the matter be not further proceeded with to-day because I wish to see the remainder of the evidence.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If the committee has decided to print all the evidence, the report should not be adopted before the evidence is printed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is the statement of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The report of the committee, as set forth on page 512 of the minutes of proceedings, states that they considered it in the interest of morality that the Eggo evidence should not be extended, and the counsel appearing on behalf of the respondent admitted that there was sufficient other evidence to warrant a divorce.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Nothing of that kind appears in the evidence.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The minutes contain the statement.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to see the statement that counsel for the respondent has made such an admission.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—He has done so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where is that to be found ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—In the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that the consideration of the report be postponed until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the hon. gentleman is quite right. If the evidence has not been printed, the report of the committee ought not to be adopted to-day. Let the matter stand until those who have charge of it are present to make a full explanation of the facts in connection with it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—On page 512 of the Minutes of Proceedings of the House will be found the full report of the committee on this case. That report recommends that a portion of the evidence shall not be made public. In answer to my hon. friend who has asked whether the counsel for the defence was a consenting party to this portion of it, I may say that in the report we find that the petitioner and counsel for the respondent both gave their consent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For the non-printing ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I admit that, but the inquiry came to a close and we are told now that the counsel for the respondent made certain admissions which are not in the report. I want to see them, and I therefore ask that the matter be postponed until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—The point under consideration can be fully met by the Senate concurring in the report with the exception of that paragraph which recommends the omission of certain evidence. All the rest of the report could be concurred in, and then as a necessary consequence the evidence will be forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope it is not intended that this filthy part is to be printed ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Anybody who wishes to see the original may do so, I presume.

The Order of the Day was discharged and set down for Tuesday next.

THIRD READING.

Bill (HH) An Act to amend the Grain Inspection Act as regards the selection of commercial grades and samples.—(Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

SEED CONTROL BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (7) An Act respecting the Inspection and Sale of Seeds.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the committee rose we were discussing paragraph (d) of clause 7. Objection had been raised to any seed being marked screenings. I am informed on good authority that that word would not necessarily appear on the packages sent abroad. All seed houses have special names for their various grades of seed exported. Each Canadian seed house has its own peculiar method of grading seed ; and although the word 'screenings' is in the statute, it does not necessarily follow that the seed itself is so marked. On the contrary the firms use their own mark and furnish a sample.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Would not the law compel them to mark the grain in conformity with this Act ? They may give it any special name as indicating that it is their own special seed, but the Bill calls for all grain not grading No. 1 to be marked 'screenings,' and under the Act I feel sure they would have to mark it as such.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised that that is not the view of the department or of the seedsmen. Clause 7 provides that the provisions contained in the Act shall not apply to cases set forth in the following subsections—it is purely a negative statement.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—The very fact of its declaring that it does not apply to seeds marked screenings would indicate that the provision does apply to all seeds not marked 'screenings.' I have been told that if the Act is enforced the seedsmen will be compelled to mark their grain in that way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot find any statutory provision that would force them to mark their seeds 'screenings.' Certainly under clause 7 they would not be obliged to do so.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Would they not be required to do so under clause 3 ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—That clause provides that :

> 3. No person shall sell, or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale, for the purpose of seeding, any seeds of cereals, grasses, clovers or forage plants unless they are free from any seeds of the following weeds.

Then follows a list of the weeds, and the clause continues :

> Unless each and every receptacle, package, sack or bag containing such seeds, or a label securely attached thereto, is marked in a plain and indelible manner :
>
> (a) with the full name and address of the seller ;
>
> (b) with the name of the kind or kinds of seed ;
> (c) with the common name or names of the aforenamed weeds, the seeds of which are present in the seed sold or offered, exposed or had in possession for sale.

The only way to get over that is to mark the packages 'screenings.' They are not allowed to sell them unless they are marked 'screenings.' There is no grade between 'screenings' and No. 1, which means that if a bag of seed contains more than one-half of one per cent of noxious weeds the bag is to be marked 'screenings.' That means that if there are six noxious seeds in a thousand, the seed must be designated 'screenings.' I am very strongly of opinion that the amendment I have asked for is a reasonable one, and one which is in the interest of the seed growers of this country.

They should not have a restriction of that kind put on the seeds they are going to export ; I am in full sympathy with the Bill so far as it tends to improve the character of the seeds sold in Canada, but when seeds are sold by sample in foreign countries, and our legislation makes no provision for any grade between No. 1 and 'screenings.' I think it is objectionable. Some of the best seedsmen in Canada, who handled very large quantities of seeds last year, say that they can only get nine and one-half per cent of seed of the highest grade. I really think that the Bill should not apply to seeds held or sold for export only.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Would you not have good seed exported ?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—There are seeds which are noxious in one country or part of a country which are not noxious in other countries or localities. Another point is this : the fact of that seed for export having to be marked ' screenings ' will have a most damaging effect on the export trade of this country. Competitors can go to the different governments and say, 'you are allowing the importation of Canadian seed which is only screenings,' and thus create prejudice against it, when perhaps as a matter of fact the seed does not contain one per cent of noxious weeds. I hope the Secretary of State will see his way to accept the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice that in the list of names given by the Secretary of State, which are used to designate the character of seeds exported, the word ' screenings ' does not appear ; and I think a moment's reflection will show him that it is an exceedingly unfortunate word to use in this connection. The clause is not necessary, because all that the government wish to accomplish is covered by clause 6, which provides that :

6. No person shall sell, or offer, or have in his possession for sale, for the purpose of seeding in Canada, any seeds of timothy, alsike or red clover, or any mixture containing the said seeds, if the seeds of the weeds named in sections 3 and 4 of this Act are present in a greater proportion than five to one thousand of the seed sold, or offered, exposed or held in possession for sale.

That is really the object of this Bill—to prevent impure seeds being used, and the government should strike out this clause altogether. I notice the hon. gentleman from Lindsay does not think that that would cover his case unless the words ' in Canada ' were added in clause No. 3.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It reads ' in Canada.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree with the Hon. Secretary of State that that is the only inference to be drawn from it, and perhaps it is the correct interpretation, but in calling the attention of the hon. member from Lindsay (Hon. Mr. McHugh) to this, he thought it left a doubt on the subject. The words ' in Canada ' could do no possible harm, because they are used in clause 6 and that confines the restriction in connection with this class of seeds to what is used for seeding in Canada. Really that is all you want. We do not desire to interfere to any great extent with the export trade, and if we strike out that one paragraph, ' seed marked screenings and sold for export only ' leaving the export trade to the operation of the sixth clause, and add the words ' in Canada,' as suggested, in clause No. 3, the object that my hon. friend has in view will be accomplished. The Act will then not be encumbered by having a very exceptionable word added to the classes of seeds exported. If my hon. friend will consult the expert of the department who is present, I am sure he will concur in the suggestion just made.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I have a letter here from Mr. Hogg, of Hogg & Lytle, of Oakwood, Ont., large seedsmen, who say :

Under clause 3 of the original Bill it provided for the seed or seeds of cereals, clover or timothy sold in Canada for the purpose of seeding, but under the amended Bill the words ' in Canada ' are struck out. Now, this simply means that no seeds of cereals can be sold for seed purposes for export or Canada either that will not conform with clauses 3 and 5, and this strikes a serious blow at the fancy pea business, a branch of our trade in which we do a very large business, as well as several other firms in Canada. Surely the men engaged in the seed business in Great Britain, Europe and the United States for the past twenty to fifty years should be competent enough judges, and dealers in Canada ought not to be prevented selling them their seed or grain that they buy on sample, but under clause 6 if the buyer were ever so willing to purchase, and the goods exactly like sample, the seller would be liable to a fine or imprisonment for shipping it.

I may say that perhaps there is no branch of the agricultural industry in our section of the country that has assumed in the last few years the proportions of the seed-growing industry. It is carried on systematically by seedsmen who place the seeds in the hands of the farmer under contract. They have a contract with the farmer as to the price, and they bind the farmer to give them back the whole product of that seed at the price agreed upon. The farmer cannot keep any portion of the seed grown. It has been the most profitable industry in our country, but if this Bill becomes law it will be a most serious matter for the farmers of Ontario, because that business is being very largely carried on. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent every year in the production of these fancy peas throughout our country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to all that the hon. gentleman has said is that the department has been making a special study of this matter for a number of years. Their desire is to favour the production of good seed in Canada. That is the whole object. They have consulted the trade year by year for the last three or four years, and I am advised that it is quite impossible to obtain unanimity of opinion among the large dealers themselves. There is a wide diversity of opinion, and this Bill is drawn up as the most reasonable conclusion, after consulting all the various interests and having in view what is best for the country. Of course if the measure is not found to work in the way hoped for—if it works injuriously to any branch of the trade, it can be amended in another year; and I feel a good deal of hesitation in making changes in it, because I am not familiar with the matter. It is a technical subject altogether and so many various interests are affected by it that really the House ought not to be called upon to make any changes unless it is quite apparent that they are in the interest of the trade—in the interest of the farmer, and in the interests of those who export the article. As I understand the view of the department, the fact that the word 'screenings' appears in the seventh clause in no way involves the packages, as sent abroad, being marked 'screenings,' because the exporters have their own fancy name, and the hon. gentleman from Lindsay has stated that the practice is to sell by sample altogether.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—But according to this Bill the seed must be marked 'screenings,' if it is not No. 1 grade.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no. My hon. friend is quite wrong there. I have before me the first Bill which was discussed in the House of Commons in 1903. Clause 3 of that Bill provides that no person shall sell or expose for sale, or have in his possession for sale, for the purpose of seeding, any seeds of grasses, clover, &c., unless they are free from the seeds of the weeds mentioned. Canada is not mentioned there.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—But it appears in the third clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No one disputes what the hon. Secretary of State has said, but what is the object in using words which are objectionable. If the same end can be attained by leaving that expression out and adopting the suggestions which have been made, why should we not do it? The hon. gentleman lays very great stress on the study which the department has given to this subject. We admit that. That is what the officials are employed for. But notwithstanding all the attention that has been given to it, you will find among these plants which are designated weeds in clause No. 3, some which are not weeds at all. I anticipate that before we get through my hon. friend to my right will call the attention of the Senate to that fact and have the words struck out. We may study a question for years and still another person who has not given the same care and attention to it will discover something that the experts have overlooked. I certainly think that this suggestion might be adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will strike out subclause (d) altogether, if it will procure the passage of the Bill without further discussion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That makes it more restrictive.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I purposely inserted the words, 'for export only.'

The CHAIRMAN—It is quite unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I wanted to place upon the party in whose hands the seed might be found, the onus of proving that he held it for export. I did not want to place the department in the position of having to prove that he held it for export. I was doing it to assist the department in dealing with people in the seed trade who might not be honest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—By omitting subclause (d) we make no reference to the export trade at all. We leave it as it is.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the fact that to do as he suggests would probably make the matter worse than it would be under the present provision. Section 6 of the Act applies only to persons having seed in their possession for sale for the purpose of seeding in Canada. Clause 7 applies to more than section 6, and if the hon. gentleman will refer to clause 3 he will find that it prohibits any person from having in his possession for sale—that is for sale anywhere——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause 7 is purely a negative section; it declares that the Act shall not apply under the conditions named therein.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That does not help the matter so long as we have the language used in section 3. You say that no person shall have in his possession for sale seeds that are not absolutely free from these particular weeds. Now, the provisions of this Act are not to apply to various things. But they are distinctly to apply to all seed having a greater quantity of weeds than is proper, and if subclause (d) is dropped then it follows that all seed held or sold for export comes under clause 3.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am told that in the House of Commons they objected to the word 'Canada' appearing in clause 3, and there is no use in our adopting it if they rejected it there.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Why not meet the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Lindsay by saying that the Act shall not apply to seeds held or sold for export only.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suggest that instead of the word 'screenings' we insert the words 'seeds marked not clean.'

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Not pure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not absolutely clean.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That is as bad.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The objection was to the word 'screenings.' However, I will expunge the clause altogether.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I think if the hon. Secretary of State will carry out the proposition he has now made it will be better than striking out the whole clause. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition, that this Act is intended to purify the character of seeds sown in Canada. We want to protect our lands from impurity and not have the farmers buying something which they do not realize they are buying. That is the whole object, and it is a laudable object; but when seeds are exported there is no necessity for our attempting to injure the prospects of any man who has seeds to dispose of by debarring him from selling them in a foreign market. Let the purchaser be his own judge. It is sold by sample and there is no object in our following the seed which is going out of the country or which is held for export and declaring it to be 'screenings,' thus reducing its value. If it would not interfere with the Bill otherwise, I would consent to striking out paragraph (d) altogether. But if the grade is designated by some other name it would be a decided improvement.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The complaint is that the Bill is too restrictive as it stands. If paragraph (d) is struck out it becomes still more restrictive, and still greater complaint will be made by my hon. friend from Lindsay.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman will read the first part of the clause he will find that it exempts certain seeds from the operation of the Bill. If you strike out that subclause you make the measure much more restrictive, and you accomplish all that we have been fighting about for two days.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the word 'screenings' is objected to, I substitute for that 'not absolutely clean.'

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Whilst that may be a less objectionable term, I cannot understand why the parliament of Canada is going out of its way to protect the foreign market in dealing with the merchants here. The farmers of this country have to sell their seeds and if the seed merchants of this country cannot buy it from them it is left on their hands. The foreign merchant purchases by sample, and knows what he is buying. I would not raise objection or move this amendment if I did not feel that it is a serious matter for the farmers of this country. I come from one of the largest seed growing districts in Canada and only 9½ per cent of the crop was found to grade up to the standard of No. 1, while 90 per cent of the seed grown in the district is used for export purposes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I cannot agree that parliament is going out of its way in protecting the foreign merchants. I think that the general object of our Inspection Acts, the Fruit Marks Act and all other Acts of that nature, is to protect the good name of our exports in foreign countries, and I am afraid that if my hon. friend gets his way with regard to this clause, we will have emasculated the Bill to a very large extent. I am told the clover seed grown in the part of the country where my hon. friend lives is sold in large quantities to Great Britain and that is the best market for it. It is in the interest of the growers and dealers in that seed that its good name should be maintained in Britain. It is the interest of all Canada that the good name of our products should be maintained and my hon. friend's amendment would have the effect, as far as the foreign market is concerned of rendering the Bill nugatory.

The amendment to the amendment was carried.

On subclause 1 of clause 8,

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I should like to know how the question of the violation of this particular clause is to be decided. It says that a certain percentage of the seed may be impure—nine seeds out of every hundred. Supposing a man is brought before a magistrate for having sold seeds not up to the standard of purity. The complainant says he has picked out a hundred seeds and that so many have not grown and that it is not according to sample. Supposing he sold five bushels and the purchaser picks out ten or a hundred or a thousand seeds out of the five bushels, how is he going to establish the fact that that is a fair sample of the whole? You might pick out another thousand seeds that would not have half as many impure seeds in it. I cannot see how you are going to be able to enforce the penalties under this enactment, because it is going to open the way to unlimited disputes as to whether or not the seed is up to the standard of purity. If the Act had provided that you were to have all seed graded No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3, in case of any dispute arising in regard to the purity of the seed the question could be tested by a reference to the Department of Agriculture, or to the experimental farm, submitting a sample of the seed. The decision of the officers should be final, and if their report is that the seed is not up to the standard, that would end the whole matter. The seller would have to pay a fine and penalty. But under this provision there is no way of testing the quality. The man that gets the seed says 'I picked out 100 seeds and when I sowed them, I found that less than the proper percentage sprouted.' The vendor may dispute that, and say that that is not a fair sample of the seed he sold. It will create no end of litigation.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Clause 12 overcomes the difficulty.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 10,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I fear that sufficient provision has not been made in this Bill for the proper enforcement of the law. I remember very well when the Fruit Marks Act was before the House we had a very long discussion on that point. We come now to clauses that are somewhat similar to those that formed part of the Fruit Marks Act. On that occasion I pointed out as strongly as I could that the success of that measure greatly depended on the appointment of properly qualified inspectors. I find the word inspector is used only once in this Bill, but I see that this very clause contemplates the appointment of an inspector, because it speaks of 'any person charged with the enforcement of this Act.' In the next clause reference is made to 'any person charged with the enforcement of this Act,' and that is apart from the official analyst who shall examine the specimens taken out of any seed offered for sale, to find out whether or not they are of the proper quality. This Bill contemplates, and it is proper that it should, the appointment of officers for the enforcement of this law. In my humble opinion those charged with the enforcement of these measures should be qualified persons, and the greatest danger that I apprehend is the appointment, through political influence, of persons not competent to perform their work. In saying this I have no intention of making any political attack, because all governments are alike so far as that is concerned. When the Fruit Marks Act was under consideration I warned the House as strongly as I could of the danger that was likely to arise from the appointment of incompetent persons. I appealed to the late Minister of Justice, who then led the House, and who had charge of the Bill, to fall back on the general Inspection Act and to demand such qualifications as are called for in the appointment of inspectors for the inspection of all staple commodities. I was told that it was quite impossible to do so at that stage of the Bill, but that when the consolidation of the statutes was taken up no doubt the Act would be incorporated with the general Inpection Act and something would be done to provide for the appointment of suitable persons to enforce the Act. I am not going to enter into it now, because it would only divert attention from the points under discussion at present, but at another time I shall undertake to show the gross unfairness and wrongdoing of some inspectors appointed under the Fruit Marks Act, and I think I shall have no difficulty in convincing the government that under the operation of the Fruit Marks Act very great injustice has been done. Having that experience before us, some provision should be made in this Bill for the appointment of suitable inspectors, men who are really qualified to inspect the seed. If the duty is assigned to unfair or unfit men, I can easily conceive that great harm may be done. I was told that one seedsman complained very bitterly of the conduct of persons charged by the department with the selection of seeds in Brantford. Samples of seeds were used in a political contest for the purpose of damaging a person opposed to the men appointed to select those seeds. I mention this in order to impress on my hon. friend the importance of making proper appointments. In whatever way it may be accomplished, we should have qualified men to carry out this law. Otherwise, if the law is unfairly enforced, if the servants of the minister feel it to be their duty or in their interest to try to damage his opponents politically, the Act will do a great deal more harm than good.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fully appreciate the observations of the hon. gentleman, and should very much regret indeed if any official appointed under this Act were unqualified for the work. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will be most particular in any recommendation he makes when selecting either an analyst or an inspector. He must know that the whole success of the Bill depends on the selection of properly qualified persons to enforce the law. The success of the measure will depend upon the honesty and fitness of the persons appointed. The hon. gentleman will observe that in clause 11, special provision is made for the appointment by the Governor in Council of an official seed analyst. Of course he must be a person thoroughly qualified before he can be appointed. We may accept that as a fact.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The theory laid down by the hon. gentleman is correct, but the practice in the past has proved that those theories have not always been acted on. The case referred to by my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) shows that men were selected who were totally unfit for the positions to which they were appointed. My hon. friend has documents in his possession to show that. I understand all that is desired by the hon. senator is this, that some provision be placed in the statute to prevent the possibility of the appointment of unsuitable persons—that if inspectors are to be appointed they should have some other qualification than political influence. I am not speaking now of any particular party, but I quite concur in what my hon. friend says, that in measures of this kind the law should lay down a strict rule and principle, that any one who is appointed for a special duty and a special purpose should be qualified for the position. That is all my hon. friend asks.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should be glad if the hon. gentleman will communicate with the Minister of Agriculture and give the names of those he thinks are not qualified for the positions they hold under the Fruit Marks Act.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I intend to bring this matter up in this House and read the correspondence and report on the subject.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 17,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is no provision so far as I can see for the appointment of persons charged with the enforcement of this Act. I presume it is intended that such appointments shall be made under regulations, and this clause 17 provides that :

> The Governor in Council may make such regulations as he considers necessary in order to secure the efficient enforcement and operation of this Act ; and may by such regulations impose penalties not exceeding fifty dollars on any person offending against them, to be recoverable on summary conviction ; and the regulations so made shall be in force from the date of their publication in 'The Canada Gazette' or from such other date as is specified in the proclamation in that behalf.

This clause should first give the Governor General in Council power to appoint persons to enforce the Act, and provide that the penalties should be not merely imposed upon those who violate the Act, but against inspectors and officials who perform their duty unfairly. If I recollect aright, that was done at my suggestion in the Fruit Marks Act. Perhaps that can all be done under the regulations referred to in this clause. They may impose penalties on persons who offend against the regulations, but to make the clause complete both these points should be covered ; power should be given by regulation to appoint officials to enforce the Act, and these officials should be liable to penalties if they make false reports.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to my hon. friend's observations. I think there is sufficient authority to make the appointments and to enforce the law. This is new legislation and I will admit that it is crude ; it could not be otherwise. It is experimental largely, but it is the result of three or four years' study on the part of those who are charged with the investigation of the subject. It may be necessary to come back next year for changes or amendments, as experience is gained in the working of the Act. It cannot be regarded as complete in its present shape, because it is only experimental.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would be better to have power, as in the case of the Fruit Marks Act, to impose penalties on inspectors who make false reports, and I think the Bill should also contain power to make appointments; otherwise I question whether the Act could be put in force or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the minister to it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Another point is this : I think the officers entrusted with the enforcement of this Act should be sworn.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clearly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There should be no question whatever about that ; these officers should be sworn to do their duty fairly and impartially.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the word 'or' be inserted before 'ergot of rye.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That does not meet my point. Ergot is not propagated by seed at all, and is not a weed. The seeds named here are declared in the introductory words of the clause to be seeds of certain weeds. Ergot is not a plant at all. It is a fungus which forms on the heads of rye and other grain, but is only seriously injurious to live stock when it appears on rye. It produces abortion in cattle. It has its own way of propagation like smut. We know that it is a very bad thing and is liable to be spread by spores, but it is not a weed and does not produce seed. It is a disease, a fungus growth on the rye, is very injurious. It is quite possible that this clause would cover the case, but I do not think the parliament of Canada should put itself on record as saying that ergot of rye is a weed and is produced from seed. We do not want to make ourselves ridiculous. The presence of this fungus in the seed would be a very bad thing indeed. You may not find a single specimen of ergot of rye in seed, and still there may be enough of the spores to contaminate the crop. It is right to put it in as a prohibited thing, but it should be properly described in the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN—Suppose that in line 21, you put in before 'ergot of rye' the words 'are free from ?'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think that would do very well.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that before the words 'ergot of rye' the following be inserted: 'and from sclerotia, known as ergot of rye.'

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think there is a little ambiguity in clause 3 arising from the double use of the word 'unless' in the third line in the beginning of the section and again in the third last line of the first section. I think the word 'or' before the word 'unless' in line 22 would make it clear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am told this was the subject of discussion in the other chamber and there was a great difference of opinion. It was referred to the law clerk, and he arranged it as it is here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am sorry the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) is not present. He and I went over the clause together and he is strongly of the opinion that the word 'or' should be inserted so as to make it intelligible. I fully concur with him in that opinion.

The CHAIRMAN—It is desirable there should be no doubt as to the meaning of what we are enacting, and I think there is force in what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House of Commons agreed to refer the matter to the law clerk and they have accepted the clause as he sent it to them. I think we had better leave it as it is.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER from the committee reported the Bill with certain amendments which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed, under suspension of the rules.

COLONIAL CONFERENCE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns, I ask permission to bring under the notice of the government a cablegram which appeared in the Montreal 'Star' a few days ago. I intended to have called the attention of the Senate to the matter before the Orders of the Day were called, but I unfortunately was absent. I think it is of importance that some authoritative statement should be made by the members on the Treasury benches as to the truth of the statements which appeared in the Montreal 'Star' of the day before yesterday. The heading reads as follows:

Sir Wilfrid Lays Down Conditions.

Before particulars in any future colonial conference.—Wants a British verdict.—Semi-official announcement made in London of Canada's demands.

I may say I intimated yesterday to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that I intended calling attention to the matter. I should have called the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to this question, but he was otherwise engaged with the seed Bill at the time. The paragraph reads as follows:

Special cable from our London correspondent.

London, June 7.—It is announced to-day in the most positive fashion in the radical papers that Laurier, replying to Lyttelton's communications re the next colonial conference has 'firmly refused to take part in any tariff discussion until the opinion of this country has been ascertained at a general election.' The Leeds 'Mercury,' which is bitterly anti-Chamberlainite, rejoices over the announcement, and says that Laurier and other colonial ministers 'see through the Chamberlainite scheme and fully appreciate the difference between the pinch-beck imperialism of the protectionists and the pure gold of disinterested sentiment, of which Rosebery is the leading exponent.

Official circles here are very reticent and will not confirm Laurier's alleged refusal, but it can be confidently stated that if the Canadian Prime Minister has refused, the conference of 1906 will not be held.

If a Liberal ministry is returned here at the next general election their present intention is to let the conference meet in the usual course with a clear prior announcement, however, that all schemes for a preference involving a British tariff against the foreigner are impossible.

I think the country is entitled to know whether there is any truth in the statements made in this cablegram that the premier of the country has indicated to the Colonial Secretary a determination not to become a party to any conference until the whole question has been submitted to the people of Great Britain. I am quite confident that that is not a position that would be justified by the Canadian people, that the premier of the Dominion should intimate to or dictate to the imperial government the course that they should pursue, or lay down any principle upon which he would act in case the conference meets. If this is to be taken as correct, it implies that the premier of Canada has taken the first possible opportunity to indicate to the British people his concurrence in the position taken by the opposition in England. That is the inference to be drawn from the remarks made by the Leeds 'Mercury,' and it will be observed that the 'Mercury' rejoiced at the position which he has taken. That a preference in the British market is of very great importance to this and to other outlying portions of the empire, no one will deny, and if this be true—and the House will understand that I am predicating my remarks on the presumption of its truth—then it is in direct conflict with the statement made by the Finance Minister some short time ago, that unless some concessions were made in return for the prefenence which Canada had given to British manufacturers, the preference which we have given to Great Britain would either be amended and restricted, or withdrawn.

There is another point to which I desire to call the attention of my hon friend who represents the government of this country, and that is contained in the latter portion of this paragraph; that in case the Liberals are returned, no permission would be given to consider questions of trade which would militate against foreigners and in favour of outlying portions of the Dominion. Let me in all sincerity express the hope that no member of the government of Canada will on the invitation of the Colonial Secretary of any government, attend a conference shackled by conditions of that kind. If a conference is to be held it will be, and must be, for the purpose of considering questions which affect the whole empire, the mother country and the outlying portions of the empire; and I do not know any question that will affect us to a greater extent either detrimentally or in our favour than the question of trade. If we can obtain for the products of this country, whether they be the products of manufacturing industries or the farm, concessions which are not given to foreign countries in the markets of England, that certainly must constitute an advantage to us.

I do not propose now to argue the question as to whether we should insist upon concessions of that kind, or whether Great Britain would be prepared to grant such. I merely say that if the conference meets, no representative of Canada should accept a position upon that conference if he is to be shackled by the conditions indicated in the last paragraph of the despatch I have read. It has been attempted to impose these very conditions upon the present government in England before the couference is called. Both Lord Rosebery and Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman claim that these conditions should be laid down for the guidance of the colonial representatives if they meet in conference on the question of trade preference. That is a limitation which I do not think any free self-governing portion of the empire would submit to for a moment. I have considered this question of sufficient importance to call the attention of my hon. friend to it, and I can only express the hope that there is no truth in the statement that the premier of this country has taken the position indicated by this cablegram.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am glad to be able to relieve the mind of my hon. friend from Belleville by informing him that in this paragraph, as is unfortunately very often the case with newspaper paragraphs, there is not a particle of truth, nor is there the slightest foundation for the statements that have been circulated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear. That is what I wanted to ascertain.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, the 13th inst., at 3 p.m.

PITBLADO DIVORCE BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the thirtieth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred Bill (Q) 'An Act for the relief of Isaac Pitblado,' together with the evidence.—Hon. Mr. Gowan.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I wish to make a short explanation in reference to a motion which I intend to make regarding the report now before us. When this case was tried, the first witness gave evidence extending back to a date some six or seven years ago, at a time when the respondent was presumed and supposed to be living a reputable and respectable life in the community in which she resided.

This evidence of adultery is not of a particular nauseating or offensive character, nor does it differ in any material degree from evidence ordinarily taken before the committee, and submitted to this House. Any one who is under the impression either that the morals of parliament would be contaminated, or a prurient taste gratified by the publication of this evidence, is very much mistaken. After the depositions of two subsequent witnesses had been taken, in which evidence of adultery at a recent date was very clearly established, a conference took place between the counsel engaged in the case with the result that the defendant practically threw up the sponge; but inasmuch as there were young children of this family growing up in the community, both parties mutually requested the committee that if it were possible the evidence of the first witness might not be printed and circulated, even to the limited extent of distributing it with the report of this committee as made to parliament ; and the committee, being anxious to comply with the request, made the recommendation contained in their report. But this case, on account of the prominence of the parties connected with it, has assumed something of the proportions of a cause célèbre. A good deal of discussion has taken place amongst parties who are not conversant with the reasons which animated the committee in making this report, and who imagine because they have heard in some way or other that certain evidence has been suppressed, that there is something peculiar or underhand about it. As a matter of fact there has been no suppression. The evidence is all there. It is in shorthand, but there is no difficulty in having it extended if desired. I have been notified, however, by several members of the House of Commons that the report would certainly be attacked there on account of the insufficiency of the evidence already published, and as the members of this committee have no desire to be attacked on any such ground and to be obliged, as it were, to publish what has been withheld, as they certainly would be if called upon to do so, we have come to the conclusion that it would be better to allow the whole of the evidence to be printed in the ordinary way. With this explanation, therefore, I beg to move :

That this report be not now concurred in, but that it be taken into consideration on Tuesday of next week, and that in the meantime the whole of the evidence be printed and circulated in the ordinary way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would that include the minutes, which I understand were made, of the understanding reached by the counsel for both sides? That would show why the committee did not publish the whole of the evidence in the first instance.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—So far as I know, there is no objection.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The report in its present shape shows that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When I took objection to the report as brought in, I had no intention to ask that the whole of the evidence should be printed, as the explanation given at the time convinced me that the case had been clearly established. All that was needed in the report was the admission of the counsel representing the respondent indicating his desire that a part of the evidence should be suppressed. I did not find anything in the report to show that the counsel for the parties had come to such an understanding, and it looked to me at first sight to be evidence of an ex parte nature. It was for that reason that I brought the matter up at the last sitting of this House. I wish to disclaim any idea of desiring to have the evidence printed in order to convince me that a real case was made out for granting a divorce. All I wished was to see the admission of the counsel for the respondent printed with the evidence, so that it might be made perfectly clear by the report to the Senate that the action of the committee was taken with the consent of both parties.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If I rightly understand the hon. gentleman who made this motion he said that some objection was taken by members of the House of Commons that insufficient evidence was placed before them. For my part I do not think it would be wise to publish the remaining portion. As my hon. friend has stated, there are young children in the family, and I do not think it would be conducive to their welfare that such action should be taken. If, as he says, the counsel for the respondent has thrown up the sponge and admitted the guilt of his client, I think a report to that effect placed in the hands of members of the House of Commons ought to be sufficient for them. I do not think it would be beneficial to anyone to have this evidence scattered broadcast.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I do not think the respondent's counsel threw up the sponge at all. He simply withdrew from the case because the respondent had no funds to defend it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON.—He abandoned the case because she had no funds. Evidence was to be sent down from Winnipeg but the counsel was not furnished with the names of any witnesses and received no funds, and therefore he could not proceed with the case.

The motion was agreed to.

CITY OF OTTAWA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (KK), An Act to amend the Act respecting the city of Ottawa. He said: This is a very short Bill, comprising two clauses. It authorizes the commission in charge of the improvements in Ottawa to enforce their by-laws, with the object of protecting flower beds. There is another short clause giving them power to execute all necessary works under the authority of their Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Bill is for the purpose of giving power to the Ottawa Improvement Commission to pass bylaws imposing penalties and fines, and to enforce them. Is it not somewhat unusual to place such power in the hands of a commission? I noticed, however, in looking at the Act authorizing the appointment of this commission, that none of the bylaws that may be passed by the commission can become law or be enforced until they have received the assent of the Governor in Council. That is some protection to the community against any by-laws which might be passed of a very severe or exacting character. Otherwise I do not think the power should be given. Did not the original measure reserve the right to the Governor in Council to reject or sanction the bylaws?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They require very wide powers in the discharge of their duties. For instance, they have powers of expropriation, the right to purchase property and take it at a valuation under the Railway Act; and what is now asked is authority on a very minor point. They require to exercise constant supervision over their works. Sometimes it is found that people destroy the flower-beds and trees, and it is necessary that there should be some means of protecting them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand the reason for it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (169), An Act to amend the Act respecting the Royal Military College.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow. He said: This is a short Bill. Clause 3 is as follows:

3. The salary of the commandant shall not exceed three thousand two hundred dollars a year, and the salaries of the staff adjutant, professors, instructors, assistant instructors and staff shall be fixed, and may be readjusted from time to time, by the Governor in Council.

2. The details of such salaries shall appear in the annual report laid before parliament by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are those increases?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that they are. The first one may be an increase.

The motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (MM), an Act to amend the Acts respecting naturalization and aliens.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow.

He said: This Bill applies particularly to the Northwest, simplifying the necessary proceedings and bringing them more into harmony with the circumstances as they exist.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend what is the amendment proposed in this Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is proposed to amend subsection 5 of section 11A of the existing Act, which requires that the notice shall be filed in the court-house. This Bill provides that a copy of the application shall be posted up in a conspicuous place in the office of the clerk, or the deputy clerk, as the case may be, and shall remain so posted for a period of not less than two weeks. It was thought it would give more publicity if the notice were to appear in the clerk's office than if it were in the court-house.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is that the certificate of naturalization?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; it is the application. Further, as the Act is drawn, it seems to confine the judge to acting on a Wednesday only, which is very absurd, and a change is to be made in reference to that. On and after the Wednesday following the receipt of the papers by the judge, that is, upon any subsequent day, he may hear the application and pass upon it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to say a word with reference to the working of this Act. I have had some knowledge of the working of the present law, and I may say that it did not give satisfaction last year, for the reason that during fully half the time the judge was away, and a great number of electors were disfranchised on that account. Many persons had their papers ready and should have been allowed the right to vote, but they could not get that right, because the judge was not present at the time to pass on their papers. The judge has to cover a large district, and I think some provision should be made to meet the difficulties arising from this fact.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPANIES ACT, 1902, AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (NN), an Act to amend the Companies Act, 1902.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow. He said:

Some parties who are largely interested in various Canadian companies acting under charters issued under the Companies Act, 1902, have found that investors in Europe, more particularly in France, would prefer having a share warrant instead of shares. The share warrant really means a certificate showing in one paper the total amount of the holding. In order to meet the views of parties in France and Germany who contemplate investing in Canada, it has been suggested that this change should be made in the Companies Act. It is simply substituting for the ordinary shares a certificate of the amount of stock which the party holds in the company, which is more convenient than the shares as recorded in the books.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it proposed to supersede the share certificate by the issuance of these share warrants ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. The president of the Bank of Commerce sent me a cablegram the day before yesterday, which reads as follows :

Would like to see you about amending Companies Act, permitting issue of share warrants to bearer. This form of stock certificate essential in obtaining continental money for Canadian enterprises, and it is in common use in England, also in Nova Scotia. See statutes, 1902, chapter 8, section 3. Will you kindly facilitate amendment during present session as it will materially assist pending negotiations for continental capital in three Canadian companies. Presume can be no possible objection to this amendment ; otherwise would not make this request.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Would that be equal to scrip ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is merely evidence in the form of a short paper that the holder has so much money in the particular enterprise named. It is a mere certificate. It does not supersede anything or affect shares in Canada, but may be used if a party abroad wishes to have his shares in that form.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Supposing one had that certificate, could he transfer his shares and keep the certificate?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could transfer the warrant.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—It is ordinary scrip.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It appears to me from what the Hon. Secretary of State says that it is merely a change of form. At present a certificate is issued showing the number and value of shares held by any person in an incorporated company, and this merely substitutes another form of certificate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is the amendment in the Bill fully explanatory ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it was framed by Mr. Lash. As hon. gentlemen perhaps know, a very considerable amount of Canadian money has, in the last two years, been invested in Mexico. It appears that Mexico recognizes companies chartered in Canada, and very large works have been undertaken there, particularly for the development of electrical energy, the construction of street railways, and kindred enterprises, and I presume the companies so engaged are offering shares for sale in Europe with a view of continuing further development ; and the parties who are advancing the money prefer to have the certificate in the form of a warrant, to meet the convenience of British or French investors.

The Bill was read the first time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

SENATE.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (116) An Act respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (114) An Act respecting the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (GG) An Act respecting the Brandon, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN introduced Bill (OO) An Act to amend the Insurance Act as respects the investment of funds of Life Insurance Companies in securities of Trust Companies.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved that the Bill be read the second time on Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman give us the reasons which have led him to introduce a Bill of this character. It affects a very large number of companies in Canada, relating as it does to their powers of investment. I should like to know whether anything has occurred which has induced him to submit a Bill either to limit or to extend the powers of investment that insurance companies possess under the existing law. I would ask also whether he has had any communication with the superintendent of insurance or the Finance Minister on the subject. As he is well aware from his long parliamentary experience, all Bills affecting banking or life insurance companies emanate from that department, and I should like to know whether he has the acquiescence of the Minister of Finance or the superintendent of insurance in the course that he is pursuing. The importance of the subject induces me to ask for this explanation now, in order that the different life insurance companies in Canada may be afforded an opportunity to express their opinions in reference to the Bill and the manner in which it will probably affect their business.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I must confess I was not aware that any Bill affecting life insurance companies or their investments must first have the sanction of the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not desire the hon. gentleman to understand that I considered that necessary. I simply said it was the practice that in the past the Finance Department had either given its consent or had introduced such Bills.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I must confess that I neglected to discuss the question with the Minister of Finance. Nothing has occurred in Canada that I know of with regard to the handling of the funds of life insurance companies to warrant the introduction of this Bill, but in the United States within the last year large sums of money have been appropriated by the directors of life insurance companies to the funds of companies formed for the purpose of speculation. In some cases trust companies have been formed by members of life insurance companies, and those life insurance companies have become large stockholders of the trust companies. In that country they are restricted in the investment of life insurance funds in very much the same way as in Canada, and the result is that they cannot speculate in many lines that trust companies can speculate in. The result has been that the directors of life insurance companies have become stockholders in trust companies, and have virtually voted the funds of the insurance company from the right pocket to the left pocket, and utilized them as they could not have done while they were the funds of the life insurance company. Very serious losses have occurred in that way; and in view of that fact we in Canada are justified in taking steps to prevent the transfer to trust companies, of moneys accumulated by life insurance companies, and thus save the policy-holders from risk of very serious loss. I had intended at the second reading of this Bill to give a more extended explanation of my reasons for introducing this measure. Its object is simply to prevent life insurance companies in Canada from investing their funds either in the stock or in the bonds of trust companies. They have many other ways in which they can invest their funds, and seeing that the liberty enjoyed in the United States has been abused, I think we would be in order in Canada if we closed the door before any loss is suffered by any of our insurance companies. I think with the hon. leader of the opposition, that if there is any one duty which devolves upon Canada, it is to guard the safety of moneys that are paid into life insurance companies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—We should guard them as sacredly as we guard our banking institutions. There are many people in Canada struggling from month to month and from year to year to pay their annual dues to the life insurance companies for the purpose of accumulating a fund for the support of those who are dependent upon them; and in order to protect those institutions from frauds by the application of their funds in the manner which has been followed on the other side of the line, I think we are justified in providing that the privileges which they enjoy relating to investment shall not be abused, so as to protect, as far as possible, those who contribute to life insurance companies. I may say I have spoken to some parties interested in life insurance companies—I am interested myself as a director—and those parties agree with me that in view of the losses that have occurred in the United States by abuses of this character being permitted—through insurance companies being allowed to invest in trust companies—it would be in the interest of policy-holders in Canada to make provision which would prevent a repetition of those results on this side of the line.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have no feeling in the matter. I am insured in Canadian companies, and I believe they are all sound and good; but a word of caution is a good thing. We are getting old, and our views are perhaps not as rosy as they were thirty years ago, and we are influenced somewhat by those who have control over us. For instance, there is the Inspector of Insurance. I cannot see why we should be at his——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Mercy.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—At his mercy. I shall bring up the case of the Mutual Reserve Company later on, and show how the policy-holders have been dealt with. Look at the support they have had; the world wonders where they received that support. I warned this House twelve months ago in regard to this matter, and I warn them again to-day. My hon. friend has pointed out the difficulty that may arise from injudicious investments—I am not going to say criminal investments—and while we have the opportunity let us guarantee that the small savings of widows and orphans shall not be wasted, so that they may feel that parliament is at their back and not at the back of the insurance companies. Why should parliament be behind the insurance companies? It has no right to be there.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Parliament is a representative of the people. The people have respect for members of parliament, and believe that they will get a righteous judgment from parliament as the highest court in the land. When anything is proposed to be done which is going to jeopardize the interests of the people, it is time for the introduction of a Bill such as the present one. There is no use closing the door after the horse is gone, but now, in the heyday of prosperity, let us do our duty to the public in spite of the influences that may be brought to bear, in spite of the influence the companies may exert, either in Canada or the United States—because the United States seem to have charge of this country as far as insurance business goes. I think my hon. friend is perfectly justified in introducing the Bill in advance of any catastrophe in connection with the investments of the insurance companies.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the House to a matter which received, I believe—although I have no official intimation of the fact—its final interment yesterday. Some months ago I asked this House to express an opinion in regard to an inflammatory appeal which was made to the people of Canada in regard to a measure of great importance to this Dominion, the Autonomy Bill, which creates two new provinces. I was choked off by the hon. member for Halifax, the ex-Speaker——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We are dealing now with the heart of Canada.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to a past debate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Let the dead bury their dead.

The SPEAKER—I hope the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) will remember the rule that one cannot refer to a past debate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes. I wish to ask the hon. representatives of the government here if they have any information to give us in regard to an event which is connected very deeply and very profoundly with the present position of the government, and with the existence of Canada as a confederation and as a people desiring to live in harmony with one another on questions of race and creed. Before putting the question I have a right to explain the preliminaries; I asked for information from this honourable House some time ago and was refused it. I now ask if the representatives of the government in this chamber are aware that on the 13th of this month anything happened which would justify our public men in considering that the status of Canada has been established as a peace-loving people, as a people not heeding inflammatory appeals to prejudices of race and creed. I put a question two months ago, asking if this House was aware of the fact that the Grand Master of the Orange Lodge of Canada had made an inflammatory appeal to the people of this country, asking them to put down the rights of certain other people. I was choked off then; to-day I cannot be choked off. The result is apparent, although we have no official knowledge of it; and it is for that reason I rise to ask the representative of the governments if they have any official information of the result of the elections in London and North Oxford. We have newspaper information which is almost too good to be true; and we should like to know if the government of the day has any information with regard to the facts. I, as a Canadian, am proud to know that Canada by and through its people of Ontario, have declared that they are true to the best traditions of the British people—fair play for all religions, fair play for all races, and fair play for all languages. The British empire is built on a combination of religions, races and languages, as India, Australia, Ireland, Scotland, England, and other parts of the empire will show, but here in Canada, unfortunately, we have in parliament men who would want this great country built up on the basis of one tongue, one race, and one tradition only. I am proud to say that North Oxford and London have told Canada that such cannot be the case, that we are a part of the empire as well as the people of India, and as well as the Australians; and that those people cannot through the Macleans, through the Sproules and through the Hugheses, teach this country to be one-sided, but that we stand on the broad basis of British citizenship, irrespective of race or of creed. As I have been informed through the press, the people of North Oxford and London, have said to the government: You are doing right. I ask if the government has any information of these facts.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What about Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government have no other information than the public have. There were two vacancies in the province of Ontario, North Oxford and London. The writs for the elections were issued, and two friends of the government have been elected, as I understand from the press.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman has no official information.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I understand that there wes a battle fought in London yesterday and that one of the belligerents had on his banner 'Vote for the King,' while the other had on his banner 'Vote for the Pope,' and the Pope won. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman representing King's county——

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—What King's county?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—In the province of New Brunswick. I understand that an hon. gentleman representing that constituency in this House, in the early stage of the Japanese war, sent a cable to the Mikado of Japan wishing him success. I think that might be regarded as an infringement of the neutrality laws, because it encouraged one of the parties to fight. Recently the same hon. gentleman cabled to the Mikado again, congratulating him upon his great victory in the sea of Japan, and also adding that it was owing to the superior intelligence of the Japanese, which was a reflection on the other belligerent in that battle. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman has sent a cable to the Pope informing him that yesterday a battle was fought in the city of London, and in the riding of North Oxford, and that the Pope has beaten the King ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend has placed me in a very unfortunate position. He is asking me to disclose communications such as the government or myself might get, and which cannot always be made public. As regards the Pope, I may say that I myself, my family, and my friends have the highest consideration for him, and believe that he is according to his lights, and perhaps to my lights, doing the best he can for humanity, as the rest may be doing. I do not like the Pope's name trotted out at every corner. My hon. friend spoke of King's county. What did we find in the election of 1900 ? The Virgin Mary's picture put up on the hustings in order to defeat the Liberal party.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Where was that ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—In King's county. Now we all respect the Virgin Mary, and as for the Pope I have the highest respect for him. Recently he sent for Admiral Domville, the Commander in Chief of the Mediterranean fleet, and entertained him. Why should I find fault with him ? If I had to go to Rome to-morrow, I might have the same attention paid to me. As to the Mikado, I sent him a cable when the war was declared, wishing him success. When you see two men going into the arena to fight, you wish the best man good luck. In reply he sent me a very handsome telegram. When the Japanese fleet met the Russians and cleaned them out, I sent a message conveying my congratulations on the unparalleled bravery and intelligence of the Japanese, and His Majecty was good enough to send me a reply to what was perhaps the only cable he received from Canada. It probably pleased him to think that far-off Canada sympathized with him in his struggles. Notwithstanding what we may know of our own country and our own people, a good many people think that Canada is outside of civilization, and very many nations do not know even that Canada exists. He saw that in this far-away Canada, of which perhaps he had never heard before, there were those who wished him success in his plucky fight, and he showed his appreciation by sending me a reply. Was not that British ? That was not bringing up the Pope or the Virgin Mary, or setting Protestant against Catholic. It has been recognized all over the world that all these prejudices of race and creed must be wiped out, and to-day I think they are ended in this country. The appeal has been taken and decided, and I think after this Canada will be sensible enough not to take any stock in these appeals to religious and race prejudices. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) should have called on me to make this statement because it is uncalled for in every respect.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was that telegram to the Mikado correctly reported in the papers ?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It was.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because the one I read was signed 'Intelligent Domville.'

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The incident referred to by my hon. friend, in which the picture of a lady of the standing of the Virgin Mary was displayed in an election contest was, I consider, a very regrettable one. We all have the most profound respect for the Mother of Our Lord, and I should like to ask my hon. friend for more particulars about the matter which I hear of now for the first time. In what district of the county of King's did that occur ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order. There is no question before the House, and it certainly does not reflect on the dignity of the Senate that this discussion should be further pursued.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I ask a question.

The SPEAKER—There is nothing before the chair.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—With the permission of the House, I should like to ask a question just as my hon. friend here has done before me. If anybody objects, I will not proceed. My question is one which will raise no discussion, because, as I said before, it is a regrettable incident. I merely want to know at what polling place in the county of King's the picture of the blessed Virgin Mary was used in an election.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think we have gone too far. We surely ought not to introduce sacred subjects here to be discussed in the House. I feel shocked at the manner in which such matters are dragged in.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The assertion has been made, and I simply wish to know where the incident occurred, so that if there is a misunderstanding it may de cleared up. I have no other purpose in view.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suggest that the hon. gentleman get it privately.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The assertion was made in the House, and no one interrupted. I simply ask a question, and I see no reason why the government should be stirred up to prevent the information being furnished. I merely wish my hon. friend to be explicit, and state in what particular booth or parish or polling sub-division of his county that incident occurred.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Order, order; I ask my hon. friend to get the information privately.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—But the hon. gentleman made the announcement publicly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If he has erred, the hon. gentleman should not err.

PRAYERS OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to draw attention to a motion made on the 18th January last by the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Hon. Mr. Gibson). On that occasion it was ordered that a special committee of the Senate be appointed to confer with His Honour the Speaker respecting the prayers to be used at the opening of the Senate. I wish to know from the Speaker if any conference took place, and whether any decision was arrived at? The committee was struck, and I suppose there was a conference between its members and the Speaker. I should like to know if any report has been prepared, or how the matter stands?

The SPEAKER—I understand that when such a motion is made, the member who moves for the appointment of the committee is the convener.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There was no conference?

The SPEAKER—Not to my knowledge.

TUBERCULOSIS IN CANADA.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—It is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that a short time ago I moved a resolution in this House on the subject of tuberculosis, which was very extensively discussed, and with very satisfactory results as far as it went. I should like with the permission of the House, to carry that question a little further, and to give notice that to-morrow I shall move for the appointment of a special committee of the Senate for the purpose of considering what steps should be taken for the suppression of the disease of tuberculosis.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like if the leader of the government in the Senate, could this afternoon, or early to-morrow dispose of the notice of motion for an adjournment, given by the hon. member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) this afternoon. Those of us who live a long distance from the capital would like to know if the proposed adjournment can be taken in order that we may be able to make our arrangements.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not sufficient information of the condition of the public business to warrant me in coming to any conclusion or advising the House because it is quite uncertain what the House of Commons may decide on. I understand the debate on the Autonomy Bills will be resumed on Monday. Whether it is proposed to further dispute their passage or not I do not know. I am inclined to think not. There are only the details of the Bill, which are of course open to discussion, but which no doubt can be disposed of in two or three days; but it can be readily understood that I am not in a position to-day to make any announcement. It is quite likely that a short adjournment might take place, but it could only be short, because I am inclined to think that, with the dog-days approaching, the general desire of parliament will be to rise at as early a day as the public business will permit. The estimates are nearly all through. There are very few items remaining in the main estimates. The sup-plementals for the current year, have already been approved, and there are only the supplementals for the coming year to be brought down.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is the budget.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is a speech which will occupy a day possibly; I do not know that it will occupy longer.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Would it be possible for the leader of the government to make an announcement before the close of the House this evening or at the opening of the House to-morrow afternoon?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If I am in a position to speak positively, I shall be only too glad to do so; but I cannot in the ordinary course of events be expected to say what line will be taken in the House of Commons. The government does not control parliament. I think it is quite likely, from the appearance of our Order Paper, that a few days adjournment would not interfere with the general disposition of public business, but it could only be for a few days.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Would it be possible for the hon. Secretary of State to inform the House to-morrow at three o'clock, when the adjournment will be, and for how long?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will try.

REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT OF INSURANCE.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I should like to ask the leader of the government when we may expect the report of the Insurance Department up to December, 1904. It is over six months past due, and if it is to be of any value to the House we should receive it soon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make inquiries and let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow.

PUBLIC HOUSE TRUSTS.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Béique: That in the opinion of the Senate the British Gothenburg experiments and the establishment of public house trusts in England have materially advanced the solution of the temperance question and of the social reform problem, and that the time has arrived when like experiments should be made and like public house trusts should be established in Canada.—Hon. Mr. Sullivan.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might state that the hon. gentleman from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Sullivan) is not in a state of health to justify his being present to-day in order to proceed with the discussion of the question, and it has been intimated that he has no particular desire to speak on the question and would just as soon have the matter disposed of by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As several hon. gentlemen have expressed opinions, I hope the House will bear with me if I say a few words on the subject. I may state, with respect to the matter of intoxicating beverages, that I am not a prohibitionist. I cannot sympathize with those gentlemen who, either here or elsewhere, speak of wine or of any intoxicating beverage as being in itself a pernicious and evil thing. We know that the first recorded miracle performed by our Lord was the turning of water into wine, and we know too, from the circumstances connected with that miracle, that the wine was of a kind which would intoxicate. I feel, therefore, that I cannot absolutely condemn intoxicating liquors. While undoubtedly the abuse of intoxicating liquors has done a great deal of mischief in the world, it is the opinion of a great many medical men that eating improper things, and overeating have done as much mischief as the drinking of intoxicating liquors to express.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One medical gentleman does not quite agree with me, but I think there are a good many medical men who take that view. At the same time, I may say that I feel just as strongly as the hon. Secretary of State or as any other hon. gentleman can feel, what an infinite amount of mischief the abuse of intoxicants has done and is doing in the world. We see these results about us every day; promising careers blighted, men hurried to premature graves, their families living in penury and suffering from disease, all as the result of the abuse of intoxicating liquors. I recognize,—and I believe every one who stops to reflect must recognize—the existence of the many evils which are spoken of by the opponents of the use of intoxicating beverages. But I believe that most hon. gentlemen who have had experience and who have looked closely into what is going on around them, do not think that these evils are to be completely remedied or are even to be very largely mitigated by what may be termed iron-clad legislation. We should try to prevent the abuse of intoxicants, but we should not undertake to do it by legislation which provokes the hostility and arouses the natural contrariety of the human family.

With respect to the particular matter which the hon. gentleman brought before us, the British Gothenburg experiments, and the establishment of Public House Trusts in England, I do not feel that I have given the matter sufficient thought or made sufficient inquiry to be able to express any opinion as to the merits of the system. But I might point out that this matter has been discussed by two gentlemen, whose names I mention because they have dealt with the question of intemperance from a particularly sane, reasonable and common sense point of view. I refer to Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell, who in 1899, published a volume under the title of 'The Temperance Problem and Social Reform.' These gentlemen speak in the highest terms of the plan to which the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béïque) has referred. They seem to think that the scheme is calculated to do a great deal of good in England. The article reads as follows:

> The first, the bed-rock upon which any fabric of effective licensing reform must be built, is to take the trade out of private hands. So long as the private interest of the seller runs counter to the interest of the state, so long will the effort of the state to restrict and control the traffic be baffled. The second is that the trade, when taken out of private hands, shall be worked locally, not by the state, and should be subject to no other state control than that which is necessary to secure honest administration and the complete carrying out of the conditions determined by the statutory law under which the localities carry on the traffic.

While I do not feel that I possess the knowledge necessary to enable me to pronounce on the scheme which the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry advocated, when these two gentlemen who have devoted so much time and attention to the subject and have written so wisely and reasonably on it, entertain the views which I have quoted, it means that there is really a great deal to be said in favour of the plan advocated by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, at least as far as the old country is concerned. Whether that system is the best to adopt in this country is another question, and one as to which I do not care to express any opinion. Strictly speaking, I dare say we should have confined ourselves exclusively to the question submitted by the hon. gentleman from deSalaberry but hon. gentlemen have taken a reasonable amount of liberty, and have discussed the general question of intemperance, and the effects of the abuse of intoxicants. I wish therefore to take the opportunity to speak of two or three points which I think the members of this House and gentlemen outside of it who take an interest in the question might perhaps consider. It is of the very greatest importance I think, that minors should be prevented from drinking. If a youth attains the age of 21 years without having acquired a taste for intoxicating liquor, there is a very much greater probability that he will never become unduly addicted to its use. At any rate if he refrains up to that point from the use of intoxicants and tobacco, he has a chance to attain full normal development physically and mentally. Now I do not think that the advocates of temperance have perhaps dealt with this matter in the most practical way. I wish to mention to the House a scheme which we had in operation in the city of Halifax a good many years ago, which according to my information worked admirably. In certain schools in the city of Halifax there was an association which every boy was expected to join ; and every boy, when he joined this association, made a solemn promise that he would not use intoxicating liquors—and I think he also undertook that he would not use tobacco—until he had attained the age of 21 years. This is something to which the educational authorities throughout the country might very well devote their attention. It is a most important thing that the habits of smoking and of drinking should not be cultivated in early life. You may not be able to get a boy to promise that he will never smoke or drink, but you may get him to promise that he will not do so until he attains the age of 21 years, and if that is attained I think a great deal will have been done. This is a matter which I think might very well be dealt with by the local authorities, who have the control of education.

Then there is another point to which I wish to refer—I do not know precisely who should deal with it, but I assume that the federal authorities ought to grapple with it —I refer to the 'treating' system. Nothing tends more to create the habit of drinking than the practice of treating. For instance, there are three young men, going along the street together. One of the three feels thirsty, and thinks he would like to have a drink. He cannot go in to drink by himself, and although neither of the others wishes to drink, he asks them to accompany him, and there are three drinks instead of one. After those three young men have had their drinks at the expense of the one who had been thirsty, another thinks he is called upon to treat his comrades also, and it is not, I fancy, at all an unusual thing that these three young men take each three drinks where in the first instance only one of them felt like having a single drink. After having treated all round, their usefulness for any business purpose for that day is practically at an end. That habit grows on young men, and it does an immense amount of mischief. If such legislation could be adopted as would prevent the practice of treating, a very great step would be taken in the way of diminishing the evils which arise from intemperance. I suppose, if absolutely necessary, the criminal law might be amended so as to prevent treating.

There is only one other matter to which I venture to call the attention of the House in connection with this subject, and that is one which was referred to by the hon. Secretary of State in his address the other day. The hon. gentleman referred to the difference between the effect of the liquor which is consumed at the present day and of that consumed when he was a young man. I think a great many people have noticed that difference. As far as I can gather, it is due to the fact that a great deal of the liquor which is consumed to-day is adulterated, not by harmless water, although a large quantity of water is very often used, but by other pernicious ingredients introduced for the purpose of disguising and concealing the fact that water has been used. An immense amount of mischief is done to both the physical and the mental equipment of the persons who drink those adulterated beverages. We have on the statute-book a law which forbids the adulteration of food, and I think it extends to beverages too; but if the legislation which is on the statute-book is not sufficient for the purpose, it is the duty of the government to secure the passage of a measure which will guarantee that those who pay for a given kind of beverage will get exactly what they are paying for. A great deal of the mischief which is done by drinking would be obviated if the people who drink were really getting good honest liquor.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—These may not be the views of temperance men, and perhaps not the views of many who are not temperance men, but I feel very strongly on these particular points; that it would be most beneficial if the authorities in the various provinces would take steps to induce boys to pledge themselves not to use intoxicating stimulants or tobacco up to the age of twenty-one years; that in addition to that, legislation should be secured to prevent treating; and, finally, that the Dominion government should take steps to prevent the adulteration of liquors.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I propose to make a few remarks in reply to the several speeches which have been made on this question. I am sure it has been noticed that a number of hon. gentlemen who have spoken have taken occasion to drift somewhat from the question which was involved in the motion, but I do not propose to make any objection to that. I think that it was for the better, and that it was opportune to call attention to the different aspects of the question. But it is important that there should be no confusion, and that the point involved in the motion be kept in mind in order that we may arrive at a proper conclusion. Some of the hon. gentlemen have treated the matter as if the motion which I had the honour to offer to this hon. House involved the merits of the Scott Act, while it does nothing of the kind. I am ready to admit—although I am not familiar with the working of the Scott Act—that the Scott Act has rendered a great service to this country, and I think it is a good Act to retain on our statute-book. Another hon. gentleman has spoken as if the merits of the licensing system were involved. There is nothing of the kind intended, as I will show in a moment. Other hon. gentlemen have called the attention of the Senate to education as being the best means to prevent intemperance; I am altogether in accord with that idea. As the hon. gentleman from Halifax stated, and as other hon. gentlemen have stated, it has been, and in the future should be, one of the best preventatives, and I hope that everybody who is connected with the teaching of youth will, as soon as possible, adopt the system of instructing children in the elementary schools as to the bad effects of intemperance, in order to create a strong impression in their minds against the use of intoxicating liquors. But we have to take humanity as it is; and although more meetings have been held in regard to this question than in regard to all other social questions, we are face to face with the fact that intemperance exists to-day, and will no doubt continue to exist for centuries to come, and it is incumbent upon us to devise, not only a means, but the best available means to diminish the evil as much as possible. Before taking up the question, I desire to refer for a moment to the statistics which have been given by the hon. Secretary of State, not by way of taking issue with him on the figures which he has given, but for the purpose of giving some additional figures in order that a more proper inference may be drawn. The hon. gentleman has referred to the province of Quebec, and especially to the city of Montreal, and has stated that since 1874, the number of licenses in the city of Montreal and the amount derived from licenses has been very much increased. He is quite right in that; but one must bear in mind that the population of Montreal in 1871 was 132,023 inhabitants, whereas in 1901 it was 328,175.

In the population of Montreal I include the population of Hochelaga and Maisonneuve. Maisonneuve, which had 8,154 inhabitants, has now 65,778; and Hochelaga, which had 16,654, has now 59,919 inhabitants. It is a well known fact that the amount of the license has been very much increased. It has been more than doubled in the interval from 1874 to this date. From the report for 1903, I find that in the county of Beauce there was only one license, the revenue derived from which was $125. In Bonaventure there were only two licenses, in Charlevoix there were none, in Gaspé East two, in Gaspé Centre none, in Gaspé West none, in Kamouraska none, in Lake St. John three, in the Island of Madelaine none, in Matane none, in Pontiac three, in Rimouski four, in Saguenay none. This shows that in a considerable portion of the province of Quebec there are no licenses issued, or only one or two in each county. Montreal is divided into Montreal East, which is the French part of the city, and Montreal West. The amount derived from hotels in Montreal East was $47,990, and in Montreal West $40,795; and from restaurants the revenue was $62,660 in the east and $72,025 in Montreal West. But I am ready to acknowledge that these figures much exceed what they should be, and this is one of the reasons which induced me to place this motion before the House. I am of opinion that there is a great deal of mischief done by the large number of licenses issued, not only in the city of Montreal, but in the province of Quebec generally, as well as in the other provinces. There are altogether too many licenses, and means should be adopted to curtail, as much as possible, the number of licenses and the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquors. But, hon. gentlemen, what is really the question which divides us? Some of us are no doubt in favour of total prohibtion; others, who are not in favour of prohibition, favour control of some kind. This is the only dividing line between us, but I am sure we all agree that it is incumbent upon us to adopt the best means possible to reduce the consumption of liquor. The motion asserts that the British Gothenburg system has proved effective and useful in England. I have given a good deal of attention to the matter. I have read the book which has been referred to by my hon. friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), as well as a number of other books on the different aspects of the question; and I have ascertained from statistics that as late as 1897 the consumption of intoxicating liquors in England exceeded four gallons per head, while now that this system has been in operation for a few years the consumption has been reduced to very little more than two gallons per head. I have ascertained also that in Sweden and Norway, which, according to universal testimony and unquestionable statistics, were formerly among the most drunken countries, in 1897, a considerable decrease hal taken place, and that now it is reduced to .52, or a little more than half a gallon per head. These are incontrovertible facts, which we should bear in mind and take into consideration. Let me commend to the consideration of the House the opinion of a well known gentleman, the Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, in regard to these experiments. Speaking in 1894, I believe, just prior to the introduction of the system into England, he said :

Hostile critics of the system have one great argument in reserve. Granted, they say, that it has reduced drunkenness and the consumption of liquor in Sweden, the improvement even now, still leaves Sweden in a worse position than England is at present, without any system at all. Statistics—sometimes of very questionable authority—are brought forward to prove this assertion, but without discussing them, we may say at once, that they have no bearing on the question. We are agreed that there is still too much drinking and too much drunkenness in England, and surely it is not contended that there is a fixed level below which the principle which has produced such remarkable results in Sweden will cease to operate. Experience is opposed to such an illogical conclusion. When Norway followed the example of Sweden, its consumption per head was, according to the diagram prepared by Mr. Brooks of Massachusetts, and reproduced by Dr. Gould, less than half that of Sweden. Yet a further reduction of more than one-half has followed upon the trial of this experiment. It does not seem likely that England's experience would contradict the results which have been uniformly observed in other cases.

At that time, in 1894, as Mr. Chamberlain asserts, the consumption per head in Norway was double that of England, but what do we find now? Whereas in England it is over two gallons per head, in Sweden and Norway it is reduced to one-half gallon per head. In England itself, the hon. Secretary of State has mentioned that he was not aware that the system had the effect of diminishing the consumption of liquor. I would again call his attention to the figures I gave in opening this discussion. I showed that in 1900 it had decreased over $5,000,000 ; in 1901, over $15,000,000; in 1903, over $25,000,000 and in 1904, over $25,458,000. These are tangible results which should appeal to our minds in forming an opinion on this question. The hon. member for St. Thomas (Hon. Mr. Wilson) made remarks which it seems to me should enable him to come to the conclusion to support the motion which I have presented to this honourable House. He said :

We know also that wherever it is in the interest of the hotel-keeper to sell as much liquor as he possibly can, he will hold out every possible inducement to his customers to use spirituous liquors. I think it would be beneficial if we could do away entirely with the profits arising out of the sale of the liquor, and have the traffic so controlled that those who sell it will derive no direct profit. That is the principle of the Gothenburg system to a certain extent.

This is one of the best results which the Gothenburg system has produced, and I am surprised that those who approve of prohibition are not in favour of the motion. What is in the way of prohibition? It is the vested interest. In the city of Montreal alone we have over 600 persons who hold licenses, who have made that business their mode of living, and are bound to use all their influence against being disturbed in the enjoyment and renewal of their licenses. The consequence is that instead of being able to decrease the number of licenses we are compelled to increase it from year to year. If the system which I propose were adopted, it would not tend to increase the number of licenses. It would not tend to establish any monopoly. It is merely intended instead of issuing the license to a private individual for his personal profit and benefit, to issue it to a philanthropic institution or company, but without increasing the number of licenses at all. Companies of that kind, if formed here as in England, would make it their object to try to purchase licenses already in existence and conduct the trade on a better footing and keep a better class of liquors; but being merely philanthropic companies, they would be ready at all times to facilitate the reduction of licenses whenever it is deemed advisable to do so, because it would not be for their private benefit to continue.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is an organ of the temperance movement in this country, the Montreal 'Witness,' which is very sincere and severe in its views. In answer to the speech made by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry in introducing this motion, the 'Witness' says that the Gothenburg system has been altogether a failure in England and has not met English views of temperance. Has the hon. gentleman seen it, and if so what answer would he give to that article ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I saw the article to which the hon. member refers and I think it was written by somebody who had read a criticism of the system. I have seen some criticisms of it; there is no plan whatever which will command the assent of everybody, and critics of the Gothenburg system are to be found especially among those who are in favour of total prohibition. They are somewhat fanatical on that question and are not open to consider the question of licenses in any form ; but I gave a moment ago statistics which undoubtedly show that the article did not take the proper view of the effect and merits of the Gothenburg system in England. I repeat I am satisfied that it would be for the best interests of the country if we made some such attempt here as is being successfully made in England—not to increase the number of licenses, but to substitute for houses managed for the private benefit of the owners, public houses controlled by philanthropic companies, who would adopt the system of selling a good quality of liquor and of making it to the interest of the manager to sell non-intoxicating drinks—coffee, tea and beverages of that kind—as much as possible instead of intoxicating liquors.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman now answer the objection made by the president of the Victuallers' Association of Quebec, Mr. Lawrence A. Wilson ? I ask him to do so because the hon. gentleman has studied this question a great deal, and he might be in a position to answer the objections expressed at a banquet tendered to Mr. Wilson at the Windsor Hotel last week.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—What was the objection ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He insisted there was no philanthropy at all. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to answer his objection ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am not surprised that the Victuallers' Association is against this system. They will no doubt join forces with those who are in favour of total prohibition, because they see in this system an opponent, and I think it is a strong reason why we should favour its introduction. The association to which my hon. friend has referred is one which extends over the whole Dominion and excercises very great political influence. During the late session of the Quebec legislature an attempt was made by the government to increase the license fees in the province of Quebec, and this association was the means of preventing it through the influence they were able to bring to bear on the government. The association has great influence in the whole Dominion, possessing as it does a large membership, who are all interested in the continuation of the present system because it is their means of living. If we were to substitute instead of licenses owned for private benefit an arrangement under the Gothenburg system, we would not have to contend with it either in reducing the number of licenses or in increasing the license fees.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Would not that only transfer the profits from Paul to Peter ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Who would be the beneficiary under the Gothenburg system ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If the hon. gentleman has followed what I have stated he will remember that under the Gothenburg system the shareholders get only a maximum of 5 per cent on their investment—and the balance of the profits goes to public utilities, and therefore they are not interested in increasing the sale of liquors, or even in continuing to maintain the public houses. They are only in the field for the purpose of getting rid of private interests and substituting for them a public philanthropic interest which at all times will be ready to consent to a reduction of the number of licenses and even to the adoption of total prohibition, if it is deemed advisable, in any province of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have listened with a great deal of attention to my hon. friend, for whom I have the highest respect, but I really fail to understand the drift of his argument. It has been stated that the Canada Temperance Act has done good service? Where? It has been repudiated in Ontario; it has not proved popular in Quebec; it exists only in portions of the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I thought the hon. member was rising to put a question.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—No, I am going to speak to this question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I thought I had the privilege of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That is the hon. gentleman's lookout, not mine.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. senator from de Salaberry simply sat down for the purpose of listening to the question to be asked.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I put no question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We know that, but the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry having sat down to await a question, my hon. friend has no right to speak until his speech is finished.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I claim the right of reply and I was exercising that right. I submit therefore that if the hon. member is allowed to make a speech I should be allowed to reply. I am willing to suspend my remarks for the present with the understanding that I may be allowed to answer after he has spoken.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have no objection to the hon. gentleman speaking after I have done. The question is, are the people to be allowed to drink or not to drink? Are you going to limit their right? Are you going to say that the Canada Temperance Act is good in one place and not in another? Where has the Scott Act done good service? In Ontario the people have done away with it. My hon. friend has himself shown that in Quebec there is no Canada Temperance Act. In the maritime provinces some counties favour it while others oppose it. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that it has done good service. In New Brunswick it has proved a perfect fraud. There are more bar-rooms where the Act is in force than elsewhere, but they do not have licenses, and they sell the worst liquors that can be obtained. I entirely agree with my hon. friend if a system could be devised by which we could get liquor properly inspected it would be a great mitigation of the evil, but in the 20th century when people are brought down to the last dregs of hypocrisy they talk of the Canada Temperance Act on one hand and at the same time sell liquor all over the country. I am not disagreeing with my hon. friend or cavilling at his views. I think there is a great deal in them, but the hon. gentleman should have gone a step further and called for the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act, and then have licenses as he says. I have no objection to limiting the licenses and making the license fee high, so that the whole traffic may be conducted respectably. It would be a hard thing to say that among all the people engaged in the traffic in Canada there are none who are respectable, and no respectable houses. That would be a hard proposition to ask any one to subscribe to, but when you make them sell in secret you are opening the door to all sorts of fraud and inviting them to sell the worst stuff they can, because they are subject all the time to fines, penalties and imprisonment.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We do not make them sell.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—You make them sell secretly if you do not allow them to sell openly.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—But we do not make them sell. Why do they sell?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Because people want it. The question comes down largely to a matter of temperance and intemperance. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that temperance is to be inculcated in all things, as the Apostle Paul says—not only liquor but in all things.

I had the honour to be the prohibitionist candidate in my county once. I was set to work to see if I could stop the drinking, and I could not go beyond what I promised. They trusted me as their representative, because I stated that if the case came up I would vote for prohibition or resign my seat, as I felt I should do. When the matter came up in the House I voted for prohibition, and my charter party was ended. But what did I see during that time? I did not see any suppression of the liquor traffic. They drank behind the door. If my hon. friend can bring about some change that will make it an honest means of livelihood to sell liquor, and make the trade an honourable profession so that people who desire to use liquor can use it above board and as Christians, not evading the law, I should join him hand in hand. His motion, I believe is a worthy motion, well studied out and thought out, but the exception I take is that it does not go far enough. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman's idea could be worked out in some way, and if so it should be coupled with an amendment for the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I do not propose to enter into an argument on this question. I have not been an extreme prohibitionist in my day, and I have come to the same conclusion as the hon. gentleman from Halifax that we can expect no very great results from legislation. I do not, however, make the statement absolutely. I rise to call the attention of my hon. friend the mover of the resolution to a letter in the St. John 'Sun.' A letter appears from Mr. Joseph Malins, of Birmingham, secretary of the National Temperance Federation of Great Britain and Ireland, who went to Gothenburg and investigated the whole matter and gave evidence upon the subject before a commission in the House of Commons. His view is against the Act, and I will take the liberty to read two or three extracts so that my hon. friend can put them among the matter which he has to deal with, because I am quite sure whatever vote we may give on this matter we shall not quickly drive the evil from the face of the earth. Mr. Malins, dealing with the matter of convictions, says that in 1841 and some other years a bonus was given to the police in Sweden for the capture of men who were drunk. It became an evil, and that law was abolished about the same time as the new system came into force. Speaking of the system, Mr. Malins says :

Some portion of good must have resulted from minor reforms inaugurated with the Gothenburg system—when public houses were no longer used as pawn shops; no credit was given; the hours were shortened, and young children not served ; but the dignifying of the trade under municipal auspices and the pushing of it for the sake of municipal revenue has neutralized all the gain and made Gothenburg to-day just as drunken as it was before these reforms.

The municipal public houses are the worst of all.

During the four years preceding the inauguration of the Gothenburg system the drunken convictions were 45 to every 1,000 inhabitants ; and in like manner during the four years ending in 1904 the convictions are also 45 to every 1,000 inhabitants. If the police were now rewarded for each conviction, as before, the number of cases would obviously be much higher than here shown, and would thus demonstrate that under the system of municipalizing the liquor traffic Gothenburg is much more drunken than it was before.

Think of it !

One reply to this is that only about 18 per cent of the drunken cases are traced to the 22 indoor licensed houses managed by the municipal Bolag, and that 78 per cent is due, not simply to the 23 licenses they farm out to wine and spirit merchants, and the 40 odd licensed houses run by the municipal Bolag, but to over 800 beer and wine houses outside the management of the municipal company.

Taking them at their word it shows that the 22 fully licensed houses managed by the municipal Bolag alone are responsible for the drunken convictions of about 8 per 1,000 of the population. This is equal to the percentage of drunken convictions in London from drink-shops of every kind ; it is equal to the average of convictions from drink-shops of every kind in Liverpool during the last four years ; and is twice as many from these 22 houses as are produced in Cardiff from 170 'on' licensed houses and 80 indoor beer houses and scores of other places licensed to sell intoxicants.

It follows that Gothenburg is far more drunken than any British city, and that the municipal drink-shops are especially productive of an amount of drunkenness incomparably greater than in any place under the British licensing system.

Yours sincerely,
JOSEPH MALINS.
168 Edmund street, Birmingham.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman says this writer was before a committee of the House of Commons. Would he tell me when ? It must have been the committee presided over by Lord Peel several years ago, because I made inquiries whether there had been any recent committee to inquire into the matter in England, and I did not find any. I am not surprised at the statement contained in this letter. I had already drawn attention to a part of these remarks, namely, that in Sweden, where the system was introduced as early as 1865, it was established in an undesirable form. The profits in Sweden go to diminish the municipal rates of the city of Gothenburg and other municipalities, and therefore the ratepayers are interested in promoting the consumption of liquor. That fault was corrected to a considerable extent in Norway, when the system was introduced in 1871, and in England a further improvement has been made by doing away with that plan entirely and applying the profits exclusively to objects of public utility.

Outside of the question of reducing municipal rates, I am aware that other criticisms have been made, but again I say that we must take the statistics as they appear, and that they are incontrovertible. The hon. gentleman from St. Thomas quoted from a pamphlet, and I find on looking at that pamphlet that in 1876 the consumption was 28 litres per head, and in 1889 it was reduced to 16—about one-half. I have already shown that a few years later it was reduced to 13 litres per head; and in that same book I find that the number of cases of delirium tremens in Gothenburg was reduced from 123 in 1872 to 42 in 1889. We have also the fact that the consumption in those two countries—not taking Gothenburg alone, which is known to be a drunken city and to have remained a drunken city—but taking the two countries, Sweden and Norway, the consumption has been reduced to one-half gallon per head of the population, the very best result which can be found anywhere. It is a little over one gallon per head in the United States, and it is over two gallons per head in England. We have further the opinion of Mr. Chamberlain and of His Excellency the Governor General; we have the statistics which have been published by Sir Charles Bruce, and we have the fact that the leading men in England are associated with the movement, and that they have succeeded in establishing these systems in almost every county in the United Kingdom. Therefore, it seems to me that without any undue effort we should be able to come to the conclusion that it is tending in the best direction. The question does not involve any legislation, but merely involves drawing the attention of the public to a new mode, a mode which is in no way in conflict with other modes which may be adopted, for fighting intemperance.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Would my hon. friend tell me, from his statistics, when the reduction per capita in the drinking took place in Sweden? Was it before the Gothenburg system was inaugurated? If so, the Gothenburg system had very little, if anything, to do with the reduction in the drinking habit, and it would appear also that the reduction in the number of cases of delirium tremens, to which he refers, took place prior to the time the Gothenburg system was inaugurated.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman has been misled by the fact that before the Gothenburg system was adopted, as late as 1840, there was a considerable reduction brought about in the consumption of liquor by the changes in the system of licensing. That is unquestionable. The hon. gentleman stated that it was reduced from 8 to 4 gallons per head. I am reading from the statistics of the quantity of liquor consumed from year to year as given in this pamphlet.

In 1876 it was 27·3 litres per head; in 1878 it was 25·2 litres per head; in 1879 it was 22·3 litres per head; in 1880 it was 20·6 litres per head; in 1881 it was 19½ litres per head; in 1882 it was 18· litres per head; in 1883 it was 18 litres per head; in 1884 it was 18 litres per head; in 1885 it was 18 litres per head; in 1887 it was 16·3 litres per head; in 1888 it was 16·7 litres per head; in 1889 it was 16 litres per head.

From other statistics which I have given hon. gentlemen will see that it was reduced to 13, less than one-half of what it was in 1876. The system was introduced in Sweden in 1865, and in Norway in 1871. From the time the system was brought into operation in both countries, it has been considerably reduced particularly within the last few years, and now it is ·52 gallons per capita, the best result that can be found anywhere. In the three or four years that the system has been in operation in England it has produced a like effect. The consumption of liquor was formerly over four gallons per head, and now it is reduced to a trifle over two gallons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think I express the opinion of a very large number of members of this House when I say that this debate has been an exceedingly interesting one. But it is a subject to which I think very many of us have not given that attention which would justify our recording a vote at the present moment. And, moreover, we all know that this question has been relegated to the governments of the different provinces. My hon. friend has, I think, accomplished the object which he had in view in bringing this question before the Senate, namely, to call the attention of the public to the different systems which have existed or which exist at the present time in different parts of the world, and to submit evidence that the Gothenburg system is productive of much good in restricting the consumption of liquor. He has accomplished the object he had in view, and having done so it would be well, I think, particularly considering that a great many members are absent, to allow the motion to drop. Speaking for myself, I frankly confess that I have not given sufficient attention to the subject to justify me in recording a vote on the question. There may be others in the same position. I think the answers given by the hon. gentlemen to the hon. member from Victoria were not only pertinent but conclusive, just as much so as the answers which he gave to the hon. gentleman from Rothesay. We can scarcely expect a favourable opinion from the president of the Licensed Victuallers Association of Montreal. The figures which the hon. gentleman has given us establishes the fact that the drinking habits in those parts of the world where the system has prevailed have been lessened and doubtless much good will flow from it. I make the suggestion in the very best spirit—as no doubt he will give me credit for—that he should withdraw the motion so as not to press the matter to a vote at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I entirely concur in the observations of the hon. leader of the opposition, and agree with him that the debate has been productive of good. I feel that I should be very sorry to have my judgment committed in one way or the other on this vote, because I recognize that there are special conditions in existence, more particularly in England, where no doubt the system has been productive of good. There are other cases where it has been a failure, but I think there are very few gentlemen who desire, on the information we have before us, to have their judgment committed positively in one way or the other, and therefore, the object of my friend having been accomplished, I entirely second the proposal of the hon. leader of the opposition and ask him to allow the motion to be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The fact of the suggestion being made by the leaders on both sides of the House makes it my duty to acquiesce in it, and I do so the more readily because I think it is a question on which there should be no division. Even if the suggestion had not been made, if I had expected that there would be any division on the question, or that the motion would not carry unanimously, I would myself have come to the conclusion that it had better be withdrawn. I think it would be a pity on a question of this kind to see a division in this honourable House; and, as I stated, no legislation is contemplated by the motion. It is merely an expression of opinion, and the withdrawal of the motion will not close the door to renewing the discussion at a future session, when I hope hon. members of this House will have taken the trouble to inform themselves as to whether we should not try to introduce into this country the experiment which has proved so beneficial in other countries.

The motion was withdrawn.

CITY OF OTTAWA ACT ADENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (KK) An Act respecting the City of Ottawa.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think we should fix a maximum and minimum penalty with regard to the fine and the imprisonment. I have noticed, in the administration of the Customs Act in particular, where the discretion was left to the magistrate, that the penalties in very many cases really amount to nothing, because the magistrate could impose a fine from ten cents upward. I could give you some most interesting instances of my experiences in that matter, where those who administer the law look upon an infraction of provisions of this kind as of so little importance that they may impose 50 cents fine, or a fine of five dollars, as the case may be. I simply throw out the suggestion and do not move any amendment. I have thought that when the consideration of the Customs Act comes up, if I were in parliament, I would endeavour as far as possible, in all points where penalties are imposed to have a maximum and minimum fine or imprisonment fixed. Justice has been frustrated in numerous cases for want of a provision of this kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With all due deference, the cases are not analogous. I should not like to see a minimum or maximum penalty in a case of this kind for the reason that there may be children against whom the commissioners would have to proceed, and it might mean undue severity or harshness to impose even a minimum penalty. I think it would be found that most of the offenders in these cases would be of a juvenile class. That would not apply in the case of a violation or infraction of the Customs law. In my judgment I should prefer the section as it is.

Hon. M. POWER—As a rule also, these cases would come up before the stipendiary magistrate of the city of Ottawa, and being interested in the preservation of the beauties of the city, he would not be disposed to be unduly lenient with offenders.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (LL) An Act respecting the Joliette and Lake Manuan Colonization Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Legris.)

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, June 15, 1905.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved,

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 4th July next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I notice that a number of Bills are ordered to be read the third time to-morrow. That being the case, it may be necessary for the House to sit to-morrow, because some of the Bills may have to take a stage in the other chamber, and it is desirable that we should dispose of all the Bills on the order paper before we adjourn. I think there will be several days next week when the Senate will not be called upon to perform any duties, because there are very few Bills to come before us except government Bills, and therefore I see no objection to a recess being taken during next week. If the hon. gentleman chooses to amend his motion so that the adjournment will be from to-morrow until a week from Tuesday next, I will raise no objection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will amend the motion and make it read 'when the Senate adjourns to-morrow.'

The motion as amended was agreed to.

SUPPRESSION OF TUBERCULOSIS IN CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS moved:

That a special committee be appointed for the purpose of considering what further steps should be taken, and what suggestions can be made, in the direction of the suppression of tuberculosis in Canada.

The said committee to be composed of the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G., the Honourable Sir William Hingston, Kt., and the Honourable Messieurs De Boucherville, Sullivan, McMillan, Wilson, Fiset, Casgrain (Windsor), Robertson, Godbout, Béique, Ellis, Young, and the mover.

He said: It is quite unnecessary for me to take up the time of the Senate with any extended remarks with regard to this motion. The question involved was discussed in the Senate at very great length a few days ago, and in that discussion it became apparent that many thought the government of Canada should take some action in this matter. Various other opinions were expressed, and it has been thought advisable that a committee of this honourable House should be appointed for the purpose of considering further suggestions which might be made in the direction of suppressing the great plague of tuberculosis in Canada. With the permission of the House I should like to add the name of the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr). I should like also to add to the motion that the committee be empowered to send for papers and persons as may be required from time to time.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—With reference to this question of tuberculosis I wish to say that I was asked to go to a meeting of the society in Ottawa. I was not aware that there was a national society, and that it was presided over by the hon. gentleman from Rideau (Mr. Edwards). I went there and explained to them, as well as I could, the action of the Senate, but they received me with a great deal of coolness. They appeared to look on me as an intruder, or perhaps worse. They did not say a word either in praise or in condemnation of the remarks I made with reference to the action of the Senate. I understood that the hon. gentleman was acting only partly on the direction of his society; I understood that the action which he took here was independent action and not on behalf of any association whatever. This association has been in existence for a great many years, but so far it has not produced any results that I have ever heard of. I told them so, and I told them that the movement on the part of the Senate was a determined one; that the feeling of all the members of the Senate was to enter upon the work earnestly. I considered that if this Senate, or any member of it, initiated that action it would be a great honour to them, besides the benefit it would confer on the country. These gentlemen hinted that they wanted a royal commission. They passed a resolution favouring a royal commission, but I cannot see what use on earth a royal commission will be. I think we possess all the necessary information about tuberculosis, and the only thing a royal commission or a commission of any kind could do would be to recommend the adoption of means such as the erection of sanitaria and the putting into force of hygienic and sanitary laws generally. We had a debate recently on the subject of drinking, or alcoholism, in which I think the whole of the facts were not elicited, because I consider Canada is a most temperate country, more temperate than any other country where the English language is spoken. I could give figures to prove the statement, but that is not the question before us at the present time.

In view of what I have stated, I desire to be understood as not taking the position which I did before, because I do not believe I could act in connection with those gentlemen. They said that Mr. Edwards could do more with the government than the Senate or House of Commons. Well, I do not ignore the omnipotence of the hon. gentleman; I am glad he has such power; but I thought it was not fair to a member of the Senate to tell him so in the rough manner in which it was done. I think this action, if we take any, would be in antagonism of that association. If they are to be the leaders of the movement, and we are to be subordinate, and simply to act for the purpose of gaining a yearly subsidy for them, I shall have nothing more to do with it. I wish to make this explanation, because I was very earnest and determined in the course I intended to pursue, but that has all been put aside by the action of the association. They have issued a book and distributed a good deal of literature, and Sir James Grant has also lectured, but no practical effect has followed.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—It must become apparent to my hon. friend that the action I am taking to-day is independent entirely of any association in Canada. This is entirely a Senate matter. It is true there is a Dominion association for the prevention of tuberculosis; and it is true that I am president of that association. One of the executive meetings was held some time ago in the rooms of the Senate, and, as my hon. friend happened to be present, I suggested to the meeting that, as he was very enthusiastic with regard to this matter, we should do him the courtesy of inviting him to the meeting. A discussion took place as to the appointment of a royal commission. I personally was not favourable to the suggestion, and said that I preferred, the Senate having undertaken to discuss this matter, to let the Senate, and also the House of Commons, if it so wishes, come to conclusions in their own way as to the best means of dealing with the subject. Some discussion took place that day, and my hon. friend was good enough to address the meeting; but I can say, on my own behalf, and certainly, I think, I can say it on behalf of those who were present, that no discourtesy was thought of or intended, so far as he was concerned. I repeat, the action now proposed to be taken is on behalf of the Senate itself, and has nothing whatever to do with the various associations for the suppression of tuberculosis in Canada. I say this, however, that if any representatives from those associations are asked to make suggestions, it would be quite proper that the Senate Committee should receive and consider them. Personally, I should be very sorry if my hon. friend declines to act upon this committee. I sincerely hope he will consent to act, because his name was one of the first I thought of in connection with the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PITBLADO DIVORCE CASE.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I wish to make a request to the House in regard to the Pitblado divorce case. On Tuesday last I moved that the report of the Divorce Committee be set down for consideration on Tuesday next. Now if this House is going to adjourn to-morrow for a week or ten days, the result will be that the matter would have to stand over until the following week, which might result in the defeat of the Bill this session. I am sure there is nobody in the House who is not satisfied with the evidence taken in the case; and I would move that the report on the Pitblado divorce case be now considered.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman will require first to move to rescind the resolution setting it down for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved that the order be rescinded.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved that the report be now concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved that the Bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Have we a right to rescind an order which is not an Order of the Day?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, by unanimous consent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But it is not an Order of the Day. The simplest motion would be to put that item on the Orders of the Day for to-day and not to rescind.

The SPEAKER—It could only be done by consent of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not opposing the motion, but I do not think we are proceeding regularly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, the House the other day ordered that the consideration of the thirtieth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be taken into consideration on Tuesday next. The hon. gentleman from Brandon (Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) has moved that the resolution be rescinded. That could only be done by the unanimous consent of the House, but as there was no dissenting voice the resolution was rescinded. Then the hon. gentleman moved that the report of the committee be taken into consideration to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That was rescinding the resolution of yesterday, but not an Order of the Day.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

A CORRECTION OF THE MINUTES.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the manner in which the report of the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs, and Harbours, dealing with the Fesseden Wireless Telegraph Company, was entered in the minutes. It will be remembered that the amendments made to that Bill by the House of Commons were of such a complicated character and so numerous that the Senate thought it better to refer the amendments to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours for consideration. The minutes as they appear simply record the adoption of the report. I will read it:

The Honourable Mr. Casgrain (de Lanaudière), from the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to whom was referred the Bill (I) intituled: 'An Act to incorporate the Fessenden Wireless Telegraph Company,' as amended by the House of Commons, presented their report.

Ordered, that the report be now received, and

The same was then read by the clerk, as follows :

The Senate Committee Room No. 8,
Wednesday, 14th June, 1905.

The Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to whom was referred the Bill (I) intituled : 'An Act to incorporate the Fessenden Wireless Telegraph Company of Canada,' as amended by the House of Commons, have, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, 7th June, instant, examined the said Bill, as amended, and now beg leave to report that your committee have agreed to the amendment made by the House of Commons to the said Bill without any amendment.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. P. B. CASGRAIN,
Chairman.

On motion of the Honourable Mr. Casgrain (de Lanaudière), seconded by the Honourable Mr. David, it was Ordered, that the said report be adopted.

Ordered, that a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate doth agree to the amendments made by the House of Commons to the said Bill, without any amendment.

What we adopted was the report and not the amendments made by the House of Commons. I suggest that the minutes be amended as follows :

That the committee has examined the said Bill, as amended, and now begs leave to report the same without any amendment, and to recommend that the amendments made by the House of Commons to the said Bill be agreed to without any amendment.

And further down after the words :

On motion of the Honourable Mr. Casgrain (de Lanaudière), seconded by the Honourable Mr. David, it was Ordered, that the said report be adopted.

I would suggest that the following words be added :

And that the amendments made by the House of Commons to the said Bill be agreed to without any amendment.

That would adopt the report of the committee, and the amendments made by the House of Commons. As it stands now, there is really no adoption by the Senate as a body, of the amendments made by the House of Commons. With the consent of the Senate, the clerk might be instructed to make these amendments.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call attention to rule 72, which provides that :

When any private Bill is returned from the House of Commons with amendments, the same not being merely verbal or unimportant, such amendments are, previous to their second reading, referred to a committee of the whole, or to the standing committee to which such Bill was originally referred.

If I understand this rule there should be a second reading. Where is the second reading ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House concurring in the amendments is tantamount to a second reading.

The SPEAKER—The practice of the House of Commons is to give three readings to the amendments. I noticed rule 72, and found that the practice in the Senate had not been in accord with it for a number of years, but I simply followed the practice of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No practice can prevail against the rule.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman is quite right, but by the unanimous consent of the Senate the other practice has been followed without a dissenting voice. Any senator raising the point could have obtained a change of practice and reverted to the rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is what I am doing now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The practice has been, when amendments have been made by the House of Commons to a Bill originating in the Senate, to have the amendments read by the clerk at the table; then some member makes a motion that the amendments be concurred in. The amendments to the Bill now under consideration were so numerous that the hon. member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) suggested that they be referred to a committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He followed the rule.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am merely stating what occurred. They were referred to a committee, and that committee reported. What I called the attention of the Senate to was the fact that although that committee reported and their report was adopted, the Senate has not up to the present time concurred in the amendments made by the House of Commons. My object in calling attention to the matter was to put the minutes right. Whether the other procedure is in accordance with the rules, I am not prepared to say.

IMPRISONMENT OF STOWAWAYS.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to direct the attention of the government specially to a subject which is of great importance to our seaports in the province of Quebec, and I suppose the same applies to the seaports of the maritime provinces. It is a question of being obliged to harbour, feed and keep people who come to Canada against the law of the country. I speak simply for the port of Montreal, as there must be representatives present from the maritime provinces, and other sections of the country, who will be able to inform the House what transpires in their respective districts with regard to the bringing over of stowaways by the several steamship companies who do business with foreign ports as well as with ports in England, Ireland and Scotland. My experience has not been limited in this matter, but extends over twenty-five years of practice in the courts of Montreal, and I have never in the summer months had occasion to go into the criminal courts in Montreal without finding in the dock two or three or perhaps half a dozen specimens of humanity who might well be kept at home, for whom we have no place here. These people are brought by the captains of the different vessels to the court house, there put into the hands of the high constable, brought before a justice of the peace or a judge of the court of sessions, and what is done to them? Are they sent back to the country they came from, whether Italy, France, Scotland or England ? No. Our magistrate simply sends them to the provincial jails for terms varying from two to six months. Whether that is due to a lack in the criminal law to provide other means of punishment, I am not prepared to say. I believe it is due to a lack of proper provision in our criminal law, and for this reason I call the attention of the government to the facts. The 'Gazette' of this morning, the official organ of the Conservative party, and the organ of the government party also calls these people the worst class of persons coming into the country, the scum of Liverpool and the scum of Europe. When they come to this country we are obliged under our law to put them into jail with our ordinary prisoners, not actual criminals, who are committed there for drunkenness or for violating the municipal law or some other such reason. That state of things has been tolerated too long in this country, and I would ask those in this House who are responsible, to call the attention of our government to the fact that as far as Montreal is concerned we do not desire to have the system tolerated any longer. As I have pointed out to the magistrate when he was committing these people to jail for no other reason than that they were stowaways or wharf rats, no crime has been committed against Canada. They violate no law, no statute of Canada, and still we, through our judiciary, force these people into jail. By what right? On what ground? If there is any offence in a stowaway being on board ship against the will of the captain or the owner of the vessel, that crime was not committed within the waters of Canada, but committed within the waters of the foreign country from whence the ship sailed; and I have always considered it a shame for our magistrates to condemn men to two, three, or four or six months imprisonment when they have committed no offence against Canadian law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Were they committed on the ground of being vagrants?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, stowaways. The captain handed them over to the court and said he had no use for them. To be a vagrant you must be in the city at least twenty-four hours. You cannot become a vagrant in six minutes. These people could not become vagrants, they were never on our streets or wharfs. I have always held in the courts that our magistrates should have power to get rid of these people in some other way. In Quebec we are obliged to maintain, in the summer at least, from two to five hundred of these people. They are sent to jail in June and July and discharged in September or October, just at the time when they must starve or steal if they wish to get a living. This is no exaggeration. The latest reference to the matter appears in the 'Gazette' this morning and in 'Le Canada,' the official organ of the government. The paragraph is as follows :

The scum of Liverpool.

They might well say the scum of all foreign ports. The article proceeds :

Judge Choquette sends a group to jail for the summer.

We will have a nice load on our hands when these people get out for the winter.

Six men were arrested early yesterday morning for loitering on board the steamship 'Lake Champlain,' of the Canadian Pacific Atlantic line. They were brought up before Judge Choquette yesterday. Mr. J. C. Walsh, who appeared for the prosecution——

I suppose he appeared on behalf of the steamship company.

—said that the men were part of a gang who infested the river front. They boarded the 'Champlain,' forced their way into the mess-room, locked themselves in and refused admission to the sailors who belonged to the ship. They are the scum of Liverpool,' said Mr. Walsh, 'who come out here in the spring and loaf around the river front until the fall, when they make their way back to Liverpool again.'

Then the names of the men are given.

Judge Choquette thought that the men would be safer in jail at hard labour than loafing round the docks, and sent them to jail for four months.

The result is that we in Quebec have to pay the board and keep of the six men for four months. Why should the government of the Dominion of Canada force Quebec to maintain men over whom the province has no control ? Why should we, through the criminal law, be forced to sustain these people for the summer months ? The question is easily answered. We had a discussion recently with regard to immigration, and I, for one, asked the members of the government to insist that the administration see that their officers shall allow no man to land in the port of Montreal, or in any other Canadian port, unless he is perfectly healthy and able to become a good citizen. I ask the government again to put an end to this system which has been in existence as long as the port of Montreal, and against which the judges of our courts in Montreal complain and protest, but over which they have no power until this parliament deals with the matter. It is within the power of the government of Canada to direct its commissioners——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I rise to a point of order. There is nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am nearly through. I do not see what harm I am doing to Prince Edward Island.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman rose to put a question to the government, and he is explaining it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Probably Prince Edward Island has no stowaways. I say that this matter is serious, and I am asking the government to give it serious consideration. I say that Montreal is entitled to protection, whether by the administration or by the criminal law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will bring the matter to the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior, who has the duty of examining immigrants coming to Canada. We receive about one hundred thousand immigrants annually, and those who are thought undesirable are returned at the expense of the steamship companies. I do not at all agree with the hon. gentleman in denouncing the stowaways as he has done. Some six boys who arrived as stowaways were brought before the magistrate and asked why they came to Canada. They said they expected to get work. Two were bricklayers ; they had no work and no money, and therefore they came to Canada. The magistrate said : 'Do you propose to remain in Canada ?' The reply was yes, they expected to remain and work at their trade. Now, they may be very desirable settlers in Canada. The magistrate took the proper view of the matter, and sent them to jail for a few days. He said : 'At the end of the term'—I think less than a week—'you will be at liberty to remain in Canada.' I thought it was the most sensible judgment I had seen for some time, because he seemed to be impressed with the character of the lads, and they seemed to be in a position to improve their station in life, by availing themselves of the openings which Canada offered them. I do not agree with the statement that stowaways amount to many hundreds in the year. I do not think so. It may be the officials do allow some undesirable persons to escape their notice and remain in the country, but that is inevitable. You cannot make any system of the kind perfect. The United States has the same trouble, only that it is accentuated to a greater degree ; they require a very large establishment in order to hold the people who are to be returned. They number some thousands in the course of the year, while ours do not run up in the hundreds. I do not think the evil is quite as great as my hon. friend speaks of. However, the Minister of the Interior will remind his officers that any undesirable person ought to be returned and not be made a charge on the country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is exactly what I want, that they shall not become a charge upon our province.

COMPANIES ACT, 1902, AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second readind of Bill (NN) An Act to amend the Companies Act, 1902.

He said : I gave some explanations when I introduced the measure, but perhaps the House may learn more clearly the object of the Bill if I read a letter received from the solicitor of a number of companies. He says :

> The Companies Act in England, also the Nova Scotia and British Columbia Companies Acts make provision for the issue of bearer share warrants in lieu of the ordinary form of stock certificates. Several of the undertakings in Rio de Janeiro and in Mexico which the Rio de Janeiro Tramway, Light and Power Company, Limited, and the Mexican Light and Power Company, Limited, have acquired, and are negotiating to acquire, are controlled in France and other countries in Europe. Share warrants to bearer instead of stock certificates requiring transfer in the usual way are very much used in France and Germany, and in negotiating for the undertakings referred to, Mr. F. S. Pearson, who is now in Europe acting for the companies, finds great difficulty in concluding the negotiations unless the companies can issue share warrants instead of stock certificates. I received a cable from him a few days ago urging him to ask the government to have an amendment to the Companies Act passed this session with respect to share warrants. I have prepared an amendment, which I inclose, taken from the English Companies Act. As there cannot be any objection from the public point of view to the passing of the amendment, and as it is a matter of great convenience to the two companies mentioned, and will doubtless prove equally convenient to others, I hope that you will introduce the amendment so that it may be passed this session. It is, of course, to the interests of Canada that we should be in a position to procure capital from France and Germany with respect to enterprises originating or conducted here, and the amendment asked will much facilitate the accomplishment of this object. I have met with several instances within the last year where share warrants were made essential to the success of the undertaking, and from what I learned on the subject last year when I was over in Paris, it seems impossible to get on without them, owing to the difficulties with reference to formal transfers of shares and the law stamps over there.

It does not interfere with our method of doing business here, and it is for use abroad only. I see no objection to it.

Clause 7 of the Bill reads as follows :

> 7. Section 5 of the Companies' Act, 1902, is amended by adding thereto the following subsection :
> 3. Nothing in this section, or in any charter or letters patent heretofore or hereafter issued, shall be deemed to prevent any company to which this Act applies from acting as a contractor in railway, telegraph or telephone construction.

In the Companies Act the section provides that in granting charters the Secretary of State is authorized to grant charters for any purpose for which the government may issue charters, except for the construction of telegraph and telephone lines, and the business of banking, &c. As regards the construction and working of railways, it was evidently meant that the whole control of railways should rest with parliament; but I do not suppose it was in contemplation by parliament at the time the Act was passed, so far as concerns contracts to supply cars and do grading, rock work, &c., that the companies formed under the Act would be excluded from that kind of work, because it is work which any ordinary man can do. I propose therefore to make that clear. In many cases contracts have been granted by railway companies to contractors who hold charters and no exception has ever been taken to it, but it should be made clear. As the statute stood, it meant the construction and working. It joined the two. This proposes to remove the limitation as regards contracts for construction work, to which I see no objection.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The explanation of the hon. Secretary of State left the impression on some hon. gentlemen the other day, that there would be two forms of documents with regard to the stock certificate, and that if you held a number of stock certificates there would also be a warrant covering these. The hon. gentleman now says this second document is to be issued in lieu of the first.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. A man has a hundred shares, and he receives a warrant in place of the certificate.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—He surrenders the shares.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. It is to meet the views of certain capitalists in Europe.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has there been any demand from the representatives of other companies for legislation of this character? It seems to me the conditions mentioned by my hon. friend would scarcely warrant our amending general legislation to meet such exceptional circumstances as those mentioned. I doubt very much the propriety of this parliament facilitating the flotation of companies in Mexico and in Rio De Janeiro and the placing of such stock upon the European money market without our knowing anything about it. I venture the assertion that the flotation of those companies on the English market will not in any way contribute towards the promotion of Canadian interests with regard to the many Canadian enterprises which from time to time may be placed before English or European investors. We are asked now to pass exceptional legislation, to meet a class of cases which has not hitherto arisen, and to apply that legislation to the whole of our company laws in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This legislation is in the English Companies Act and in the Companies Acts in British Columbia and Nova Scotia. It is simply intended to satisfy the views of persons in France and Germany who prefer that method of holding shares. The companies to which my hon. friend refers are very important—the Mexican Light, Heat and Power Company has a capital of over $30,000,000 and it is quite proper that such a company desiring to raise further amounts in Europe, should be permitted the privilege of altering the form of the certificate which verifies the number of shares the holder possesses. I see no objection to the Bill. To my mind there is no visible distinction between the two methods only we know very well that money in Europe is very cautious and circumspect as to the character of the security it takes, and they use what is called a warrant there, different from our share certificate. I see no objection to it, and if it is going to facilitate the introduction of money into Canada, we all ought to rather favour than disapprove of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have nothing to say as to the principle of the Bill, only that I trust the hon. Secretary of State will, before the Bill goes into committee, procure a copy of the English Act and copies of the Acts in force in British Columbia and Nova Scotia, so that we may be able to compare them with the Bill. I wish to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to certain statements in this Bill which seem to be to a certain extent contradictory to one another. If the hon. gentleman will look at clause 3 he will find that:

> 3. The bearer of a share warrant shall, subject to the conditions to be determined by the directors as hereinafter provided, be entitled on surrendering such warrant for cancellation to have his name entered as a shareholder in the books of the company.

If the hon. gentleman will turn to clause 5 he will find this:

> And on the surrender of a warrant the date of such surrender shall be entered as if it were the date at which the person ceased to be a shareholder.

That is apparently in conflict with clause 3 which says that when he surrenders his warrant he is entered as a shareholder. Without some further explanation, those two statements appear to me to be contradictory one of the other. Then in clause 6, there is a provision that upon a certain thing happening:

> A share warrant may be surrendered and the name of the holder entered in the books of the company in respect of the shares therein specified.

It seems to me that the latter part of clause 5 is apparently wrongly worded. At the beginning of clause 5 it is provided that:

On the issue of a share warrant in respect of any share or shares, the company shall strike out of its books the name of the shareholder then entered therein as holding such share or shares as if he had ceased to be a shareholder.

I suppose what should be provided for is that when he surrenders a warrant his name is replaced on the books as a shareholder. I also call attention to the fact that the two numbers are used, 'share or shares.' Under our Interpretation Act that is quite unnecessary. It is not the practice in our Acts to put in both singular and plural.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You will find in the Companies Act that 'share' comes in occasionally and sometimes 'shares.' This Bill has been drafted by a gentleman who is rather celebrated for his mode of drafting,—Mr. Lash, who was for a long time in the Justice Department; it is his drafting entirely. He sent me the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no doubt as to Mr. Lash's ability to draft a Bill. It all depends on his instructions. However, the matter can be discussed in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the adoption of the second report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I call attention to clause 6 of the report, and suggest to the House that the present acting doorkeeper should be left where he is until the end of the session, and that Mr. Larose, who is appointed doorkeeper, should remain Speaker's messenger for the rest of the session. It will be a little solatium to the present doorkeeper to leave him where he is for the balance of the session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That can be done without amending the report.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—We can simply carry it out.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—In view of the absence of some members of the Senate and especially of one of the members of the committee, I should like the consideration of the report to be adjourned, if there is no special objection, for another week.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had better dispose of it now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to any clause of the report, but to point out that every session a good deal of lobbying and pressure is brought to bear upon members of the committee, and members of the House to increase salaries of employees of the Senate. What I would suggest to the committtee and to the government is this, that a scale of salaries for all permanent officials should be adopted which should be embodied in an Act of parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or we could place all the servants of the House under the Civil Service Act, which would bring them in at a certain salary and allow increases to take place during the time they are in the employment of the Senate. After a good deal of consideration I have come to the conclusion that it would be a great saving to the country and would relieve the Contingent Committee, from a very great deal of trouble and responsibility if a committee were appointed by the Contingent Committee to confer with the members of the government, and adopt a scale such as I have suggested, allowing messengers to come in at a certain salary and let them gradually attain the maximum in the same way as civil servants. It might be necessary to make an exception of the translators. We may require a translator of unusual ability. My experience has taught me that though a man may be a good French scholar he may be a poor translator, and I would not apply the suggestion I have made to gentlemen of that character. The committee might take into consideration the question as to where latitude should be allowed. In the Civil Service Act there is a provision which permits the bringing of gentlemen into the service at higher salaries than those provided for, because of special qualifications for the positions to which they are appointed. That same principle might be carried out in an Act such as I have suggested. For some years I was a member of the Contingent Committee, and I know the trouble and annoyance to which the chairman and other members of the committee are put. If the suggestion I have thrown out were adopted, and a committee appointed consisting of gentlemen who understand the working of the Senate and the duties to be performed by the officials of the Senate, they could make a recommendation to the Finance Minister and the members of the government in this House which might be embodied in a Bill, so that every official of the Senate in the future would know what his position is. We have been told by the hon. Secretary of State in this House—I am not at liberty to refer to what took place in the committee—that when increases have been recommended the Finance Minister has made objections to them without really knowing the reasons why the increases were granted, and a good deal of trouble and annoyance has been caused thereby. If they are embodied in an Act of parliament there will be an end to the trouble.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No doubt the suggestion is a sound one, and I have so felt for a long time. It was my intention to have introduced a Bill dealing with the subject this session. The increases have been, I will not say capricious, but made under pressure, and have not been relatively fair, because the modest man who does his work without calling attention to it, is overlooked while the bumptious man, who is perpetually discussing his own qualifications, is the one put forward for no other reason than to get rid of him. It has been very embarrassing and has not been at all fair or just. I am quite prepared to take up the proposal now made, and if the present committee will appoint a small subcommittee, we might agree upon a Bill this session, or at all events we can arrange it for next session, dealing with the promotion of employees on some fixed principle. You never can do anything satisfactorily in the haphazard way it is done now. As my hon. friend has mentioned, we have adopted the principle in the Civil Service Act, and I think there is a minute of council by which the officials of any department are not permitted to solicit ministers of other departments to speak on their behalf. It rather tells against the man who adopts that method to secure promotion. Every official is supposed to be advanced on his merits, and it is for his superior officer to say whether he deserves promotion. Our way of doing business in the Senate has not been based on any principle.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—The suggestions which have been made are so wise that I hope they will soon be put into practice, but until that is done we are the judges of the cases as they come before us. The question is, shall we accept the report which is now submitted to us, or shall it be postponed ? The hon. senator from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) has proposed a postponement of this report, because of the absence of some members of the committee. Probably he would like to get some more information from them, because they know what took place in the committee. If his request is refused, I shall move that the man who is now acting as doorkeeper be appointed doorkeeper. My reasons are that Mr. Pelletier has been in the service of the Senate for a much longer time than Mr. Larose, who has been recommended for appointment as doorkeeper ; secondly, he has done his duty well ; and, thirdly, he was assistant to the late Mr. Dunne while he was doorkeeper. For all these reasons, Mr. Pelletier is entitled to promotion. If we are to consider this report to-day I shall not give a silent vote, but will move the amendment which I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. FISET—I remarked in the committee that Mr. Pelletier was longer in the service of the Senate than Mr. Larose, and an hon. member told me that the reverse was the fact. I have since obtained information on the point, and I know that Pelletier is the senior employee. For that reason I shall support the amendment.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I quite concur in the remarks made by the hon. member from Belleville and the hon. Secretary of State ; it would be well to have maximum and minimum salaries for all the officials of the Senate. There is no doubt it would be a great relief to members of the committee. The hon. member from Belleville was for many years a member of the Contingent Committee, and he knows the difficulty experienced in refusing applications from different employees for increases in salary. It is a case of constant log-rolling and lobbying for the purpose of securing additional pay. The House of Commons last year adopted a minimum salary for the staff of the House of Commons, and fixed it at practically the same figure as the civil service. With regard to the motion to substitute Mr. Pelletier for Mr. Larose, that is in the hands of the House. So far as the appointment of these two gentlemen is concerned, the information supplied to me by the Clerk is that Larose was first appointed in 1865 and was given his present position in 1887 ; that Pelletier first came into the service in 1874 and was appointed to his present position in 1891. From this it would appear that Larose has been in the service nearly forty years.

Hon. Mr. FISET—In the service of the government ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes. It is quite true, as stated by the hon. gentleman from de la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Tessier), that Pelletier was given charge of the wardrobe and appointed assistant doorkeeper, while Larose has been Speaker's messenger.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am sorry that an experienced parliamentarian like the hon. gentleman from de la Durantaye, who has been Speaker of the legislative assembly in Quebec, should have thought fit to depart from the usual practice in connection with the reports of this committee. There is every reason why the merits of particular servants should not be discussed in this House. In the committee members are free to speak of the qualifications of the various candidates for any office. It would be an unpleasant and invidious thing to discuss their merits here. With respect to the two officials mentioned for the position of doorkeeper, there was a full discussion in the committee. The whole matter was considered, and the committee, by a very decided majority, joined in the recommendation contained in the report. I am very sorry that the hon. gentleman from de la Durantaye should have thought it his duty to propose the motion he has made. I hope he will withdraw it, because, however disagreeable it may be, those who are opposed to the amendment will be obliged, when it is made, to give the reasons why they oppose it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—There is a question of fact. We do not want to discuss the recommendation of the committee. The hon. gentleman from de la Durantaye affirms that Mr. Pelletier is an older employee of the Senate than Mr. Larose. The hon. member for the Gulf (Hon. Mr. Fiset) says that he was perhaps under a false impression. That is why I propose that the consideration of the report be postponed for another week at least, in order that we may inquire into the facts. In any event, if my motion to postpone the report is lost, I shall support the amendment.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) has seen fit to read me a lesson. He has had a great deal more experience than I have had, and I will receive this lesson with respect and try to profit by it later. It is true I have been Speaker of the lower House at Quebec, but our duties there were quite different from those in this House, because in Quebec I made the appointments myself and naturally was never criticised, because I always made very good appointments. If the hon. gentleman from Halifax thinks that because he can influence the committee enough to make a bad appointment, we in the House are going to submit to it, he is mistaken. I did not criticise the qualifications, the conduct or the value of those different employees, I simply said that I was told, and had reason to believe, that Pelletier was an older employee of the Senate than Larose. If that is true, I think he is entitled to promotion, if he is a good officer and a deserving man. I did not discuss their personal characters, I simply said as a matter of fairness Pelletier ought to be promoted. That is why I shall make my motion if the consideration of the report is not postponed.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—With regard to the amendment, I entirely agree with the remarks of the ex-Speaker. We discussed this whole question in the committee, and I frankly confess I was in favour of Pelletier. At the same time, after fuller consideration, and with the report now before us, as a member of that committee, I deem it my duty to stand by the report as presented, and I shall vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CHURCH—I was present at the meeting of the committee, though not a member, and heard the discussion with regard to the appointment of a doorkeeper. From my standpoint, I do not know whether it is so much a question of merit. Either of the parties whose names have been mentioned is quite capable of performing the duties of doorkeeper of the Senate. I have become fairly well acquainted with Pelletier and like him very well. He certainly performs his duties in the wardrobe very satisfactorily, and I think his qualifications for the post of doorkeeper are good. I shall therefore vote for the amendment. I am entirely in accord with the remarks from the hon. gentleman from Belleville, so well seconded by the hon. Secretary of State. There should be some arrangement which would do away with the persecution of members of the committee for advancement. We should be very careful that the merits of every applicant are investigated, so that only properly qualified persons may be appointed, and after appointment promotion should come to all who discharge their duties faithfully.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have asked the clerk to give me a return from his book. It appears that Larose was appointed sessional messenger in 1875; Pelletier was appointed sessional messenger in 1874, one year earlier than Larose. But Larose was appointed on the permanent list in 1882, while Pelletier was not appointed until 1884. In 1887 Larose was appointed Speaker's messenger, and in 1894, Pelletier was appointed caretaker of the wardrobe.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it is beneath the dignity of the Senate that we should discuss the merits of two of our servants in this way. I am not a member of the committee, but I am quite sure the committee gave the matter fair and impartial consideration, and I am prepared to stand by its report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is true that other things being equal, seniority should count. But there is this fact, which has not been brought out, that although Mr. Larose did not enter the service until 1875—that is one year after Mr. Pelletier, Mr. Larose, before he came into the Senate had been an employee of the Public Works Department. It does not seem to me that it is of much consequence in what particular branch of the public service the public officer has been employed.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I agree with the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. We have a large committee, which deals with the question of appointments. We have the report of the committee before us, and it is unpleasant to be called upon to vote openly on matters of this kind. I am quite prepared to stand by the committee and vote on the question as they have given the matter their best consideration, but I think it is beneath the dignity of the Senate to discuss the subject here.

The amendment was lost on the following division: Yeas, 14; Nays, 23.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—I move that in clause 16 the name of Pelletier be substituted for that of Larose.

The amendment was lost on the following division:

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (MM) An Act to amend the Acts respecting Naturalization and Aliens.

He said: This Bill is for the purpose of facilitating and reducing the cost of naturalization. Complaints are made by members from Manitoba and the Northwest Territories that the delays in the process of naturalization are very serious, and that it is very important that the proceedings should be simplified; and the Bill is drawn with that point in view. Under the law as it stood the judge was directed to hear cases on a particular Wednesday or upon some future day. The Act has been taken to mean that the judge could hear cases on a Wednesday only, which was of course not intended by parliament. The object of the Bill is to provide that judges may hear the application at the earliest opportunity after the notices have been posted the required number of days.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (169) An Act to amend the Act respecting the Royal Military College.

He said: This is a short Bill fixing the salary of the commandant at $3,200 a year and the salaries of the staff adjutant, instructors and assistant instructors are to be fixed by the Governor in Council. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked me to give him a statement of the present salary of the commandant. The present salary is $3,163.33, and the salary under the Bill is $3,200, which is not a very material increase.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

COMPANIES ACT, 1902, AMENDMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (NN) An Act to amend the Companies Act, 1902.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman tell us what the meaning of the latter portion of the clause is? It says, 'may provide by coupon or otherwise for the payment of the future dividends of the share or shares.' I cannot well understand how they could provide——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There may be some companies which have such an arrangement. It is an exact copy of the British Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to know what it means. If I hold a share in the company, it may declare a dividend of a certain per cent. How is that to be added to this warrant or certificate of the ownership of the shares? I could understand in a case where preferential stock is issued, guaranteeing the payment of 6 or 7 per cent as the case might be, that such might be added to the share, but not as a coupon. Another point that strikes me is this, the warrant would be a commercial commodity in the hands of the holder, whoever he might be. Could that be sold and become a marketable share, transferred from one person to another, without the consent of the company?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We know that in all those incorporated companies—at least all that I am acquainted with—there is a provision that shares shall only be transferred with the consent of the directors of the company, for the time being. Under this Bill it seems to me that the warrant would be a marketable commodity the same as a note of hand, or a dollar bill. Might I ask the hon. gentleman if that is the effect ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that shares in companies are only transferable with the consent of the directors ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In most cases.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That is a misapprehension. The shares are personal property and transferable on the books of the company, or otherwise as may be provided by the General Act, and if the shares are paid up it is a very unusual thing to require the consent of the directors. It is only when a portion of the shares has not been paid up that the directors can interfere. I can say from a very large experience that in 99 out of 100 companies, where the stock of the company is fully paid up the shares may be transferred without the consent of the directors. With reference to the transferability of these warrants, this measure simply provides for the issue of a warrant entitling the bearer of it to a share, and the clause of which the hon. gentleman has asked an explanation merely provides for the payment of future dividends on the share or shares included in the warrant. That may be done either by coupons or otherwise. The hon. gentleman asked what is the meaning of 'otherwise.' It means that a warrant may on its face provide for the payment of dividends on its being presented at a particular place where provision is made for the payment. Those are the qualifications that it may contain. If a dividend is payable, then instead of its being payable on presentation of the warrant itself at the bank, they might provide for payment by coupon or otherwise. The hon. gentleman will see that there might be a way for the payment of dividends otherwise than by coupons, either at the office of the company, and on presentation of the warrant itself, or in some other way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has not paid particular attention to what I said. What I stated was this, that all the companies with which I am connected require that shares shall only be transferred when entered on the books of the company with the consent of the directors. I repeat the statement, because I happen to be president of one or two companies, and I know that in every case where a share is transferred, it has to be reported to and passed on by the directors before it is transferred. There may be companies in which that provision does not exist.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—A very large proportion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I speak of companies of which I have knowledge, and I speak positively as to that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know some companies desire that power to be incorporated in their charter. There is very great reluctance in doing so, however, because a man who owns a share ought to be perfectly independent as to the disposal of it when it is paid up. I grant that before it is fully paid up there should be some control, but once paid up it should pass freely from hand to hand like a dollar bill. It might be registered, so that if it were lost the finder could not take advantage of it. It is a domestic matter with the company and they may make such regulations as they please. I have the English clauses here and they are exactly similar to the clauses in this Bill. It is also the law in British Columbia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that where shares are fully paid up, the company may make regulations such as he has mentioned ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, if they please, but if they do not make regulations to limit it, the shares pass from hand to hand like dollar bills.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing they make regulations declaring that transfers shall not be valid until registered in the books, of what value is this clause ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then it must be subject to the regulations of the company. It is perfectly optional.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This may be an English law, but at first sight it appears to me that it opens a way whereby very large monopolies may ultimately result. If you make shares circulating medium the same as a dollar bill they come in collision with the issues of the banks and banking institutions. In the next place, a man who wants to monopolize the control of an institution whose stock is paid up, can put four or five men in the market and lay his hands on all the stock; and when he gets control of a majority of the stock he can register in the books, turn out the board of directors and put in another board. If the company were in a position, as they are now, to require that stock shall not be transferred until it is recorded in the books of the company that could not be done; but under this Bill the purchaser of shares becomes the legal owner the moment he pays for the share. He takes it over the same as a dollar bill, and he can, when he lays his hand upon a sufficient amount of the paid up stock to give him a majority of votes, have it entered in the books and proceed to play ducks and drakes with the institution. That is the danger connected with a law of this kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. Under the present law he can do the same thing. It is only substituting a form of warrant for what we call the certificate. The Companies Act in the first place provides for the transfers being registered, but if the stock is paid up a man gets a certificate and he need not register where the stock is listed. A may sell to B, and B may sell to C and so on; and if any particular owner says, 'I would rather have my share registered,' he proceeds to have it registered; but that can all be done at the present time. In regard to transfers, this provision is not made to apply to any company whose stock is listed, but a scrip-holder is not entitled to vote on shares until they are registered. This is just the same as registered stock, and is simply giving a different name to what we are doing now in Canada.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—What particular difficulty has arisen to require the introduction of this Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A request is made for such a warrant as they issue in England, under the hand and seal of the company. We know very well that capitalists in England and France are exceedingly jealous of the principle under which they do business. They are not satisfied with certificates; they desire a warrant under the seal of the company that the shares which it covers are paid up, so that they may be transferred from A to B, and from B to C.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—There is a reason for this which is quite apparent. Frequently in a new company, stock is issued and subscriptions may be taken up at different points. Many small companies issue stock and subscriptions may be taken up in Montreal, New York and Toronto at the same time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman means subscribing for stock?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes, and paying for it in full. The man who subscribes and pays his money wants something in the shape of security which will enable him to go to his banker who will probably advance the money. The certificate would not be security which the bank would accept. The scrip could not be forwarded there and issued at the time. All he could get would be a receipt from the bank. That would not show that he was entitled to the stock; it would only show that he had paid so much money on account of shares. But having possession of a warrant entitling him to so many shares would enable him to walk into a bank and obtain the advance, and the bank would take up the scrip. The head office might be in Montreal and subscriptions might be taken in London, England, and Toronto, concurrently. That is a common practice in Great Britain, and it is sometimes done here. If I were in Toronto and wanted shares, the head office being at Montreal, I could not get a scrip certificate at the time I paid the money, and I could not satisfy the banker that he had proper security for a loan. But if I could get a warrant for the stock, I could take that warrant to the banker, and obtain the advance. That is a clear case where a warrant would answer the purpose and a share certificate would not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will this warrant be issued to the person who holds the stock or to bearer?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It would make no difference.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I find by section 5, that his name will be removed from the share list of the company when the share warrant is issued. If it be issued to bearer and he comes back under section 3 to have it cancelled and to be reinstated, how is he to connect himself with the company again? If it is simply issued to bearer, and the name of the shareholder is stricken off the books of the company, there would be no method by which it could be reinstated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He must produce the original warrant and have it surrendered if he wishes to go back and become an ordinary shareholder. His share warrant is cancelled and returned to the company.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It seems to me the first section contemplates the issuing to bearer without giving the name at all, and I think the same idea is carried out in section 5, which provides that the names shall be struck off the book of the company. Then coming to section 3, we find he can cancel the warrant and become reinstated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But if the name is struck off and the stock is issued to bearer simply, it would be difficult for him to be reinstated. I think section 3 is entirely misplaced in this Bill. It provides for the surrender and cancellation of the share warrant, and restoration of the person's name as a shareholder. In the regular order that should come in between sections 6 and 7.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In looking at the provision of the British Columbia Act, which is identical with the section of the English Act referred to by the hon. Secretary of State, I find that there are certain safeguards in the corresponding section in the English Act which do not appear in the clauses of the Bill. The section reads as follows :

In the case of any company limited by shares——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Any company to which the Companies Act of 1902 applies.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not raise any question about that——

The company, if authorized to do so by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution, and subject to the provisions of such regulations may, &c.

Now these are safeguards which I think should be included in this Bill, because apparently under this Bill if it should become law, there is no preliminary action required on the part of the company. They are not required to make any regulations to provide for the issuing of these warrants. I think the words of the Engish Act should be inserted at this point, so as to provide that all these things should be done under regulation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So they are and they can only be done under the by-laws of the company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not say that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is done under the general regulations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am anxious to see the Bill go through, but I think it should go through in proper form, and I suggest that we insert these words from the English Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nothing can be done under our Act except by by-law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is an actual authorization of the company to do it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They cannot do anything except under a by-law any more than parliament can do anything except by statute.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—After the explanation of the hon. gentleman from Toronto, the Bill is not so obscure as it first appeared to be. As I understand it, it is for the purpose of obtaining a warrant which justifies the directors in issuing shares upon the warrant being presented. The second clause reads as follows :

2. A share warrant shall entitle the bearer of such warrant to the shares specified in it, and such shares may be transferred by the delivery of the share warrant.

The warrant, I presume, represents the money which he has paid into any bank or any place to provide for payment of the stock which he has purchased, and then upon presentation of the warrant to the company the shares are issued upon the authority of that warrant. Is that really the meaning of the clause, because I find, if you go down to the fourth clause, it disqualifies any person holding a warrant from being a director. He must first have deposited the warrant with the directors before the shares issue.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Until he elects to surrender the warrant and get a scrip certificate, he is not eligible to be a director.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to know whether it is absolutely necessary to have both scrip and share warrants. If share warrants are issued for paid up stock why should there be scrip issued in addition to them? It does not seem to me desirable that there should be two kinds of certificates afloat concerning the stock of the same company.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—They are not duplicated. There is only one or the other. The share warrant is supposed to be a temporary document issued for a temporary purpose and supplanted by the scrip certificate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Clause 3 reads :

> And the company shall be responsible for any loss incurred by any person by reason of the company entering in its books the name of any bearer of a share warrant in respect of the shares specified therein without the share warrant being surrendered and cancelled.

So that if he has deposited the share warrant, he is entitled to the shares; and the warrant after being surrendered is cancelled.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—As I have always understood it, the usual practice in companies, where stock changes hands, is for the seller of the stock to issue to the president of the company an authorization to issue the stock in the name of the party to whom he has sold, and cancelling his own holding. In this case if stock may be issued against these warrants is there not a danger that in many instances stock may be issued to the wrong party?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not at all, because the two cannot be outstanding together. It is simply giving elasticity to the system. The domestic arrangements are carried out by the companies. Many companies have special provisions in the issue of their letters patent, others have them at large under the statute.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is like an interim receipt.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—But that interim receipt is transferable from one to another.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It depends whether it is to bearer or to a person whose name is given.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—That is right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The companies whose stocks are constantly being dealt with on the exchange in Toronto and Montreal prefer to have the scrip transferable from hand to hand. If it goes into the hands of a careful man, he says : 'I intend to hold this,' and he has it registered in his name. If the scrip is lost the stock will still be his property, because it is registered. A man may hold stock for two or three days and sell it, but finally it will reach somebody's hands who will register it in his own name.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Then the stock may issue on these warrants ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—As a matter of fact, what is done now in practice is perhaps not an authorized thing. Hon. gentlemen know that there are a large number of companies where scrip is issued for wholly paid-up stock, and as was explained by the hon. Secretary of State a few minutes ago, the stock mentioned in the certificate is sold, and the certificate is handed over with the endorsation on the back in blank ; that is to say, there is a transfer on the back of the certificates with the name left blank, signed by the man who owns the stock. He hands that stock over to the purchaser, and the purchaser in turn puts it in the vault and keeps it there ; or if the bank holds it as a collateral they allow the name which is mentioned in the certificate to remain on the stock list, so that the owner of the stock will get his dividend paid to him direct by the company, although the bank holds the scrip. If the bank desire to receive the dividend, all they have to do is to fill in their own name and send it to the company, and they thereupon receive the dividend themselves. If instead of having a scrip certificate it is in the shape of a warrant, this can be done in a much easier way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But if you issue it to bearer instead of to a particular party, the holder of the warrant, no matter who he may be, can go and demand the share certificate in place of it; and it would be like a note payable to bearer, it would be payable to anybody who held it, and therefore danger might arise.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand clause 3 deals with the situation that will arise when the holder of the warrant wishes to be registered as the holder of the stock in the company. He surrenders the warrant and it is cancelled, but the framers of the Bill seem to have some fear in their minds that it would be possible that a mistake might be made, for the latter part of the clause provides that the company shall be responsible for any loss incurred by any person by reason of the company entering in its books the name of any bearer of a share warrant in respect of the shares specified therein, without the share warrant being surrendered and cancelled. It seems to contemplate the possibility of a mistake being made, and it provides that the company shall be responsible for any loss that may arise to any person in case of any such mistake being made. It contemplates the possibility of a share warrant and stock being extant at the same time for the same transaction. Why is it necessary to provide against that? If the share warrant were issued first in the name of the person who held the stock then he might transfer it as he pleased, but it would be easily connected with the stock that it represented when it came back.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Once a share warrant is issued the company will not be justified in recognizing any one unless the share warrant is properly returned and cancelled.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In other words, it simply takes the place of a receipt.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is an additional security to the holder of the warrant simply.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course all this is optional. The companies may or may not adopt it. It is simply a permissive measure. It depends altogether on the by-laws the company choose to make.

The clause was adopted.

On the third clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct attention to the fact that in the Act from which this Bill is taken there is, after the word 'dividend,' a provision which safeguards the public. The English Act says 'the bearer of the share warrant shall, subject to the regulations of the company.' Now these words 'subject to the regulations of the company' are not in the Bill. The directors should not be in a position by a mere resolution made pro hac vice to make regulations. They should be regulations of the company made by by-law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They can do nothing except by by-law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. Secretary of State say why these words are left out of the Bill? This purports to be a copy of the English Act.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Because the regulations of the company are in the articles filed at the formation of the company. We do not adopt that system. In England, the charter does not issue containing powers and refer to the Act the way it does here; the charter is simply a certificate declaring that the articles of association have been filed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would be a simple thing to say 'determined by the by-laws of the company.' Nowadays the shareholders have to be on their guard against the directors. There should be by-laws of the company under which the directors should perform these Acts. I do not think they should be allowed to do them except in that way.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The point is an important one. The directors may by an act of their own, subject a warrant-holder to inconvenience, or prescribe terms which may be harassing. If there is a by-law at all it should be sanctioned by a meeting of the stockholders. A meeting must be held every year, and if there is any regulation regarding these transfers it should be endorsed at the annual meeting of the stockholders.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend whether this share warrant would entirely relieve the shares of any charge which might be recorded against them in the books of the company? I take it under clause 2 the share warrant practically entitles the bearer to the shares, and is a certificate that the shares are paid up and may be disposed of in any way that the bearer chooses. Supposing there be a charge against the stock of the subscriber in the books of the company ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A warrant could not be issued.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let us assume that he is a debtor of the company. The Joint Stock Companies Act provides that shares, though they may be paid up, may be subject to certain charges. Under this Bill the charge against the shares would be entirely discharged and the bearer of that share warrant would have no notice thereof.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that the company may hold shares for any account. Where in the Joint Stock Companies Act is that authority given?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—In very many companies it is provided that any liability of the stockholder to the company is a first charge against his stock.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is, provided the stock is not paid up.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—No, even if the stock is paid in full, it is provided in many companies that any liability of the individual to the company is a first charge against his stock. Let me put another case. Let us assume the existence of a by-law requiring that the stock shall not be transferred without first being tendered to the directors of the company. How would it be in that case? If the company is going to issue those share warrants it must entirely clear its records of all encumbrances against the stock in the nature of charges against the transfer of the stock.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call the attention of the committee to what appears on the face of it to be a contradiction ; and as it is an important matter, I think the committee are entitled to an explanation. In the clause which we have passed it is provided that the bearer of a share warrant shall be entitled, on surrendering such warrant for cancellation, to have his name entered as a shareholder in the books of the company. Then the first paragraph of clause 5 says that on the issue of a share warrant in respect of any share or shares, the company shall strike out of its books the name of the shareholder as if he had ceased to be a shareholder. That is all right; we understand that. The warrant is issued and the holder of the warrant has ceased to stand on the books of the company, as a shareholder ; and he is entitled to be registered as a shareholder again on surrendering the warrant. What do we find at the end of clause 5 ?

> And on the surrender of a warrant, the date of such surrender shall be entered as if it were the date at which a person ceased to be a shareholder.

I find that provision in the British Columbia Act also, but I must say the contradiction between the language here and the language in the early part of the clause and clause 3 is so great that we are entitled to some explanation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The English Act makes a similar provision.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have not followed the language of the English Act all through.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have as far as possible.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph (b) of the clause now before the committee says : 'a statement of the share or shares included in the warrant' ; the English Act says, 'distinguishing each share by its number.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We do not number them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me that the latter part of this clause is contradictory to the first part of it, and contradictory also of clause 3.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then the English Act is also contradictory.

Hon. Mr FERGUSON. I have been puzzled in exactly the same way as the hon. member from Halifax. In the first part of the clause the shareholder's name is struck out, and he ceases to appear as a shareholder. He may be out two or three years, and then on surrendering his share warrant it is provided, 'the date of such surrender shall be entered as if it were the date at which the person ceased to be a shareholder.' I understand that the date at which he received the warrant is the date at which he ceased to be a shareholder; but all the time during which the warrant is out is to pass for nothing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If you had the latter date there would be an interregnum—a gap in which there was no representation.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—In clause 4 it is provided that 'the bearer of a share warrant may, if the directors so determine, be deemed to be a shareholder of the company.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would entitle him to the dividend.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes. I wish to correct a misapprehension in the mind of my hon. friend. There is not a word that I can recall in the Joint Stock Companies' Act which provides that shareholders are precluded from transferring shares by reason of any debt to the company. I may be a debtor to a company of which I am a stockholder, and unless I have given a charge on the shares or executed some document which entitles the company to hold those shares—some document outside of the Act—there is no lien on the shares in respect to the debt.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—But in companies where there is a provision of that character?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—If there is a by-law, there may be a restriction imposed. The shareholders can agree to any restriction on the transfer; they may make such restrictions as they choose, and if they choose to do that by by-law, it is another matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Surely my hon. friend's observation has been directed to such a provision as the one I have mentioned. I know it is embodied in some of the statutes.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is the Banking Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not only in the Banking Act, but in other Acts. I know it is a common practice to make stock chargeable with any debt which the stockholder may owe the company. The difficulty I see about this share warrant as provided for in the Bill—although it may be analogous to the English Act—is that it cannot be issued in a qualified way. It is an unqualified badge of ownership. The only difficulty that I see in applying the legislation to our Act as it is at present, lies in the fact that there are many qualifications, many by-laws governing the transfer of stock to the company for purchase, or tendering the stock to the directors for purchase, or notifying the company of the transfer about to be made, and so on. Now it seems to me that in order to carry this clause into operation all these qualifications must be wiped out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With great deference to my hon. friend, I venture the opinion that this share warrant will be an unqualified title of ownership free from all charges on the stock in the books of the company as long as it remains in the hands of the bearer; and it will circulate the same as a bank note.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The companies need not issue it. It is a domestic matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It will lead to a good deal of complication. I recognize that it is entirely discretionary for the company to adopt this legislation, but there is a tendency on the part of companies to adopt new legislation of this kind without taking fully into consideration the many inconveniences which may be attendant upon its operation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This legislation is introduced simply because they have a system in England of raising money on those share warrants, and they think they have greater value than our certificates of stock. They have not really. The conservative element that exists in England wants these share warrants. Our banks do not ask it. There are millions and millions of money now loaned, as the hon. senator from Toronto explained, where the party borrows on his stock, and he continues to draw the dividend. The bank at any time could intervene and register with the company, but it does not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who is empowered to issue these share warrants? If the statement made by the hon. gentleman that they can only be issued by the company be true, the argument of the hon. senator for Toronto, has no bearing whatever, because the object is to facilitate the obtaining of shares through a deposit in the banks. According to the Secretary of State they can only be issued by the company itself. If a company exists in Canada and its shares are being sold in England how are they going to issue the warrant ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—A little illustration will show how it can be worked out. Take the case of a company whose head office is in Montreal, arranging for subscription and payment of money in the Bank of Montreal, Toronto. I become an applicant for stock. As the matter stands at present, I could only get a receipt from the Bank of Montreal that I had paid so much money for so many shares of stock. That certificate of the bank is a certificate that they have received my money for that purpose, but it would not be transferable, and would not entitle any one to whom I gave it to get the shares. I might have borrowed the whole of the money, paid into the Bank of Montreal for that stock, from, say the Bank of Commerce, and I would have nothing to show them. They might say, 'we are going to lend you money on a receipt for shares, but this is not a receipt for shares.' The warrant issued by the company, and placed by them in the Bank of Montreal, entitles the bank to deliver it on receipt of so much money. That would enable the Bank of Montreal to hand me a document which would give me a right, not to get my money back, but a right to the shares ; and therefore I could transfer that document to anybody who loaned me the money, thus securing the lender for having made that advance. The importance of it is this ; to hand the money back might not be sufficient security. The stock when it is issued may be worth, on the day of its issue, a large premium. Under those circumstances, what the bank would be lending would probably be more than the par value of the shares in order to enable me to take them up, so you see it is a security like an interim receipt for a policy of either life or fire insurance. It is a security, only it is made transferable, and the bearer of it is entitled to payment instead of the man who pays for the insurance, the owner of the property. I think that will show the difference.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I have said, there is an apparent contradiction between the latter part of this clause and the first portion of it and it conflicts also with clause 3. I should like to know from the hon. Secretary of State just what it means ; does it mean that when the warrant is surrendered the person to whom the share warrant was issued ceases to be the holder, and that the name of the person surrendering it is substituted? It is a very important point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I understand it, it simply covers the gap between the issue of the original warrant, and its cancellation subsequently. I do not see that it affects anybody.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—There is no interregnum in the holding of the shares.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If that is the meaning, is it not better to make it clear ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend knows very well that persons drafting Bills like to draft them in view of what has taken place in the past. Here is an Act in England which we are following.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has not exactly copied the wording of the English Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Our Act is not based on the same principle as the English Act. Where we can use the words of the English Act we prefer to do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the hon. gentleman had better introduce the Bill and say, 'take it as it stands.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman loves to cavil at these Bills.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I object to the hon. gentleman using such language, I am not addicted to cavilling. There is reason in the objection I make ; I am not an obstructionist, and I am not given to making objections unless I conscientiously think they are reasonable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not wish to hurt the hon. gentleman's feelings, but he must remember that scarcely a Bill of this kind comes up that he does not find fault with it and criticise it. Of course he has a perfect right to do so. We draft these Bills on principles recognized by the courts and it is better to adhere to those principles. We cannot, in the haphazard way we go through these Bills, give them the time and consideration they deserve.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman objects to doing so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is always better if possible to adopt language that the courts have already passed upon and the meaning of which we know.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I wish to correct a statement I made. I find there is a provision in section 55 that the directors may decline to register a transfer, but that does not affect this question, because it would not apply until the warrants are presented and the shares are issued.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Do not the warrants represent the stock?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It would not apply to the holder of the warrant. It would only apply to shares after they are issued.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The remark made just now by the hon. Secretary of State is applicable not only to this Bill but to a good many others. He has just informed the Senate that we could not be expected in a moment to grasp the meaning of an intricate Bill of this kind. For that very reason we ought to have had the Bill some time before us, so as to enable us to read and study it and ascertain its real meaning.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear; that is quite correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman was going a little too far when he accused any senator of cavilling because he took exception to the wording of the Bill. If my hon. friend will look at the rules which govern us, he will see that he was quite out of order, because the same remarks would apply to all those who have criticised it, as well as the hon. gentleman from Halifax; and, for my part, I have no intention whatever, in any criticism I have made, of being considered a caviller. My sole object was to ascertain what the Bill meant and its effect upon the country; and I take it for granted that other gentlemen who have discussed the matter were just as sincere in their remarks and criticisms as the hon. Secretary of State could be. I object to the doctrine he lays down, that because a solicitor of certain companies has drafted a Bill, no matter how eminent he may be, when the Bill comes before the Senate we are to be precluded from discussing it and amending it, if we think proper to do so. I think my hon. friend, with a moment's reflection, will accept the interpretation I place upon the duty of senators.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sorry that I was hasty in my remarks, and I will withdraw them. I based my remarks on the fact that in adopting the clause as it now reads we were adopting the English Act, an Act which had been brought into force at least in one province—Nova Scotia. I have not looked into the legislation in other provinces; but I thought it would be unwise to depart from language which has been recognized by the courts as carrying out the views set forth in the Act. It is not a new provision at all, but based upon the Joint Stock Companies' Act, adapting it to our Companies' Act, The basis of their Companies' Act is somewhat different from ours, and therefore we have to alter the language in some few particulars; but so far as the two can be brought into harmony, Mr. Lash, the drafter, has endeavoured to do so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With all due deference to the observations of my hon. friend from Toronto—and I appreciate his knowledge of company law—I must say that I beg to differ from the interpretation which he has placed upon the application of section 55. That provides that the directors may decline to register any transfer of shares belonging to any shareholder who is indebted to the company. Let me assume this case: A man subscribes for certain shares in a company and pays for them. They are fully paid up. He is entitled to a share warrant, and after the issue of the share warrant, he becomes indebted to the company. As the law stands to-day, those shares are chargeable with the indebtedness, but under the proposed provision he, with the share warrant in his hand, may transfer his shares by reason of being the holder of the share warrant, entirely irrespective of the claim of the company in respect of that stock, because, under clause 2 of the Bill, a share warrant shall entitle the bearer of such share warrant to the shares specified in it, and such shares may be transferred by the delivery of the share warrant; so that he transfers the shares entirely irrespective of the company. There is no question at all, therefore—and I think it must be apparent to hon. gentlemen who look at the statute—that the right of the company in respect of the indebtedness is gone.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to say a word with respect to the view the hon. Secretary of State takes, and which he often takes, with regard to Bills which come before the House. He has taken us into his confidence and told us that this Bill was drafted by Mr. Lash, and that that is a sufficient reason why no senator should criticise his work.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I qualified it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was told I was cavilling. No one will question the astuteness of Mr. Lash, but in what capacity is he acting? He represents the views of the directors of a company who wish to do certain things. We do not represent those views. We are supposed to represent the shareholders and the public at large. And now the hon. gentleman has undertaken to say that the language of the English Act has been copied as far as it can be. I wish to call attention to one very serious point—I have already called attention to one or two points when dealing with another matter—in which the language of the English Act has been departed from, and with the sole purpose of enabling the directors to do just as they please, without any restriction. In clause 4 we are told that the bearer of a share warrant may, if the directors so determine, be deemed to be a shareholder of the company and qualified to vote at a meeting. If the persons who hold share warrants are friends of the directors and prepared to support the directors' views at a meeting, then the directors can declare that they are entitled to vote. I do not think that is correct or sound legislation. What does the English Act say? 'The bearer of a share warrant may, if the regulations of the company so provide be deemed to be a member of the company;' but the matter is not left to the discretion of the directors at a meeting of their own. It is useless, of course, to move any amendment, because we have been told that amendments are not to be accepted; but I must protest against this style of legislation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT. The whole thing is based upon the act of the company. The company must authorize all this in the beginning. They must pass by-laws. You could not call a meeting of shareholders for every transfer of shares or share warrants. The directors cannot act on their mere ipse dixit. They must do everything by by-law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. Have not those companies to which my hon. friend refers special charters?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, they are all under the Joint Stock Companies' Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have they not special charters?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The concession they ask might easily be embodied in an amendment to their Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When companies apply for charters, the Act authorizes the Secretary of State to insert conditions,—for instance, that condition to which the hon. gentleman refers, that the shares should not be transferred without consent being obtained; or the condition that in the event of a party wishing to dispose of his shares he must first offer them to a member of the company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend labours under a misapprehension with reference to the restriction which I pointed out; that is part of the Joint Stock Companies' Act. So that my hon. friend the Secretary of State would have no authority either to add to or take from the letters patent issued under this Act, or under section 55.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct attention to section 68 of the Joint Stock Companies' Act which reads as follows :

The directors of the company may administer the affairs of the company in all things and make or cause to be made for the company any description of contract which the company may by law enter into.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I would not dare attempt to criticise this Act. I read it over carefully to-day, and I came to the conclusion in my simplicity that it is a very dangerous thing. I may be mistaken ; the Act may have worked very well in England; but I am very much afraid if you import its provisions into Canada, very great evils and injustice may be done under it. I entirely agree with the remarks of the ex-Speaker. The hon. Secretary of State said that they had followed the English Act closely. Now, it appears that in the matter of dealing with shares it is referred to the directors. They may do as they please. If the man who holds the warrant is not in accord with their policy they may, perhaps, prevent his taking part in the election of directors. If he is in sympathy with them, they may at once place him in a position so that he can vote at a meeting for the election of directors. It may be done in this way in England, but in England they do things differently from what is done on this side of the water ; and I am afraid if Canadians Americanize the provisions of this Act by taking advantages such as it may give them, very great evils may result.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is altogether permissive. It can only be adopted at a general meeting of shareholders. The directors are bound to carry out the provisions the shareholders may enact.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—At the annual meeting of any joint stock company the directors will secure from the meeting the necessary by-laws and provisions that they want. The stockholders may not for the moment have any suspicion as to the reason for their asking such powers. They get the authority from the stockholders at the annual meeting, and then they turn round and do just what has been pointed out by the ex-Speaker. They may interfere with the rights of a man who holds one of these warrants. Whose interest was Mr. Lash considering when he inserted those words to which attention has been called ? He had the English Act before him. If the English Act was perfect in its form, and contained everything necessary in a matter of this kind, why did Mr. Lash put all this power in the hands of the directors in place of having it sanctioned by the shareholders?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not fair to make such a criticism. He is simply applying the English Act to the Joint Stock Companies' Act of Canada.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I entirely accept the statement of the hon. Secretary of State. I would not insinuate that any attempt was made on his part to put into the hands of the party in power anything which would do any harm, but I am afraid of the results of this measure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was this Bill submitted to the Justice Department ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was submitted to a meeting of Council before the Bill was introduced, and the Minister of Justice will have an opportunity of examining it when it goes to the House of Commons. I will call his attention to it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That implies that there is some doubt about it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. Mr. Cox cabled to the premier and to me that they were very anxious about it and that it would help a number of financial transactions if amendments were made to the Joint Stock Companies' Act to bring it more in harmony with the English Act.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 7,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause is not germane to the main subject of this Bill. It has been introduced because it was in the Bill amending the Companies Act last year, and it was struck out at that time in the other House. Some gentleman thought there was an object in putting it in, in view of possible contracts with regard to the Transcontinental Railway. Very many companies which have been incorporated claim the right to contract for various public works, and there has been a doubt as to whether the construction of railways is a proper matter for companies to be authorized to undertake. Of course the policy of the Companies Act when passed was that the working of railways should not be within its powers. I thought the House would have no objection to the word 'construction' being inserted. Contracts are constantly taken by companies for ties and rock work and construction of one kind and another; and I do not see any possible objection.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is that intended simply to apply to contracting companies? It seems to me, from the very wide expressions of the clause, it would give power to any company to enter upon contracts, entirely irrespective of its being a contracting company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The clause says:

3. Nothing in this section, or in any charter or letters patent heretofore or hereafter issued, shall be deemed to prevent any company to which this Act applies from acting.

'This Act' applies to all companies incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act. I venture to say this includes all companies incorporated under that Act. It might come as a surprise to some trading company to find that it was empowered to construct railways, telegraph lines and telephone lines.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no. I may say that this Bill was drafted by Mr. Creighton.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not prepared to say that Mr. Creighton is infallible in the drafting of Acts of parliament. It depends entirely on what his instructions were; but this applies to all companies incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act. It says so expressly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Every company must have its powers expressly defined in the letters patent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the Bill negatives the limitations of companies incorporated under this Act, and says that 'nothing in this section or in any charter or letters patent heretofore or hereafter issued, shall be deemed to prevent.' Notwithstanding the restrictions placed upon any company, yet the company shall have power to enter upon contracts for construction, &c.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman will note the object of wording it in that way. If he will refer to section 5 of the Act he will see that it negatives the presumption that the word 'construction' there would prevent the Secretary of State from issuing letters patent where the work of the company was limited entirely to construction. The language is 'construction and working,' and it was thought wise to make it clear. Companies have been incorporated for the construction of works, and have carried them on; but there has always been a doubt in my mind because the word 'construction' if given its full interpretation, might include those works. But it is easily remedied.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The simpler way would be to amend clause 5 by striking out the words 'construction and' before the word 'working.' Section 5 expressly declares that these charters shall be granted for any of the purposes within the legislative authority of parliament, except the construction and working of railways, &c.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I see no objection to wording it in that way.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not know that that would suit the case either. I call attention to the fact that if you strike out the word 'construction' in section 5, more will be accomplished perhaps than we intend. That word was inserted, not with the intention of providing respecting companies which are purely construction companies, but it was intended to relate to the issue of a charter to any company authorized to construct and operate a railway. Section 5 provides that the Secretary of State may grant charters to a certain number of people to become a body corporate for any purpose except the construction of a railway and the operation thereof. That does not mean construction in the sense in which we use that word, or in the sense in which it is intended by the amendment here. It is for the incorporation of a railway company, and I think striking out those words would have the effect of authorizing letters patent to be issued for the construction of a railway company, which I do not think is what is intended.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is another feature which I would point out. It not only widens the Act, but it practically issues supplementary letters patent to all companies that already have been incorporated under the Act conveying those additional powers. I could very well conceive of a company organized for carrying out certain limited objects, and stock being subscribed in that company which the stockholders would not have subscribed if they knew that the company were to be permitted to enter upon such a speculative venture as railway, telegraph and telephone construction. That converts the company into a peculiarly speculative company, and all the safeguards of limitation are at once removed from existing companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not give it that interpretation. There is a limitation of their powers specifically set forth. This would not apply to all companies. Under the Companies' Act companies are being incorporated all the time for a great variety of purposes, and it surely would not be construed by a court that the provision would be applied to a company carrying on a hardware business. It would not be contemplated this clause was going to apply to that kind of company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What object had you in view when you proposed to grant supplementary powers to companies already in existence to enter upon highly speculative undertakings ? If it was simply an amendment to the Act, one might forbear criticising it ; but it gives these powers to existing companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A number of companies already have the power. The lawyers have interpreted it differently. They say the language of section 5 has no reference to the work of constructing a railway; that it could not be contended that if a company chooses to take a contract for removing a certain amount of earth or rock for instance, or for furnishing ties, it was intended by parliament that they should be excluded from the enjoyment of those powers if they were so authorized under letters patent. The companies have been willing to take their charters with that understanding. I said, 'Well it is a matter for the courts to decide ; I have no objection to your doing it.' I think that the principle of the Act of parliament was not to preclude companies from doing work of that kind, so long as they had nothing to do with the operating of railways. This clause was intended to apply to companies already chartered to do that kind of work, under the belief that that was the proper interpretation to be put upon section 5.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should say that we could not presuppose that companies have been incorporated with the intention of entering upon railway, telegraph and telephone construction in view of the express restriction placed upon the incorporation of such companies under section 5. Surely it could not have been contemplated that those companies should exercise such powers, because the restriction is clearly expressed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But it is cumulative. It is 'construction and working.' The carrying out of public works was surely never intended to be excluded from the powers an incorporated company might assume.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that we strike clause 7 out of the Bill, and substitute the following : "The words 'construction and' in the 9th line of the first subsection of section 5 of the Companies' Act, 1902, are stricken out. The next preceding subsection shall be construed as if it were part of such section as originally enacted."

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That would be dangerous. It would authorize a joint stock company to be incorporated to construct a railway.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is just what the hon. Secretary of State says. He said that the object was to allow companies to contract for the construction of railways, and that is just what this amendment does, and nothing more.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I propose to add the words, 'If authorized under its charter.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not going to move an amendment. I understood the hon. gentleman to accept my suggestion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call attention to the wording of the clause. What is the object of this Bill ? The object, as I understand it, is to facilitate the issuing of share warrants.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause 7 is not germane to it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The object is to enable those who are floating companies to sell their shares. It has no reference whatever to the construction of railways or anything else, and yet this clause under consideration, says :

3. Nothing in this section, or in any charter or letters patent heretofore or herafter issued, shall be deemed to prevent any company to which this Act applies from acting as a contractor in railway, telegraph or telephone construction.

Now this Act does not apply to railways, as I understand it. The Bill is for one purpose, to facilitate the transfer of stock. How in the world can this clause be inserted in this Bill at all ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From time to time we have had to amend the Companies' Act. Last session we amended it in several particulars that were not immediately connected. This is one amendment which we passed in this Chamber after full discussion. It went to the other House late in the session, and some one there took exception to it. Whoever had charge of the Bill, in order to get it through, consented to let this drop, because it was hinted that it was to give some huge company an opportunity to contract for work on the Transcontinental Railway. There was no such object in view, and the clause was struck out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It may be possible that the wording may receive some other interpretation, that it would be, not the Act under consideration, but the Companies' Act of 1902. If that be the case why not change it so as to make it plain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is all under the Companies' Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a Bill to amend the Companies' Act generally, and it is perfectly legitimate to insert this provision.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I venture to suggest that perhaps this language would express what we are trying to get at: 'Nothing in this section or in any charter or letters patent heretofore or hereafter issued shall be deemed to prevent any company to which this Act applies from contracting with any company, or acting as contractors for the construction or equipment of a railway, or a telegraph or telephone line or system.' That makes it definite.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Wherein is there any difference between the two ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—One is suggested by the hon. gentleman from Toronto; the other by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I should like to know what particular advantage is to be derived from inserting the words 'contracting.'

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—You authorize them to enter into a contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the following words be added to the clause 'if authorized by its charter.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON. This clause provides that nothing in this section, or in any charter or letters patent heretofore or hereafter issued, shall prevent any company acting as a contractor, &c. Now we are providing that the charter shall not prevent them doing so. Is it not an extraordinary thing for us to give a company power to do something which its charter prevents it from doing ? Why should that clause be passed at all ? I can understand why we should legislate to enable companies chartered under the Companies Act to become contractors for railway or telegraph construction, but not in violation of their charter. Now you propose to give them the power notwithstanding their charter. I could understand giving them a charter to do that, but that we should arm any company, if it has a charter for any purpose whatever, with power to construct railways, telegraph and telephone lines, notwithstanding anything in their charter, seems strange legislation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, we will take that out. The reason is this : parties have applied from time to time for charters proposing to undertake the construction of railways and public works of all kinds ; and when I have suggested that there is a doubt whether under section 5 the Secretary of State has the power to grant such charter, they have claimed that there could not be any doubt, because some legal authority has given the opinion that section 5 can only apply where construction and operation go together, but that so far as construction only is concerned, parliament did not intend to prevent charters being issued for mere construction works. So they have taken their charter, knowing that it was subject to doubt, and it is desired to remove that doubt. I do not think it is important, and I have no objection to striking out the words 'or in any charter or letters patent heretofore or hereafter issued.'

The clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The reason I asked if this Bill had been submitted to the Minister of Justice, was because of something which occurred quite recently in the House of Commons, and which I did not wish to see repeated in the Senate. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries introduced a Bill affecting some matters of quarantine, and after discussing it the Minister of Justice gave it the most violent and unmistakable opposition. Here was one minister of the cabinet combatting the other. One must come to the conclusion under the circumstances that Mr. Préfontaine's Bill had not been submitted to Council. If it had been, the Minister of Justice would have been in a position to suggest the changes and amendments in Council, and not publicly in the House of Commons. It is not an unusual occurrence; it has happened in this House a number of times under previous leaders as well as under the present leader; and it suggested itself to me to ask the hon. gentleman whether this had been brought under the notice of the Minister of Justice, so that when it gets to the House of Commons we will not have the Minister of Justice finding fault with what the hon. Secretary of State has done here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will have the Bill submittted to the Department of Justice to be carefully examined before it goes down to the other House. The particular attention of the Minister of Justice was not called to it. I do not know whether he was present at the time the discussion took place or not, but I think the suggestion is a good one; and I will have the Bill sent to the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Might I ask the hon. Secretary of State if he has taken note of a point I made some time ago in this discussion as to the form of the Bill, and the place in which clause 3 stands? It may not affect the operation of the law, but I think in passing Bills here, we should see that they are symmetrical. It seems to me that the clause which deals with the issue of warrants should come first, then what happens while they are extant, and then in the proper order would come the section which deals with the surrender and cancellation of the warrant. It would seem to me more symmetrical if clause 3 were made clause 7.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the matter. They may understand why the English Act is in that form and order.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We who are familiar with legislation know that sometimes in amending an Act a section is put in the wrong place. We are making a new Act for Canada, and if clause 3 ought to be in another part of the Bill we should put it there and have the Act brought into symmetrical form, not following the errors and blunders of other people.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the department to it at once, and have them go over it carefully.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Is it the intention of the hon. Secretary of State, after passing this Bill in the Senate, to submit it to the Minister of Justice, and if he does not find fault with it, then to send it to the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; before this Bill is read a third time I will ask the Minister of Justice to pronounce upon it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (MM) An Act to amend the Acts respecting naturalization and aliens.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: This Bill has been asked for by a number of gentlemen who represent constituencies in the Northwest. They complain that the present method involves considerable delay, and delay means expense; and that, as the number of persons desiring to be naturalized is very large, the methods should be simplified as far as possible. That is the whole object of the amendment.

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I was absent yesterday when this Bill came before the House. The Bill is certainly a move in the right direction. The law as it stands, it appears to me, was made more for the benefit of the lawyers than for the benefit of the people. We should make the naturalization of aliens, especially the financial part of it, as easy for the people as possible. Under the law, before it was amended last year, any person who wished to become naturalized could go to the nearest justice of the peace and take the necessary affidavit. The justice of the peace certified that he had taken the affidavits and handed them to the judge. The judge went over the application and, if he approved, it was handed to the clerk. The clerk made out the certificate and handed it to the alien who wished to become naturalized, and that ended the whole process. It cost the alien $1.25. Under the amendment, by which the alien is forced to have a certificate posted up in the court or in the clerk's office, as it will be now, it means great delay. In the large districts of the Northwest the judge is not at home the greater part of the time. Take the case of the territory of Mackenzie. After the alien gets his certificate it has to be sent to the judge to get the judge's permission to have it posted up in the court. That necessitates the applicant's employing a solicitor, because he may be a couple of hundred miles distant from the court. After it is posted in the court, the judge has to pass on it. It necessitates an expense of $6 or $7 or $8 to become naturalized, and I believe it is not the desire of this parliament that people should be put to so much expense. If an alien goes to a justice of the peace, who is supposed to be a respectable man, and takes the necessary affidavit, and that justice of the peace certifies that everything was done in proper form and hands the application to the judge, the judge, without any more expense or delay, should be able to give a certificate to that man if he is to be naturalized. I do not quite understand the object of posting these certificates in the court. It would appear to be in the interest of the state that aliens should become properly naturalized. The judge is acting in the interest of the state, and if he does not consider the certificate proper he will not pass on it, but the idea of forcing people to send those certificates and employ a lawyer to look after their interest seems unreasonable. It sometimes takes six or eight weeks before a man gets his naturalization papers. Supposing an alien going into that country finds that he requires a certain amount of money to purchase stock or pay liabilities, or that he requires to get a loan on his homestead; he cannot get the patent for his land until he becomes naturalized. Under the old system he could get naturalized in a few hours and close out his transaction. Now if he wants to become naturalized, it takes five or six weeks; and he may lose his opportunity to procure money through the delay. I cannot see the sense or benefit of such legislation. This Bill is a step in the right direction for this reason: It says before presentation to the judge the certificate shall be filed with the clerk of the Supreme Court. That does away with one objection. The alien, after getting a certificate from the justice of the peace, can hang it up in the court without having to ask the judge's permission. In our country sometimes the judge is not more than two or three days in the month at home. Several people want to get naturalized; they get their certificates, but cannot find the judge to get permission to post them in the court. This Act does away with that objectionable feature, because it allows the alien or his representative to post up the certificate for two weeks. Parties living in a district like Yorkton can, under this Bill, post their certificates in the deputy clerk's office at home, and it provides also that the deputy clerk, after the two weeks are up, shall send them to the judge, who will pass upon them and send them back. The only objectionable feature in this Bill is that we are giving the judge too much power to delay. Under the old Act the day, Wednesday, was mentioned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The judge may not be there on the Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, it is true, he might not be there. Would it not be better to have it read, 'on the earliest convenient day, not later than the Wednesday following,' so that we would be sure that the judge would deal with the matter within a reasonable time. The judge is away very often and does not bother himself about these things, but if he knew those certificates were coming up very often, he would be in a position to deal with them. The judge should not be allowed to put it off from day to day. With reference to the change in the oath of allegiance, I do not see the force of that provision.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was thought, in order to identify the party, he should name the country from which he came. That is the only point.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—There would be no objection to that. Taking it all in all, this Bill is an improvement on the Act of last year, but I repeat that I think the Act of last year was a mistake. I see no sense in putting people to a lot of expense in becoming citizens. We do not want to throw obstructions in the way of their becoming citizens, forcing them to employ lawyers when there is no necessity for it. If a justice of the peace takes the affidavit, and certifies to it, and it goes before the judge and he passes on it, that is the shortest way ; and it would be a great improvement on the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I regret to find my hon. friend from Prince Albert in such a critical and censorious state of mind, and particularly in the attack he has made on the government's policy of safeguarding the Act respecting naturalization. I must congratulate the government on adopting a procedure of this kind, so as to prevent any abuse of the privilege of naturalization. I have no hesitation in saying that under the old procedure hundreds were naturalized who had not the right to citizenship. Personally I should like to see the most restrictive safeguards surrounding naturalization. If aliens come to this country from a foreign land they should not only be called upon to establish their qualification for naturalization, but as I said, last year, when the Act was introduced, I should be in favour of an educational qualification being provided in the Act, so as to warrant our securing a class of citizens exercising the franchise who would possess the necessary intelligence to do so. My hon. friend complains very grievously of aliens having to pay as much as $5 or $6 for naturalization. It seems to me if an alien comes to this country and avails himself of all the advantages of becoming a British subject, including all the advantages which are incident to settlement in the Northwest Territory—such, for instance, as homesteading 160 acres of land—if he is not willing to pay the costs incidental to naturalization papers, he certainly shows a lack of appreciation of all the advantages and privileges of becoming a British subject. I think this legislation is in the right direction and instead of objecting thereto, I am strongly in favour of the government, providing the most restrictive safeguards to insure the western country from the danger of extending all the advantages of citizenship to those who may not be qualified therefor. The only objection in a general way which I have to this Bill is that it shortens the time for the posting up of the certificate. Under the Act of 1903, three weeks were given for the posting of the certificate. I notice that the time has been shortened to two weeks. It seems to me that with an amendment restoring the period of three weeks, the Bill would be acceptable. I might say furthermore, with reference to the criticism made by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Hon. Mr. Davis) as to there being no limitation placed upon the time for the judge to act, I should be in favour of providing that he should take up the matter within the first week after the papers were forwarded to him. The Act is a little general in its phraseology in regard to the obligation cast upon the judge as to his appointing a convenient time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The earliest convenient time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is a very comprehensive term. What some judges regard as the earliest convenient time might not be regarded by their brother judges as an equally convenient time. It seems to me that if they were limited to a certain number of days to act under subsection (e), it would be very much more satisfactory, and would insure speedier action being taken.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am sorry to hear the hon. gentleman from Calgary making the statement he has just made. He said the old Act was abused. I might draw his attention to the fact that that is a reflection on the Lieutenant Governor for appointing men who would take affidavits of that kind as magistrates. It is a reflection on a large body of citizens in the Northwest Territories who are acting as magistrates, and a reflection also on a large and intelligent body of aliens who come to this country, to say that they are in such a hurry that they would commit perjury. It would be a reflection on my learned friend, if he knows of cases of aliens committing perjury, that he did not prosecute them according to law. If my hon. friend knew of any such thing taking place in his part of the country it was his duty as a citizen to see that the law was enforced and that these people were prosecuted for a breach of the law. I know of no breach of the law in my district. The magistrates appointed by the different Lieutenant Governors for the last fifteen or twenty years have been a creditable body of men who would not lend themselves to such a thing, and would not allow a man to do anything of the kind. They certainly would not sign a certificate and hand it to a judge, trying to mislead him with reference to the naturalization of any of these people. I have also to say, from my knowledge of the people who come into the country, that they compare favourably with the people we now have. I have never known a man who wanted to become naturalized until he had been long enough in the country to take advantage of the Naturalization Act. My hon. friend may have known some, he may have had a different class of people in his part of the country. I can assure him that nothing of the kind has taken place in our district. I say again that it is a reflection not only upon the Lieutenant Governor for appointing magistrates—and, as my hon. friend says, it is a thankless position—but it is a reflection on the magistrates and a reflection on a large number of aliens coming into this country, to say that they would rush in and take certain oaths which would amount to nothing less than perjury.

The old Act worked splendidly. We never had any complaints from the Conservative party and if my hon. friend thinks that politics enter into this matter I may tell him that politics should not enter into the naturalization of aliens. It is a matter in which no person except the state is interested. The magistrates are there protecting the state. Surely we can have confidence in the magistrates and in the judge and a certain amount of confidence in the people who are coming into the country that they would not, for the sake of getting naturalized a week or a month before the proper time, commit perjury.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is manifestly astray, or unable to appreciate the provisions of the old Act with reference to naturalization; and that is probably largely accountable for the censorious remarks to which he has given utterance. The justice of the peace took the affidavit under the old Act, and consequently the judge had nothing to do with the matter other than issuing the certificate of naturalization upon the affidavit which had been taken by the justice of the peace. Any reflections which my hon. friend has chosen to cast upon me apply with much greater intensity to the government of which he is a faithful follower. If this government in 1903 considered it advisable to depart from the slipshod procedure which existed previous to that date, and to surround the proceedings of naturalization with all the safeguards embodied in the Act of 1903, it must have been for some very good reason. I apprehend this government does not legislate upon a matter of this character without having some good grounds for departing from the provisions of the old Act, particularly in the case of an Act which had been on the statute-book for a good many years. If this government loses all confidence in the acts of the justices of the peace and the various other officials to whom my hon. friend has alluded in glowing terms, I hope he will not cast aspersions upon me. I have only been endorsing the government on the stand they have taken in surrounding the Act with these safeguards.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I assume this Bill will not become law until the close of the session, and that at the same time the Bill constituting the two new provinces will become law. In that case the Territories which will constitute these two provinces will cease to be a portion of the Northwest Territories.

And it occurs to me that the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill might ascertain whether in the opinion of the Department of Justice it might not be better, in order to avoid any possible question, to insert at the beginning of this Bill the words 'in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Northwest Territories.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Provision is made in the Bills which are being introduced that all the procedure in force in the Northwest Territories should continue in the present form.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Is this not a public Bill which applies to the whole Dominion ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, section 5 applies to the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The matter was largely discussed as to the retention of the present machinery; and until the new legislatures are organized the intention is that the present form of legislation shall continue. I think it might lead to embarrassment if we departed from that stand.

The subclause was adopted.

On subclause (b),

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—With reference to the expense, you order the clerk of the court to gather a lot of certificates up in his office and to transmit them to the judge. Who is to pay the expense of the transmission ? Does it come out of the aliens' pocket ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT— Under section 36 of the Naturalization Act the clerk of the court from which the certificate is issued shall be entitled to receive from the person naturalized the sum of 25 cents, and no further sum is payable in respect to such certificate. The taking of the oath is under an Order in Council. There are regulations which authorize the magistrate to receive 40 cents. At all events that is under the control of the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Do not force the oath to be taken before the court. Any magistrate can take the oath.

The subclause was adopted.

On subclause (e),

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to ask the leader of the House, a question with reference to those certificates. Take the town of Battleford ; there is a deputy clerk there and there are three or four hundred naturalization papers posted in his office. He receives 25 cents for his work and pays the postage out of that. They are sent to the judge. What provision is there for the judge returning those certificates ? Is he going to put his hand in his pocket and pay for it himself ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The parties have incidental expenses which are paid by the department. The making up of the returns is paid for by the department. The returns come to the Department of State and the general expenses not provided for by the Act are under the authority of the Governor in Council. It is open to a revision at any time.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Has the hon. leader of the House done anything with reference to subsection (e) ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman from Calgary also called my attention to that subclause. I have no objection to making it shorter. It was my own suggestion to make it read, 'the earliest convenient day.' We might say, 'within five days following the receipt by the judge.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A week might be a short enough time.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to ask, supposing certificates are hung up in Battleford, and are afterwards transmitted to the judge in Prince Albert. If some person protests, how is the protest to be dealt with ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We cannot define how he shall take it. It is left to his own discretion. You cannot define all those particulars.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Supposing the certificates are hung up in the deputy clerk's office in Battleford, and they are transmitted to Prince Albert by the deputy clerk with a protest, how is he to put in the protest ? Is it to be by affidavit or by evidence ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It depends upon the character of the protest that may be made. The party may say, 'I know this man. He only came to Canada this year and he is not entitled to vote,' and he may have some other reason to set forth.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED — Subclause (c) states that any one may file with the clerk of the court a written notice of objection to the naturalization of the subject, stating the grounds of such objection.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Is the judge of the court going to accept the written objection of some person against the oath of the party applying?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, he brings the parties before him.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Brings people three hundred miles to give evidence?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, the object of the Act is to provide that wherever there is a deputy clerk the matter can be disposed of.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I understand that. Where is he going to dispose of it? He may have to go up to Battleford to dispose of it. I do not see how we are going to deal with these protests. How are you going to get your evidence there?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Can not you trust the members representing the territory in the House of Commons, to deal with these details?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I know as a matter of fact that on one occasion during last year certain gentlemen put in bogus protests and after the election was over they laughed at the people who had been prevented from getting the naturalization papers and said: 'Oh we stopped them,' but they had a right to get the papers nevertheless.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We must leave some discretion in the hands of the judge; we cannot discriminate. It would take a dozen pages to lay down the regulations my hon. friend suggests as to how the matter is to be inquired into. It must be left entirely to the judge; and it is to be presumed he will favour the applicant for naturalization. The judge may say, 'this objection is urged from ill feeling or some cause of that kind.' The judge has an interest in naturalizing the people who come before him.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If any one sends in a bogus protest against the naturalization of an alien he should be made to pay the expense the alien is put to in regard to that protest.

The subclause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON, from the committee, reported the Bill with one amendment, which was concurred in.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday the 27th June, at 3 o'clock.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called,

By the Hon. Mr. Cloran:—

That the Senate give instructions to the proper officer of this honourable House to pay the balance of accounts due to the Counsel-at-Law and expert witness for services rendered by them to the Special Committee appointed during the last session of the Senate, to investigate the affairs in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In view of the fact that I have not all the documents necessary to enable me to make this motion, I ask that it stand until Thursday next.

The motion was allowed to stand.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The motion of which I have given notice, if passed, will probably facilitate the Senate's dealing with the motion which the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) has placed on the order paper. I desire to have laid officially before this House a copy of the accounts certified to by the committee, and presented to this House, for payment of the counsel and expert witness examined during the last session of parliament. I hold in my hand a copy of the document, but as that is not official, I could hardly ask the House to adjudicate upon it. When we have the original paper before us we shall be able to discuss this unfortunate affair fully. I therefore beg to move that a copy of the account of the counsel and the expert witness as certified to by the chairman of the Select Special Committee appointed last session to investigate the position of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, in Canada, be produced.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPRISONMENT OF STOWAWAYS.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to make a slight correction in the statement which I made a few days ago, in regard to the expenses of stowaways—or, as we call them in Montreal, wharf rats—when imprisoned in that city. I stated that these expenses were charged to the province of Quebec, but since that time the city attorney of Montreal, Mr. Ethier, has called my attention to the fact that such is not the case. It appears that all the expenses connected with the arrest of these persons and their keep while detained in prison, are charged to the city of Montreal. I wish to make this correction because the hon. Secretary of State promised, when I brought the matter up in the House, that he would lay the matter before the proper department, and I have no doubt that when he came to do so, the officers of the department would at once point out that the statement I then made was not in accordance with the facts. For this reason I wish to make it plain that the expenses connected with the imprisonment of these stowaways are not charged to the province of Quebec as a whole, but to the city of Montreal. This, however, makes the case still more serious and grievous.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (NN), An Act to amend the Companies Act, 1902. He said: It will be in the recollection of members who were present at the sitting of the House on the last day before the adjournment, that I was asked to submit this Bill to the Department of Justice and obtain any expression of opinion which that department might think proper to give, as to the propriety and suitability of the amendments. I therefore wrote the following letter:—

June 19, 1905.

Dear Mr. Fitzpatrick,—At the instance of Senator Cox, who is now in England, and with the approval of the Privy Council, I introduced a Bill in the Senate (NN), copy of which I inclose, adopting certain clauses of the English Companies Act as amendments to the Companies' Act of 1902.

In Canada when all calls have been paid the usual practice is to issue a certificate to the shareholder setting forth the number of shares of paid-up stock of which he is the holder.

In England they have a practice of issuing what is known as a warrant, with the seal of the company affixed, stating that the bearer is entitled to the number of shares of stock specified therein, and Senator Cox states it will facilitate investments in Canadian companies if the latter are authorized to issue share warrants.

Mr. Lash has drafted the inclosed Bill amending the Companies Act in the direction sought. In order, however, to ascertain wherein the language of the draft differs from the English Act, I have had the variations noted in the copy with red ink, which I also inclose. Will you kindly have it examined and note whether the amendments can be prudently adopted in the Companies' Act, 1902.

Section 7 is an amendment I have myself suggested in order to enable companies chartered for that purpose to take contracts for the building of railways, telegraphs and telephones. The contractors would, of course, have no power to operate or work railways, telegraphs or telephones.

To that letter I received the following reply:—

Ottawa, June 21, 1905.

Dear Mr. Scott,—Referring to your letter of the 19th instant, I return herewith Bill (NN) of the Senate 'to amend the Companies Act, 1902,' and beg to state that I see no reason to doubt that the amendments with regard to share warrants may be safely adopted. These amendments are to the same effect as the provisions dealing with the same subject in the imperial statutes, and the latter, consisting of sections 27 to 36 of the Companies Act of 1867, have been in force for nearly forty years. The same provisions are also contained in the British Columbia Act as sections 65 to 70 of chapter 44 of the Revised Statutes of 1897, and Nova Scotia has adopted them as well. See the statutes of that province of 1902, chapter 8, sections 3 to 9.

With regard to Mr. Power's criticism of clause 5, it would appear to me, as at present advised, that the last three lines of that clause may not be adapted to our Companies' Act. They are taken from the corresponding provision of the Imperial Act, and have reference there to the form of the 'register of members' prescribed by the English legislation, in which there is required to be entered, amongst other particulars, 'the date at which any person ceased to be a member' (Act of 1862, section 25). There does not seem to be any such requirement under our Act. (See Act of 1902, section 74).

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (II) An Act for the relief of Agnes Hedevig Helga Salusbury Trelawney.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (169) An Act to amend the Act respecting the Royal Military College.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When this Bill was up for second reading my hon. friend opposite asked for the salary at present enjoyed by the officer whose salary is fixed by subsection 3. I find in the last return from the Department of Militia and Defence that the commandant's salary is $3,163.33, so that the Bill practically adds very little, merely bringing it up to $3,200.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has any decision been arrived at with a view to increasing the salaries of the other professors?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The policy of former governments and also of this government has been to fix the salaries by statute, not leaving it optional with the Governor in Council to increase or decrease them. This is a departure from the usual practice. I do not wish to be understood as objecting to this small increase to the commandant. I think the salaries are quite small enough, and I have no doubt if it is the intention to increase the salaries of the other officials proportionately, it would not be objectionable; still I disapprove of the policy laid down here of leaving the whole power in the hands of the government. That has not been the policy in the past in this or the other departments, in dealing with officials outside of Ottawa. However, I am not objecting to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it follows the line of the statute introduced when my hon. friend was in the government. The Act of 1893 provides that 'the salary of the commandant shall not exceed $3,200 a year.' I do not know why the department has been paying him less. There must have been a deduction for some reason. Then I find that it is also provided that 'the Governor in Council may adjust the salaries of the staff,' which is practically following the former statute. I notice that the Minister of Militia, when introducing the measure, made the statement that the total amount of salaries would be very slightly increased.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I should like to know whether the military commandant at Kingston gets any other perquisites besides his salary. I remember a time when it was customary to supply coal to the commandant's house, as well as to pay street car fares and other such things. I should like to know if that has been discontinued.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know he has a house, but I am not aware as to the smaller details.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman can get the information in the Auditor General's Report.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I do not study that as much as I used to.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

PORT AND PILOTAGE DISTRICT OF QUEBEC BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (171), An Act respecting the Port and Pilotage District of Quebec. He said: This is a Bill of one clause, which proposes to vest in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the pilotage authority of the district of Quebec, and the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec are to cease to be the pilotage authorities. The minister is substituted with this stipulation and condition, that nothing in this Act shall authorize him to sit as a tribunal for the trial of offences of which pilots may be accused before the pilotage authority.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD, (B.C.)—Who will examine pilots, and do the work that is done now by the Harbour Commissioners?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will not interfere with the examination of pilots in any way. It simply vests the power over the pilots in the minister instead of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How can the department here supervise the harbour of Quebec without having agents at Quebec. I do not like this Bill at all; it is based on a wrong principle.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to give further explanations when we go into committee to-morrow. I may say that it is not alone, so far as Quebec is concerned. The minister has control over pilots in other localities; for instance, the Saguenay pilots are under his control.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it is due to the House that my hon. friend should state why this very serious change is made. His explanation simply extends to the character of the change, which is very evident from the Bill itself. It proposes to vest in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries all the powers in regard to pilotage authority hitherto vested in the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec. Do the pilotage commissioners, or the mercantile community, ask for this change? Why is it made? There may be good reasons for the change, but they have not been stated, and I think we should know what they are.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the next stage of the Bill I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend further information. The object is to secure greater efficiency. It was considered that the authority of the minister at Ottawa would obtain reforms more readily than by leaving the matter entirely in the hands of the local authorities.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one feature of the proposed legislation to which attention should, I think, be directed; that is the proviso at the end of clause 2:—

> But the said minister may, in any case not provided for by the Shipping Casualties Act, 1901, and amendments thereto, designate a tribunal or officer to try any such offence.

The minister is not to try the offence himself, but is to appoint an officer to do it. There should be some permanent provision made by parliament for the appointment of a judge; he should not be appointed ad hoc by the minister when the necessity for investigation arises.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will give some explanation on that point to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

LABOUR UNION LABELS BILL.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill (10) An Act respecting Labour Union Labels. He said: The committee did not consider it expedient in the public interest to report this Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved that the report be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

BANK OF MONTREAL BILL.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill (T) An Act respecting the Bank of Montreal. He said: The committee has had an intimation from the promoters of this measure that the Bill would not be proceeded with, and the committee have therefore recommended that leave be granted to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved that the report be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

INSURANCE DEPARTMENT REPORT.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State when we may expect to receive the last report of the Insurance Department up to the end of 1904. I asked him this question the other day, and he promised that he would make inquiry.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I must apologize to the hon. gentleman for having forgotten this matter. I will let him have an answer to-morrow.

AN ERROR IN MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the Senate to a somewhat irregular proceeding which occurred yesterday, not on the part of the Senate, however, but on the part of the House of Commons. On referring to yesterday's Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate, the following entries will be found on page 609:

A message was brought from the House of Commons by their clerk, to return the Bill (M) intituled: 'An Act to amend an Act respecting certain patents of William A. Damen,' and to acquaint the Senate that they have passed the said Bill without any amendment.

A message was brought from the House of Commons by their clerk, to return the Bill (AA) intituled: 'An Act respecting certain patents of the Ideal Manufacturing Company,' and to acquaint the Senate that they have passed the said Bill without any amendment.

In the proceedings of the House of Commons, No. 103, page 737, the following entry will be found:

In obedience to the order of your honourable House of the 22nd May ultimo, your committee have again considered Bill 129 (M of the Senate) intituled: 'An Act to amend the Act respecting certain patents of William A. Damen,' and have further amended the same.

Immediately afterwards I find this entry:

Your committee have also examined the following Bills——

—among which is Bill (166), (AA of the Senate), intituled 'An Act respecting certain patents of the Ideal Manufacturing Company.'

—and report that they have considered the same and made certain amendments.

Trouble may possibly arise hereafter on account of the fact that the messages received from the House of Commons indicated that no amendments were made to either of these Bills, whereas amendments appear to have been made by the Commons, and they should have been attached so that they might be confirmed by this House. I do not remember any case of this kind having occurred in the past, and am not prepared to make any suggestion as to how the difficulty may be got over, unless it be that our clerk should call the attention of the clerk of the House of Commons to the facts and have them recall, by message, these two Bills, and send them down later with the amendments attached. There may be older members of the Senate present who have noticed errors of this kind in the past, and who may be able to offer some other suggestion. In any event the matter is important, because if these two Bills should be allowed to go on the statute-book without the amendments of the House of Commons, difficulty may arise after the close of the session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is quite clear that when the Bill comes up for Royal Assent, the original is the only one that would be regarded as an authentic record of what parliament has done; and therefore if the House of Commons made changes in these two Bills, the suggestion which my hon. friend makes that the Clerk of this House should call the attention of the clerk of the House of Commons to the mistake and have it rectified, is one which should be followed. The Bills should go back to the House of Commons to be corrected.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And then when the amended Bills come back to us, will it be necessary to receive them and rescind this entry in our minutes?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not. I think it would be superseded.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The correction will have to begin in the House of Commons. They will have to rescind their Minutes, and when the Bills are returned to us we shall have to rescind our entry.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Bills came back to us, concurred in by the House of Commons without amendment. and we took no action. It would be the duty of the House of Commons to send a messenger to this House, stating that they had made an error, and asking that the Bills be sent back to them.

PORT AND PILOTAGE DISTRICT OF QUEBEC BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (171) An Act respecting the Port and Pilotage District of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised that this Bill is introduced with the approval of the shipping federation and of the pilots who are interested. It will be in the recollection of the House that two years ago a Bill was introduced placing the pilots between Montreal and Quebec under the control of the Minister of Marine; and it is now proposed that the pilots below Quebec shall also be placed under the same authority. The present regulations go back for a period of some forty years to a time when four-fifths of the vessels entering the St. Lawrence were sailing ships. It is now in the interests of the shipping federation that a change should be made. At present each pilot has his own boat in which he goes out to meet the incoming vessel at Bic. It is proposed to fix the meeting of incoming steamers and the leaving of outgoing vessels at a point some distance below Bic; and the department propose to place a steam vessel at the disposal of the pilots, in which way very much greater despatch will be obtained. This steam vessel will be ready in the river at all times to deliver a pilot to any vessel coming up the St. Lawrence.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will that steam vessel be at the disposal of the pilots free of charge?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We all know the river requires constant care. The channel requires to be dredged every year. Who will take care of that if you get rid of the commissioners?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill does not interfere with that matter at all; the government attend to the dredging as before. Of course the pilots have charge of the vessels for a very long distance below Quebec; I do not know the exact mileage, but it is a considerable distance down the river. This Bill has no connection whatever with the subject to which my hon. friend refers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The explanation given by the hon. Secretary of State is not very lucid, and unless one has paid attention to the question of pilotage, he could not understand the full purport of the measure. If I understand the Bill, by examining it, and the statute which it repeals, it simply transfers the management of the pilotage system of the district of Quebec, and does not affect the powers and authorities vested in the harbour commissioners of the city of Quebec. The change is confined to a transference of the management of the pilots in the district of Quebec. In addition to that the pilots of the river Saguenay are made a portion of the Quebec district. In other words it takes the management of the pilots out of the hands of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, and vests it in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That, I think, is the whole purport of the Bill, is it not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that is the whole purport of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then there is a proviso at the close of the clause, in which the authority provided for by the Shipping Casualties Act of 1901, and amendments thereto, designating a tribunal to try certain offences, is not to be exercised by the minister. Power is given to him to appoint a tribunal to try cases not otherwise provided for. Those who have been in parliament for a number of years know that this question of pilots on the St. Lawrence river and the gulf of St. Lawrence has always been a very vexed one. The pilots themselves through their organization have applied, over and over again, for extra powers in regard to the question of the regulation and selection of pilots to go down the river to bring up vessels. That is now to be taken, if I understand this Bill out of the hands of the commissioners and transferred to the Minister of Marine. It is also well known by those who have paid any attention to the subject, that this has been a political engine which has in the past been used with somewhat serious effect. In different counties along the St. Lawrence, the organization of pilots has exercised certain influence with members of the House, and all sorts of threats have been held out to them unless certain concessions were made. This Bill transfers all that power, and all the political influence which was exercised in the past by the commissioners and pilotage authorities, to the hands of the Minister of Marine. How far that will benefit the service I am not prepared to say. I have come to this conclusion, however, that it cannot be much worse than it has been in the past, and consequently I shall not offer very serious objection to the transfer, although I may be permitted to say that power such as has been exercised by the Commissioners in the past, when placed in the hands of the minister will no doubt be exercised in the interests of the government and of the government candidates. I do not know, however, that that will be very much worse than what has taken place in the past. Anything that can be done to make the pilotage service in the St. Lawrence better than it has been, should be done, and I would go a step further and make it cheaper to the shipping interest than it has been. That would certainly be in the interests of the whole community.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sorry that the hon. gentleman was engaged at the time I made my introductory remarks. He lost the opportunity of hearing what I stated when I explained the Bill. What I said was that this measure had the approval of the shipping federation and of the pilots; and that the action was not new, because some time ago parliament had authorized the pilots between Montreal and Quebec to be placed under the same control as is proposed in this instance, so that practically this Bill has the approval of all parties who are in any way interested. I am told that so far as the lines of steamers running into Montreal are concerned, such as the Allan Line, they have their own pilots. They do not take a pilot from the ordinary roll, but have certain pilots who are taken in turn. Outside of the vessels of these steamship companies who have their own pilots, the men are sent out in the order on which they stand on a certain roll. I mentioned also, as another improvement, that the department was to furnish a steamer for the pilots, and this steamer was to be always in the offing ready to deliver a pilot to any incoming vessel. I am rather amused at my hon. friend conjuring up the influence the government are to obtain for election purposes through this change. I cannot see myself that it is going to operate in that direction; at all events the force is not so very great as to have a material influence on any appreciable number of electoral seats. There was a question raised about the minister naming the tribunal. I find that under the Shipping Casualties Act it now rests with the minister to deal with all shipping casualties, and wherever any question arises where a pilot is to blame it is only proper that the minister should have the same control as he has under other circumstances. Section 8 of the Shipping Casualties Act provides that if it appears to the minister, either upon or without a preliminary inquiry into a shipping casualty, that a formal investigation is expedient, or that any master, mate or engineer is incompetent, he may appoint an officer to make the inquiry. This matter of pilotage is germane to that subject.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is there anything in that Act about the examination of pilots, which is a very important matter?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is provided for elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who will attend to that now? Experienced and properly qualified pilots are necessary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is all provided for.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Even pilots on such vessels as the Allan Line steamers have to pass an examination.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All the pilots have to pass examinations.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The government is to be commended for having placed a steamer at the disposal of the pilots. Last October in coming out on the 'Tunisian,' we were delayed eight hours, simply because the pilot steamer was not strong enough. They would not come alongside the ship, the reason given by the pilot to the captain being that he was afraid his boat would be destroyed, although there was not a ripple on the gulf at the time. I am glad the government have put at the disposal of the pilots a boat that will be able to go alongside the ships.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How can one steamer attend to four or five ships the same day?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—She is lying all the time at Father Point with pilots. The moment a ship is sighted a pilot is named to attend to that vessel. The steamer is not sailing up and down, but lying at Father Point.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—At New York harbour there is only one steamer with about 25 pilots aboard. They know what course a steamer takes and when it is due to arrive and those pilots are furnished as the vessels come to the port. At Father Point there would be no difficulty in having fifty ships supplied by one steamer on the same day.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudière)—There seems to be some misapprehension about this Bill. The pilotage system of the St. Lawrence consists of three parts. The first is between Montreal and Quebec, which is to-day under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Then there is the pilotage system in the River Saguenay, which is now also under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I see the hon. leader of the opposition shakes his head; if he will look at the statutes of 1903, chapter 48, he will find that I am right. It is there provided that from the first day of January, 1904, the administration of the pilots of the Saguenay district is to be under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The minister, under authority of parliament, some time ago assumed control of the pilots between Montreal and Quebec. The only pilots that are not to-day under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries are the pilots of the district of Quebec proper, in and around Quebec; that is to say, from Quebec to Father Point. Now, these pilots, at their own request, are coming in under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, so that the whole River St. Lawrence will now be under one jurisdiction instead of two as at present, and instead of three as it was formerly. The pilots below Quebec take the steamer from Father Point to Quebec. They only have charge below Quebec. At Quebec there is a change of pilots to take vessels from Quebec to Montreal. There is a third set of pilots on the Saguenay river. Now it is much better to put all the pilots under one jurisdiction as is contemplated by this Bill, leaving each pilot naturally to operate in the waters with which he is familiar. This Bill does not mean that a Saguenay pilot will take a ship to Montreal. The pilots will remain on the sections of the river where they are at present, but the three sets of pilots will, from this time forward, be under the control of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

As to one steamer being sufficient for the service, the ships pass within at most two or three miles of the wharf at Father Point, and when a vessel comes along the government tender will have no difficulty in putting a pilot on board without loss of time. At Quebec there is no difficulty, because when a ship does not go actually to a wharf, it can easily be boarded by the new pilot.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has made the statement that this Bill is misapprehended, and judging from the first portion of his speech as well as the remarks which have fallen from some other members, such would appear to be the case. The only question before the Senate, really is, first, whether it would be advisable to attach the Saguenay district to that of Quebec, and second, as to whether the powers exercised by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners should be transferred to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That is the whole purport of the Bill; and it is a question of policy as to whether it would be better in the interests of the important pilot service on the St. Lawrence to have it under the sole management of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or to leave it divided as at present between the minister and the harbour commissioners. If I remember correctly, that is what I brought to the attention of the House in my remarks. I can assure the hon. Secretary of State in reply to the remarks he made in reference to the political influences which have existed in the past and which may probably exist in the future or may be renewed in the future, that what I pointed out has not been conjured up. If he will permit me to say so, he cannot have paid much attention to this whole question during years past, or he would have come to the conclusion to which I have given utterance in this House. I do not refer particularly to the present government. Ever since I have been in parliament for the past thirty years, this question of pilotage authority has been constantly coming up before the House, and scarcely ever has it been discussed without evidence being produced of the political influence exercised by the government in connection with it. My point is simply this: Would it be wise to have the jurisdiction vested in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, rather than in the harbour commissioners. Judging from matters which have come to light in regard to the Intercolonial Railway of late, it is not likely to be much better than it has been, and I am somewhat inclined to think it cannot be much worse.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend who addressed the House a few moments ago, stated that he did so for the purpose of clearing up misapprehensions, but I am afraid he has created one, so far as I am concerned at least. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the pilotage jurisdiction or districts would still remain as before; that there would be three districts, the Montreal, Quebec and Saguenay districts; and that in each of these pilots would be examined as to their qualifications and would operate in their own waters. The pilots of the district of Quebec would have nothing to do with any other portion of the river, and the same would be true of the pilots of the Saguenay. Now if I understand the Bill rightly, it merges the Saguenay district and the Quebec district into one, and there will be only two divisions.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—There will be two districts it is true, but the qualifications for pilots will remain the same and they will be attached to their respective districts as heretofore.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When the Saguenay district is merged in that of Quebec, I would say that the Saguenay pilots would be liable to be called upon to perform service anywhere within the district of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am informed by the department that there are four pilots who are allotted exclusively to the Saguenay. The pilots who run between Quebec and Father Point do not go up the Saguenay. My hon. friend will recollect that last year one of the Montreal steamers met with a serious accident by running on the rocks, and at that time a question arose as to whether the pilots of the Saguenay were properly instructed. Since that time these four men, who are familiar with the Saguenay river, have been set apart exclusively for work there, and do no other work outside.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is a pity that the wording of this clause is not the same as the clause in the Shipping Casualties Act of 1901. Under section 8 of the Shipping Casualties Act 'the minister may appoint any officer of the government of Canada, or any judge of the county court, or any judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, or any stipendiary magistrate, to be a commissioner for the purposes of such investigation; and such commissioner shall be deemed a court for such purpose.' I think it is a pity that in the present instance some such language as that has not been used. By the present Bill the minister may, in any case not provided for in the Shipping Casualties Act—and the offences of pilots are not provided for in that measure—designate a tribunal or officer to try any such offence.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (132) An Act to amend the Government Railways Act. He said: From time to time there has been an expression of opinion that it would be a good thing if the Intercolonial Railway had an outlet on Georgian Bay and the waters leading to Lake Superior; and while there is nothing immediately in contemplation, a favourable opportunity has arisen for obtaining running rights over the Canada Atlantic Railway. Legislation is now being sought by which the Canada Atlantic Railway will be transferred to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and it is thought advisable, in accordance with the policy which has been observed by parliament for many years, to provide for the running of the trains of the Intercolonial Railway over the line of the Canada Atlantic. This Bill therefore gives authority, if circumstances should warrant it, or if it should be considered a proper policy to adopt, to run the trains of the government railway over the Grand Trunk line between Montreal and Côteau and over what is now the Canada Atlantic line from Côteau to Parry Sound. No charge will be involved unless the trains of the government railway actually make use of these lines, but this is a favourable opportunity for taking the running powers I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would it not be better to have the Intercolonial Railway given over to some company ? It is a useless line and is losing money every year. At the time it was built there was no communicaton between Montreal and the maritime provinces. Now there are other lines of communication, and they are making money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Address the members from the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The maritime provinces have other railway communication now, and this road should be given up as a government line altogether, and transferred to some company.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of Bill (115) An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Before the second reading of this Bill I should like to get some information from the hon. member. In one clause of the Bill it is stated that one of the parties is the National Trust Company, which is mentioned as being incorporated in Ontario. I have looked into the statutes of Ontario and have had some other people do so but cannot find it there. Will the hon. gentleman tell me where I can find it ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I understand the National Trust Company is incorporated in Ontario, and doing business in Montreal. The Bill deals with the financial arrangements of the company. Those questions can be better answered in the committee.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I think the hon. gentleman does not understand my question. Having myself looked into the Ontario statutes and had others also look, we have not been able to find the charter of this company. Will the hon. gentleman tell me where I can find it ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is a company incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies' Act.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Where could I find the charter of incorporation ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is incorporated under a general Act providing for the incorporation of such companies, and the notice of incorporation will appear in the Ontario 'Gazette.' It is a company of some years standing.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I have had information from another that the charter canont be found. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell me in what year the company was incorporated.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Speaking from memory I should say seven or eight years ago.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman from Manitoba (Hon. Mr. Watson) does not know himself.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, but I have frequently seen the name in Ontario. I have no doubt the notice of the organization of the company will be found in the Ontario 'Gazette' and the information can be got from the secretary's office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no doubt the hon. gentleman can obtain the information if he will apply to the solicitor of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I promise the hon. gentleman that when this Bill goes to committee, I will undertake to get the solicitor to supply the information.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Would the hon. gentleman have any objection to putting off the second reading until he gets the information ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON— I should like to see this Bill pass its third reading with as little delay as possible. I am informed by the Grand Trunk Railway people that they have already made financial arrangements with the Rothschilds for a large amount of money, and the completion of the financial arrangements is waiting the passing of this Bill. Rather than put it off, I would suggest that it be allowed to pass as a matter of urgency. I understand the Railway Committee will be called to-morrow, and I was going to ask the House to suspend the rules and let it go to the Railway Committee to-morrow. All the information asked for by the hon. gentleman will then be cheerfully furnished by the solicitor of the company, who will be present.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I understand the gentleman takes it upon himself to get the information and give it to the House to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I undertake to give it in the Railway Committee to-morow.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the suspension of the rules so far as they relate to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I object,

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Does the hon. gentleman persist in his objection ?

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Certainly. To-morrow I will get the information the hon. gentleman undertakes to give.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman has a perfect right to object, but I should like to point out to him that to-morrow the Railway Committee will meet, and we are then likely to have an adjournment for a few days. The Grand Trunk Railway Company were anxious that this Bill should be passed before our last adjournment. I undertake to promise that the information asked for by the hon. gentleman will be furnished to him in the Railway Committee, to-morrow, before the Bill is taken up at all, and if not we will not proceed with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—The answer to that is very apparent. Even if I withdrew my objection and the Bill were allowed to go to the committee to-morrow, the Governor would not be here to sanction the Bill. We can pass the Bill on Friday if it is not amended, or at latest it can be passed on Tuesday next. Even if it were passed now it could not be sanctioned before that, so that the hon. gentleman is not losing anything by my insisting on the observance of the rule.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have myself personal knowledge of the standing of this company. I have had communications with them, and know of them, and there is no manner of doubt as to their having been in existence and doing business for a number of years. I dare say there are other hon. gentlemen present who can make the same statement.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—If I had a copy of the Act incorporating the National-Trust Company, I might perhaps find that it has no power to do business outside of Ontario. I do not say that it is so, but it might be so, and therefore it is almost necessary for those who wish to look through the Bill, to know what the powers of that company are. The answer first given me was that the company was incorporated this year. I wrote to the clerk at Toronto and got no reply. I insist upon the rule being observed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to add that while I do not know anything about the powers of the National Trust Company, I know it is one of the most responsible companies in Ontario. The president is Mr. Flavel, one of the wealthy men of Toronto, and the Hon. S. C. Wood, formerly treasurer of the province of Ontario, is a director. I know the company is composed of the very best men in Canada and financially stands higher perhaps than any other trust company we have. I could not give the information my hon. friend asks for ; I am merely speaking of the company itself and those who are managing it.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I do not doubt the respectability of the company, but I want to see the charter of incorporation, that is all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Can the hon. gentleman say why this voluminous Bill comes up at this stage of the session, after we have been here nearly six months ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think the Bill almost explains itself. The Grand Trunk

Pacific people have been able to make certain financial arrangements, and this is a Bill authorizing them to carry out those arrangements. The Bill must pass before they can consummate the financial transactions. No doubt the hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that such matters cannot be completed in a short time. I should like to repeat that if the hon. gentleman will allow this Bill to go to committee I will undertake that unless he is perfectly satisfied that this trust company has a right to do the business referred to in this Bill, I will ask that the measure be allowed to stand, and it will not be proceeded with in the committee to-morrow. I repeat,—I pledge myself that the Bill will not be proceeded with to-morrow, unless he is perfectly satisfied that this company is entitled to do business outside of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I am sorry I cannot accede to the hon. gentleman's request, for this reason. I want to see the charter of incorporation to ascertain what powers they have. There are some things in this Bill to which I shall object under certain circumstances. The hon. gentleman does not gain or lose anything by postponing the consideration of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I suggest that it could be arranged to get the required information and place it in the hon. gentleman's hands this evening. He will find that the company is incorporated and possesses all the powers which are necessary. Not only that, but the company was incorporated under the most careful supervision and is a company of the very highest standing. I would ask to have this motion stand so as to see if we can get the information before the House rises.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—I object.

EDMONTON BOOM COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Ross (Regina), moved the second reading of Bill (No. 119) An Act to incorporate the Edmonton Boom Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the purport of this Bill? We had a good deal of discussion last year in connection with a proposition to boom one of the western rivers as affecting the navigation of the river. I think the river at Edmonton is navigable.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I think the objection is covered by clause 10 of this Bill which provides:

> 10. Nothing in this Act contained shall authorize the exercise of any power conferred by this Act so as to interfere with free navigation on the said river or any of the waters tributary thereto, or to the detriment of the free and uninterrupted passage of any timber, saw-logs, pulpwood, or other lumber, belonging to persons other than the company.

I fancy that this provision will remove the objections we had against the Bill of last year. In referring the Bill to the committee I trust they will exercise the same careful supervision over navigable waters as we did in the Bill to which my hon. friend has referred. If the interests of the public are not sufficiently protected, the committee should see that the Bill is so amended that all the users of the river will be amply protected. I am at one with the hon. gentleman on that point.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Should not this Bill be referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I thought so last year in dealing with the Bill to which reference has been made. That Bill was, however, referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours and by that committee to a sub-committee, as it dealt with a navigable river.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Former Bills of this kind have been referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours deals with questions affecting navigation, and is the proper committee to consider this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think my hon. friend from Toronto was present at the time we had the discussion on the Bill to which I have referred. That Bill was sent to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours for the reason that the works which it authorized might affect the navigation of a river. It received a great deal of consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (PP) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, with respect to the amount of securities to be issued by railway companies.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

THE PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Can the hon. Secretary of State give us any idea when parliament will be prorogued? This has been an exceedingly prolonged session, and members would like to get some hint, if the hon. gentleman is in a position to give it, as to when we may be released from our duties here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am afraid I cannot undertake to foreshadow when parliament will prorogue. I have several times believed that I could, but when the day arrived I found that we were still some distance from prorogation.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, June 29, 1905.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

The Order of the Day being called:

That the Senate give instructions to the proper officer of this honourable House to pay the balance of the accounts due to the counsel-at-law and expert witness for services rendered by them to the special committee appointed during the last session of the Senate, to investigate the affairs in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In regard to this notice of motion, I am not aware whether or not the documents which I require have been laid before the House. I understand the hon. member for Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) has asked that certain accounts be produced in regard to the special committee, but I do not know whether they have yet been brought down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They were laid on the table yesterday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. Secretary of State will remember that yesterday I asked him to lay on the table a statement of the action which had been taken by the Department of Justice in reference to these accounts, and he promised to do so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the information here. I was going to read it and then lay it on the table.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Under the circumstances, as I have not yet seen the papers, I would ask that this notice of motion be allowed to stand until I am in possession of the documents.

The motion was allowed to stand.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to say that as Saturday will be Dominion Day, and as there is really nothing on the order paper for to-morrow, there seems to be no objection to the House adjourning, if it is the desire of senators, until Tuesday of next week.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are a number of localities in which Dominion Day is celebrated on Monday, and I would suggest that the House should meet on Tuesday at eight o'clock instead of three. Parties living between Brockville and Toronto require to leave home on Monday in order to reach here in time for the sitting at three o'clock on Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Why not say Wednesday of next week?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I would suggest to the hon. Secretary of State that members from the maritime provinces who desire to visit their homes would find it a great convenience if adjournment could be made until Wednesday of next week.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, July 5th, at 3 p.m.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (134) An Act to incorporate the Provident Financial Association, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

INVESTMENT OF FUNDS OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES IN SECURITIES OF TRUST COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the second reading of Bill (OO) An Act to amend the Insurance Act as respects the investments of funds of Life Insurance Companies in securities of Trust Companies. He said : In rising to move the second reading of this Bill I do so because I consider that the experiences which have fallen to the lot of policy-holders on the other side of the line have been so disastrous that it is well that we should carefully guard the interests of life insurance companies in Canada. I have no desire whatever to cast any reflection upon any of the stock companies that we have here. Canadian life insurance companies have a very creditable record, but while that is the case, parliament is justified in reviewing life insurance legislation from time to time when there are evidences of necessity of amendment. I think we should not hesitate to amend in the direction of giving the policy-holders the best possible security for the payment of their policies.

Life insurance is one of the most important methods of laying by for old age or of providing for and educating families. The Life Insurance Act should be carefully framed with a view of affording the largest possible measure of safety to policy-holders. The law under which they operate should be amended from time to time as experience points out the necessity for amendment.

I am pleased to say that Canadian companies have been admirably handled so far, especially stock companies, so as to meet all obligations. I regret we cannot say the same regarding foreign companies.

In order to carefully provide for the reserve to be held by companies the government have cut down the estimated earning power of their investments from 4⅓ to 3½ per cent, and while doing that they have not in any way limited the schedule of methods in which they may invest.

Of recent years trust companies have figured conspicuously in financial circles on the other side of the line. Their stocks have run up enormously, in many cases to ten times their face value, while in other cases trust companies have brought very serious financial disasters upon those who held their stocks. I noticed a recent case where a trust company which held a very creditable record financially for many years, was compelled, owing to some unfortunate speculation, to liquidate and the stockholders got only some 30 cents on the dollar. While life insurance companies are permitted to invest their money in the stock of fire insurance companies, I do not know how far it is advisable that such should be done. We know that in the recent disastrous fire in Toronto there were some stock companies whose stock was almost completely wiped out. Now, fire insurance companies' stock is more of a speculative investment than anything else. It may yield a good revenue and it may yield no revenue at all. I contend that as a safe investment it is not desirable that life insurance companies should put their money either in the stock of trust companies or of fire insurance companies,—not because we have not good trust companies in Canada, for I quite admit that our trust companies have a creditable record and that they are a credit to the country and to those who handle them ; but it is hard to draw the line between companies of that kind now doing business amongst us, such as the Toronto General Trusts which is undoubtedly a strong financial institution and the National Trust Company; and other companies that may be formed for entirely different purposes. I would not attempt to cast any reflection on existing institutions of this kind, but I contend that trusts have in some instances been formed for purposes that have proved disastrous. As it is hard to draw the line, we must deal with all trusts in the same way.

It is quite natural that companies should press for unlimited privileges in earning a revenue, not so much on account of the policy-holders as on account of the stockholders. But the duty of parliament is to look after policy-holders; stockholders can look after themselves. Now there are over forty different ways in which life insurance companies can invest their funds. They have unquestionably the privilege of invest-
